

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

The following articles in this volume are copyright, 1902, by J. B. LIPPINCOTT COMPANY in the United States of America:

The Eighteenth Century. By Austin Dobson.

Swift. By George Saintsbury.

Pope. By George Saintsbury.

Addison. By George Gregory Smith.

Steele. By Robert Aitken.

Richardson. By Austin Dobson.

The Scottish Vernacular Revival. By David Patrick.

Allan Ramsay. By William Wallace. Fielding. By Austin Dobson.
Sterne. By George Saintsbury.
Goldsmith. By Austin Dobson.
Blake. By James Douglas.
Fergusson. By William Wallace.
Burns. By William Wallace.

The short essays on the Revolutionary Period and the Age of Queen Anne are by Mr Rober Aitken. CHATTERTON and CRABBE are two of the numerous articles by the late Mr Francis Hinder Groome, and JAMES BOSWELL is by the Rev. Thomas Davidson. The biographical part of POPE is the original article by Dr Carruthers, revised by Professor Saintsbury, who has rewritten the critical portion The Editor is indebted to Mr Austin Dobson for revising GAV and PRIOR; to Dr Robertson Nicoll for revising SAMUEL JOHNSON and JANE AUSTEN; to Mr William Woodburn for revising COWPER; to Mr A. H. Millar for revising BRUCE and LOGAN, MAYNE and MACNEILL; and to Mr Alexander Anderson for revising THOMAS CAMPBELL and LADY NAIRNE. Over a hundred English authors are dealt with in this volume who were not named in the old edition; and about as many are illustrated by extracts who in the former edition were passed over with little more than a mere mention. The literary history of the United States will form a separate division of the work; the American authors of the eighteenth century will accordingly be treated along with those of the nineteenth in the concluding volume, where will be found also the sections on the literature of Canada, Australia, and other British oversea dominions. Miss Foxcroft's Supplement to Burnet's History of My Own Time, the second volume of Mr Sichel's Bolingbroke, and Mr Fraser Rae's important edition of Sheridan's plays are amongst works that became available only after the sheets in this volume bearing on these authors had gone to press. At page 387, col. 2, line 22, read Boyer for Boyes.

THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY.

treating of the Eighteenth Century, or—to speak more exactly—of the Eighteenth Century in English Literature, the historian is confronted at the outset by a difficulty of definition.

What is meant by the Eighteenth Century in Eaglish Literature? The natural (though possibly Bootian) reply would be-from the end of the Seventeenth to the beginning of the Nineteenth. But this ingenuous answer will not ierre-especially with certain modern critics. According to these, the literary Eighteenth Century cannot be confined within the limits indicated, but must rather be held to correspond with a different period of time, beginning earlier and ending earlier, and characterised throughout by specific features which distinguish it both from the period which precedes and the period which follows it. Some authorities date this period from the English Revolution of 1688, and close it with the French Revolution of 1789. Others, with equal show of reason, go farther back, and commence at the Restoration. In a philosophical essay these divisions are defensible, and possibly useful, although they are always open to the commonplace objection that no great change in thought can be said to begin as invariably and inevitably as Grouse-shooting or the Law Terms. And even if they should be scientifically accurate, they present insuperable objections to matter-of-fact people, inasmuch as-to name but one very intelligible drawback-they involve the assignment to the Eighteenth Century of events which took place before that century begins in the calendar. Furthermore, they involve the assignment to the Nineteenth Century of other events which demonstrably happened in the Eighteenth. For these reasons-and notwithstanding the fact that the present volume, for convenience, includes a portion of an earlier period-we shall take leave, in this survey, to regard the Eighteenth Century in Literature as concurrent with the Eighteenth Century in Chronology-that is to say, as extending from the end of 1700 (the year in which Dryden died) to the end of the year 1800 (the year of the death of Cowper).

The period intended having been thus defined, it will be well to indicate the nature of its special gift to letters—such gift, for the moment, being understood to consist, not so much in the quality and amount of the thing produced, as in the disclosure of fresh methods or fashions of production. Of the actual work of the Eighteenth Century a sufficient report will be found in the biographies and extracts which follow; here, it is proposed to take note only of those new forms of literary > expression which distinguish the age from those ages which went before. That, on or about the date of the Restoration, a change began to be apparent both in the matter and manner of English Literature is admitted even by those who find its cause uncertain and its course obscure. Of this change, in the last decades of the seventeenth century, Dryden is allowed to have been the chief exponent; in the first decades of the eighteenth century, it was maintained and developed under Pope and his contemporaries. Broadly speaking, although its leaders were writers of verse, it consisted in the existence of a state of things which was more favourable to the perfecting of prose. The spirit of a new criticism was abroad, tempering imagination and repressing enthusiasm, endeavouring after symmetry and uniformity, averse alike from decoration and invention. To be direct and clear, to be logical, to regard right reason and plain sense, to be governed by the teaching of the Ancients (filtered through the medium of French criticism), became by degrees the unwritten code of the times. Working prosaically, its chief gifts were in prose. It gave us the first daily Newspaper; and, by the pen of Defoe and his humbler allies, an extraordinary and unprecedented development of Journalism; it gave us, by the pens of Addison and Steele, a form of Essay, which, differing as widely from the essay of Bacon as from the essay of Temple, set the model to its own day and to ours. Under Richardson and Fielding it gave us what was practically the modern Novel; under Hume and Robertson and Gibbon, what was practically the modern History. Finally, it gave us in its earlier years a Poetry of Convention unexampled in its mechanical accomplishment, which, while presenting many of the features of an age of Prose, was still Poetry, and which, exhausting itself after a career of exceptional vigour and brilliancy, left the soil prepared for the gradual but irresistible growth of a truer Poetry of Nature and Romance.

Among these Eighteenth Century innovations, Journalism, which has lasted the longest, begins the first. There had been newspapers, doubt, in the preceding century, even as the were brave men before Agamemnon. The was the Public Intelligencer of L'Estrange, at the still-existent London Gazette, which da from November 7, 1665, when Charles II. v keeping Court at Oxford by reason of plague. There were the News Letters of De and Dawks (Steele's 'honest Ichabod') which had blank spaces left 'for any Gentleman, others, to write their private Business to the Friends in the Country,' and both of which great Mr Edmund Smith—one of Johnson's poets, if you please—celebrated Latin Sapphics:

Scribe securus, quid agit Senatus,
Quid caput stertit grave Lambethanum,
Quid Comes Guildford, quid habent novorum
DAWKSque DYERque

But it was not until the first year of Ann reign, and indeed but three days after Ki William died at Kensington, that the first da This w paper made its modest appearance. the Daily Courant, a little double-column sheet fourteen inches by eight, printed on o side only, and excusing its exiguity (or lack advertisements) by a praiseworthy desire ' save the Publick at least half the Impertinence of ordinary News-Papers.' Its news is exc sively derived from the Paris Gazette and t Haarlem and Amsterdam Courants, but speedily grew into flourishing life, bei promptly followed by a crowd of rivals a imitators, Posts, Post-Boys, Packets, Observato Registers, Mercuries, Medleys, British Apoll Athenian Oracles, and the like, not all of whi were, in the strict sense, journals. One of t most remarkable of these latter was the Revi of Daniel Defoe, a sheet of eight (afterwar four) small quarto pages, written in Newga (where its author was confined), and, like t first Daily Courant, professing to be 'Purg'd fro the Errors and Partiality of News-Writers a Petty-Statesmen, of all sides.' The full title w A Review of the Affairs of France; but it w in reality, a history of the domestic and forei affairs of Europe, while in a section entitl Mercure Scandale: or Advice from the Scand ous Club, which began in the second numb its author professed to collect contempora gossip. As may be gathered from the descr tion of Defoe's Review, a main feature of these organs was their foreign intelligence which, being easier to obtain than home new naturally predominated. Indeed, it is pre plainly hinted by one who claims to belong to the 'ingenious Fraternity' of News-Writers, that when there was no news from Brussels or Lisbon to copy, it was manufactured ad hoc. 'The Case of these Gentlemen is, I think, more hard than that of the Soldiers, considering that they have taken more Towns, and fought more Battles. They have been upon Parlies and Skirmishes, when our Armies have lain still; and given the General Assault to many a Place, when the Besiegers were quiet in their Trenches. They have made us Masters of several strong Towns many weeks before our Generals could do it; and compleated Victories, when our greatest Captains have been glad to come off with a drawn Battle. Where Prince Eugene has slain his Thousands, Boyer [of the Post-Boy] has slain his Ten Thousands. This Gentleman can indeed be never enough commended for his Courage and Intrepidity during this whole War: He has laid about him with an inexpressible Fury, and, like the offended Marius of ancient Rome, made such Havock among his Countrymen, as must be the Work of two or three Ages to repair. It must be confessed, the Redoubted Mr Buckley [of the Daily Courant] has shed as much Blood as the former; but I cannot forbear saying, (and I hope it will not look like Envy) that we regard our Brother Buckley as a kind of Drawcansir, who spares neither Friend or Foe, but generally kills as many of his own Side as the Enemy's.'

Whether this passage, with its distinction of phrasing and its delicate irony, revealed to any of its readers the fact that a new force had arisen in English Literature, is not recorded. But its length as an extract, and its appearance here, may be justified by the explanation that it is quoted word for word from No. 18 of the Tatler for Saturday, May 21, 1709, and, with its context, constitutes the first acknowledged contribution of Joseph Addison to the recently-established paper of his inventive friend and schoolmate Richard Steele. Moreover, it may even claim to be the first example of another gift of the Eighteenth Century to English Letters. When, five or six weeks earlier, Captain Steele, casting about for some literary project to combine the Latest Foreign News (of which, as Queen Anne's Gazetteer, he had a certain monopoly) with the Latest Gossip of the Coffee-Houses, had hit upon the idea of a little tri-weekly sheet about the size of the Courant, which should be rather more critical and literary than the hand-to-mouth productions of your Boyers and Buckleys-he had builded better than he He was himself a clever man, with a warm heart and a ready pen, and his 'Letter of Intelligence,' even before its eighteenth number had been reached, fully deserved the credit of a fresh departure. But it was not until Addison became, as he did eventually, a regular contributor, that Steele's new enterprise grew to include a new form of writing. It was when the scholarly Secretary to Lord Wharton commenced to print in it the delightful La Bruyère-like studies of Tom Folio and Ned Softly and the Political Upholsterer, the Adventures of a Shilling, and the Rabelaisian Frozen Voices, that a new thing began to be born which was the Essay of Addison and Steele. finished and careful papers of Addison reacted upon those of his editor, whom they stimulated to a higher ambition, as well as to an elegance, a purity, and a correctness (the words are Steele's own) which, when he set out to 'observe upon the Manners of the Pleasurable, as well as the Busie Part of Mankind,' in addition to giving 'the ordinary Occurrences of common Journals of News,' had not formed part of his original project. Presently he himself went on to rival his friend upon his own ground; and, always a pioneer, to anticipate by some charming domestic scenes, of which he possessed the secret, the function of the Novel that was coming. the Spectator, which followed the Tatler as a daily issue, the evolution of the Essay continued. In his graver Saturday papers Addison began to preach those admirable lay-sermons that justify Mandeville in calling him 'a parson in a tyewig,' and in his occasional discourses on Wit, Imagination, Milton, the Old Ballads, and so forth, to apply, in critical form, the results of those earlier studies of the classics and the French critics in which he had been serving an unsuspected apprenticeship to letters. too, digressed successfully in that Christian-Hero vein of his days at the Tower Guard, producing, with a gravity which was perfectly genuine and sincere, numerous disquisitions upon Death, Devotion, Benevolence, Solitude, and Ambition; and exhibiting, but more rarely, his admirable gift as an impressionist critic of Art and the Stage. Finally, in endless sketches of contemporary manners and individual types, and particularly in the unrivalled Coverley series-which again foreshadows the coming fiction-the two friends contrived, with delightful good-humour, to rally, ridicule, and instruct their age. The partnership was continued to the conclusion of a third paper, the Guardian, when it ceased. But by this date (October 1713) the Essay, as a branch of that 'ingenious way of Miscellaneous Writing' upon the introducer of which Lord Shaftesbury invokes ironic benediction, had found its special form, a form admirably adapted for short swallow-flights of criticism, for humorous character-drawing, and for social satire. It was produced, after Addison and Steele, by many inferior 'hands;' but, for the present, we may leave it until it was revived, with a personal note and renewed ability, under the pens of Goldsmith and Johnson.

In the first years of Queen Anne, a hush seems to have fallen upon the poets; and, save for a rumbling epic or so by Blackmore, and a worthless miscellany by Wycherley, the Muses · might have been in exile with the Stuarts. Addison, indeed, put forth his over-praised Campaign. Prior, too, was forced by piracy into a premature appearance; but his full-dress revelation was not made until Anne had been for four years indubitably dead. Oddly enough, it is with the Spectator that is connected the first notable effort of that superlative artificer who, for more than three decades to come, held the first place in English verse, and influenced its voice for a longer period still. Towards the end of 1711, Addison reviewed, and certainly not, on this occasion, with 'faint praise,' what he termed 'a Master-piece in its It was the work of a youth of twenty, named Alexander Pope, and aimed at occupying, in English, much the same ground as the Ars Poetica of Horace, or perhaps—to speak more precisely—the Art Poltique of Boileau, with this difference, that while Horace and the French critic kept their precepts for their maturity, their English imitator, when he proceeded a metrical legislator, was only just out of his teens. Naturally enough, Pope's work was a cento, but it was a cento of extraordinary ingenuity; and Mr Spectator, from his fullbottomed wig, might justifiably nod Olympian approval of the skill with which the youthful poet's couplets were made to exemplify the errors they condemned. The lines-certainly, as Addison admits, 'would ha been very much admired in an Ancie Poet'-praise which fully justified Mr Po in offering to Steele's periodical his next periodical formance, the 'sacred Eclogue' entitled 7 Messiah (Spectator, No. 378), which he h modelled upon Virgil's Pollio. Much of l subsequent work, of which it is not here t place to speak, was of this imitated or adapt kind. But the precocious Essay on Critici. must have made it abundantly clear to eve reader of intelligence that its author had alrea entered the arena fully armed as a metrist, a: needed nothing but a theme to his han During his long literary activity, he was for tunate enough, on more than one occasion, find such a theme. He found it in the flawle jewel-work of the Rape of the Lock; he four it in the terrible Epic of the Dunces; he four it, unanswerably and triumphantly, in the Mor Essays and the Satires and Epistles. Last with leave of all the Bentleys, alive or dea he found it in that paraphrase of Homer, which has stimulated more Homer-lovers than tl critics would care to count. It may be tru that his version is 'a pretty poem, but must n be called Homer;' it may be true that it is-half-pretence,

Where Wits, not Heroes, prove their Skill in Fence. And great Achilles' Eloquence doth show As if no Centaur trained him, but Boileau!—

but it is, at least, a magnificent performanc which, as one of Pope's own rivals, Profess Conington, has admitted, by the 'calm, majest flow' of its language, carries on its readers ' irresistibly as Homer's own could do, were the born readers of Greek;' and fills their mine 'with a conception of the heroic age, no indeed strictly true, but almost as near th truth as that which was entertained by Virg himself.' It was in this prolonged and tediou task that Pope perfected the heroic couplwhich he had caught from Dryden, and which is his chief present to his own time, and 1 posterity. Like Johnson, he has suffered from the public impatience begotten of imitators wh only copied his defects; and it may perhaps t granted, even by a devotee, that his style, lik the style of Macaulay, grows wearisome taken in immoderate doses. But it is easy t select, from the Epistle to Arbuthnot alondozens of passages which, in spite of the apparently mechanic art of the metre, it would be difficult to better, either for conciseness, or directness, or curious felicity of phrase. Much of Pope's work is but a rhythmical exemplification of Addison's dictum (after Boileau) in the geview of the Essay on Criticism, 'that Wit and Fine Writing doth not consist so much in advancing Things that are new, as in giving Things that are known an agreeable Turn'-in other words, it is concerned less with the revelation of the unattempted or the unimagined in emotion, than with the expression, in a given form of verse, and with faultless perspicuity and finish, of the ordinary ideas in circulation at the time. But this studiously-controlled ambition by no means precluded the production of very noble and dignified utterances, as the Epistle to Arbuthnot—to take that example again-will readily testify. Indeed, it is difficult to read the closing paragraphs, or the splendid lines beginning, 'Not Fortune's Worshipper, nor Fashion's Fool' (quoted below at page 189), without wondering upon what ground it can ever have been debated whether Pope was really a poet.

From Young to Cowper, the heroic couplet on the Pope model remained the recognised metre of the century, and, as might be expected, it was largely employed for the social satire in which he had won his greenest laurels. Among his contemporaries were more than one poet who, without being exactly imitative, certainly showed signs of subjection to the trick of the time. Prior, who was Pope's senior, and a better scholar, followed the fashion of adaptation by versifying Exodus and Ecclesiastes, and by clothing in a straitlaced and high-heeled Queen Anne costume the fine old Not-Browne Maid. But his services to poetry were happily not limited to this. In his 'loose and hasty scribble' of Alma and in his Tales in the French manner, he added flexibility to the cramp Hudibrastics of Butler; his genuine Horatian note gave gaiety and grace to a dozen minor pieces; he reproduced in Down Hall and the Thief and the Cordelier with marked ability the anapestic ballad measure of the King and the Abbot of Canterbury, and he stands in the front rank of English epigrammatists. Moreover, in the lines To a Child of Quality, he set the tune of that half-gay, halfgrave familiar verse which, in this country—despite the depressing definition of M. Littré—we are content to class as vers de société. Another of Pope's contemporaries was Gay, a more sedulous disciple of his illustrious friend, but who, nevertheless, besides some pretty songs that sing, contrived to enrich his age with the long-popular Ballad-opera, and to equip it with a form of Fable which, while it fell short of the supreme art of La Fontaine, was still a convenient, workable vehicle. Nor must it be forgotten that, in Mr Pope's Welcome from Greece (i.e. from translating the Iliad), he anticipated and employed, with unexpected success, the ottava rima of Ariosto afterwards made popular by Frere and by Byron's Beppo. Who, for example, would imagine that the following octave, with its note of modernity, comes from the pen of the author of Trivia and the Shepherd's Week!-

I see two lovely sisters, hand in hand,
The fair haired Martha and Teresa brown;
Madge Bellenden, the tallest of the land;
And smiling Mary, soft and fair as down.
Yonder I see the chearful Duchess stand,
For friendship, zeal, and blithsome humours known:
Whence that loud shout in such a hearty strain?
Why, all the Hamiltons are in her train.

Of the remaining Pope group (not school), none gave any new thing to English verse-craft, and their achievements may be left to the separate accounts which follow. Pope survived them all save Swift, and Swift's last years were deathin-life.

It was with the Essay of Addison and Steele that-more for the sake of continuity than of logic—we endeavoured to link the early poetry of Pope. But the connection of the first appearances of modern prose fiction with a paper in the Englishman stands less in need of apology. In December 1713 Steele gave an account from his own knowledge of a certain morose Alexander Selkirk or Selcraig of Largo, who had lived for more than four years alone in the island of Juan Fernandez. cases, both real and feigned, were not unknown. Witness, as an instance of the former, Dampier's record of the Mosquito Indian whom Watling had left behind on the same island in But there is small doubt that to the story of Selkirk, as told by Steele, Captain Woodes Rogers, and others, Daniel Defoe, already referred to as the writer of the Review of the Affairs of France, was indebted for the germ of the remarkable book which he issued in April 1719, with the title of the Life and Strange Surprising Adventures of Robinson Crusoe. In 1719 Defoe was in his sixtieth year. had been many things-journalist, pamphleteer, political agent, traveller, tradesman, brickmaker, projector, and prisoner in Newgate. He had an inexhaustible store of miscellaneous reading; he delighted especially in travels and adventures; he had extraordinary aptitude for minute and realistic detail; he had an indefatigable habit of the pen. For all these gifts the experiences of Selkirk, as developed in Robinson Crusoe, afforded a favourable field, while its very limitations and restrictions tended to control and concentrate his 'thick-coming fancies.' Moreover, it is supposed that certain affinities—of which too much may easily be made, but which he certainly desired should be recognised -between the circumstances of his imagined castaway and his own solitary and self-reliant career, gave a subjective note to his work, which, save in the Farther Adventures and the Serious Reflections of Robinson Crusoe, it does not attain elsewhere. It is certainly not equally perceptible in Colonel Jack, Moll Flanders, Roxana, and the rest of the fictitious narratives that followed his admitted masterpiece, books which are nevertheless characterised by the same exactitude of trivial particulars, the same intentional negligences and repetitions, the same homely, pedestrian, and even flat phraseology. For the most part, they are chronicles of such careers as, in real life, would have fallen to the recording pen of the Ordinary of Newgate, from whose historiographic efforts they differ mainly by their greater variety of incident, their practised pencraft, and their faculty (in their writer's words) 'of forging a story.' In this last art Defoe is unrivalled. By the mental stenography and systematic stocktaking of a lifetime, he had accumulated so vast a reserve of facts and illustrations that, in the absence of anything to 'report,' in journalistic phrase, he could concoct a report of such astounding verisimilitude that to this day it remains debatable whether some of his performances are true, or partly true, or not true at all, in the sense that the events which they profess to narrate were never combined in the experiences of one and the same individual.

From the fact that Hogarth makes Moll Flanders the chosen literature of his 'Idle Apprentice,' it may be presumed that many of what Lamb calls the 'secondary' fictions of Defoe, though professedly didactic in their intention, were directed at readers not more illustrious than the apple-woman whom Borrow's Lavengro found studying the same absorbing work on London Bridge. But there were other reasons why they might be expected to appe to the people more than to the cultivated classe It was Defoe's boast that his tales were tru histories, always an additional attraction to the humbler reader; and that, being true, they ha no connection with such novels and romanc as then existed. It was not with the Oroono. of the warm-blooded Aphra Behn, or the Cassandra of the sempiternal Sieur de la Ca prenède, that he wished them to be compared his fitter analogue in unrelieved veracity, had I sought for it, would have been more easily four in Bunyan's sombre and relentless Life an Death of Mr Badman. But if, in addition his singular gift of 'lying like truth,' he had con bined with his work any appreciable plot to 1 unravelled or problem to be solved; if he has included any material admixture of passion, any delineation of the domestic life of his da he might fairly have claimed—what is som times claimed for him-to rank as the Fath of the English Novel. These things, however he did not do. His invented biographies rogues and pirates and bona robas differ fro those which are not invented only in being fictitious as wholes; and they no more entit their author to priority in fiction as we no understand it than if he had been the auth of the wonderful book—not a little indebted his own Robinson Crusoe-which seventeen year later was given to the world by the maime and melancholy genius of Jonathan Swift. B Gulliver's Travels, that unique and unclassab masterpiece, must be left for treatment in the special pages on Swift that follow. In tracin the history of the Novel, it is neverthele impossible not to refer to it, if only account of the circumstantiality in fiction which Swift rivals Defoe; but it has little nothing to do with the development of the

That development came suddenly and u expectedly, nine years after Defoe had been laid to rest in the Dissenters' burial-ground And it came from a mo Bunhill Fields. unhopeful source. It would have been easy to predict that a middle-aged print should become the author of Pamela as the a sexagenarian journalist should sit down as write Robinson Crusoe. There are indeed certa superficial resemblances between Richardso and Defoe. Both belonged to the lower midd classes; both posed as moralists; both wro the English of common speech; both were c cumstantial in manner and copious in style. B

there the likeness ends. If Defoe gives little evidence of constructive intention, Richardson, on the contrary (at his best), works steadily to a foregone conclusion; if Defoe cares nothing for the affections, Richardson, on his side, is intensely preoccupied with them; if Defoe eschews sentiment and tearful emotion, Richardson revels in both, and cries as he writes. The one discovered an uninhabited island, the other the very-much-inhabited female heart; and, as far as the modern novel is concerned, the latter is the more notable achievement. With his wonderfully sympathetic insight into feminine character, Richardson's success might have been more signal if the accidents of his early habits had not led him to conduct his tale by correspondence. His biographer, Mrs Barbauld, holding an honest brief for her author, contends that this is the 'most natural' way, which is arguable; but she is also constrained to admit that it is the 'least probable,' which can scarcely be denied, above all in our day, when letter-writing no longer flourishes. That, notwithstanding his insupportable vehicle -for Clarissa and Sir Charles Grandison, his remaining novels, are on the same plan as Pamela-Richardson was able to enchain his public, must be attributed partly to the fact that its appetites were more unjaded and less impatient than ours, and partly to the extraordinary manner in which the writer's prolix but cumulative minuteness insensibly and irresistibly compels and subjugates the student who fairly adventures upon the text. But it may safely be affirmed that if no better model of fiction had been found than what Fielding calls the 'epistolary Style,' the early Novel, in spite of its psychology, must have perished speedily of its own perverted method.

With Fielding's Joseph Andrews, however, the new form quitted the confined (and slightly stuffy) atmosphere of Richardson's cedar-parlour for the open air and the cheery bustle of the Georgian high-road. The range of Richardson's characters is not great, and in his last two novels he scarcely travels beyond the personages of genteel comedy. But Fielding makes his draft upon Human Nature at large, and crowds his stage with men and women of all sorts and conditions, inclining by choice to the middle and lower classes rather than to 'the highest Life,' which he considers to present 'very little Humour or Entertainment.' With the precise connection of Pamela and Joseph Andrews it is not necessary to deal here, as it is sufficiently discussed hereafter. But, apart from mental analysis, the difference between Richardson and Fielding is practically the difference between Richardson and the modern Novel. Few now write novels in Richardson's fashion. But even to-day many books bear manifest traces of the form that Fielding gave to Tom Jones and Amelia. In the first place, he tells his story directly, in his own person, instead of letting his hero tell it, or allowing his characters to unravel themselves in letters. He pays minute attention to the construction and evolution of his plot, carefully excluding characters and episodes which do not advance the fable or contribute to the end to be attained. Rejecting Sensibility, which he regards as more or less unmanly, he substitutes for it Humour and Irony, in the latter of which attributes he is as great a master as Swift. his character-drawing he puts forth his full strength. Without much parade of psychology, he manages to make his dramatis personæ extraordinarily real and vivid, placing them before us in their habit as they lived, and with their fitting accessories. Finally, while painting Humanity as he finds it, by no means composed of 'Models of Perfection,' but rather of very frail and fallible personalities, he is careful-no doubt with perfect sincerity-to proclaim a moral purpose. The main objects of his satire, he declares, are Vanity and Hypocrisy. It is his intention to exhibit Vice as detestable, and never successful. It is his 'sincere endeavour,' he affirms in the Dedication of Tom Jones, 'to recommend Goodness and Innocence,' and to promote the cause of religion and virtue. Perhaps, in these more decorous days, it is sometimes difficult to see that he has rigorously adhered to his principles; but, in any case, when fair allowance is made for altered times and manners, his programme differs but little, in plan and purpose, from the plan and purpose of the modern novel. There are, indeed, but two characteristics in which he has not always been imitated by later practitioners of the art. In the first place, he writes, in general, most excellent, unlaboured English-simple and clear and strong-the English of a gentleman and a Secondly, it is his peculiarity to scholar. introduce each fresh division of his book by an initial chapter (probably suggested by the Chorus of Greek drama), in which, in his own person, he gossips pleasantly about his method and his characters. To his admirers these prolegomena, one of which is printed at page 345, are the most delightful part of his work. But they are practically confined to Tom Jones, as they are only partially employed in Joseph Andrews, and in Amelia not at all.

Fielding more than once refers to the pains he had taken in composing these prefatory chapters. Like Richardson, he professed also to foresee that he was inaugurating a 'new Province of Writing;' and it must be admitted that he has no real rival in his own line until the days of Waverley. But he had more than one contemporary of genius. Lady Mary Wortley Montagu, indeed, thought, upon its first anonymous appearance, that Smollett's Roderick Random was written by her clever kinsman-a supposition which proves her ladyship to have been a better judge of merit than of style. would be hard to compare, say, the visit to Parson Trulliber (see p. 342) with any page of Roderick Random and fail to see that they are from different pens. But Smollett's three best novels abound with incident and character, however grotesque; and he deserves the credit of being the first, since Congreve, to depict the British seaman, a task for which his own experiences as a ship's surgeon in the Carthagena expedition had given him exceptional facilities. In Humphry Clinker, too, he contrived to write a novel in letters which (without any appreciable plot) is amusing from beginning to end; but then he cleverly avoids the tedium of the plan by never having his epistles answered. His method in fiction, however, is the method of Le Sage, and so far retrograde; but his racy, if reckless, genius has given him many successors. Sterne, again, with his two great books, would add distinction to any epoch. But the Sternesque humour stands by itself, defying the imitator and the disciple alike. He is alone, and he has no school. Uncle Toby' and Yorick, Mr Shandy and Corporal Trim, have passed into the national 'study of imagination;' but the genius of the author, vacillating between tears and laughter, between sentiment and sheer polissonnerie, between method and madness (the word must out), is too unique and several a thing to influence the production of any writer not correspondingly endowed by nature. To write a Tristram Shandy or a Sentimental Journey there is no way but to be Sterne; and Sternes are not turned out in bakers' batches. Of other novels of the period which owe their existence to the fashion set by Fielding and Richardson, although they are too strongly marked by thei writers' individuality to resemble them, ar Goldsmith's Vicar of Wakefield and Johnson' Rasselas. But Johnson's Rasselas is scarcely novel at all; it is an expanded Rambler, with out scheme or beginning, and derives its impormainly from its magisterial manner, and it resigned and lugubrious philosophy of life Goldsmith's exquisite little story has this pecul arity—it is at once both local and cosmopolitai Dr Primrose and his family are English types but at the same time they belong so completel to humanity at large that they can be tran ferred to any other country without sens of incongruity—that is, to any country when there is a recognised Church and the famil is an established institution. In the matte of plot the Vicar of Wakefield can scarcely t said to be constructed at all. Neither Gold smith nor Johnson, therefore, any more tha Sterne or Smollett, contributed greatly to th evolution of the Novel-form; and in this con nection, the Evelina and Cecilia of Mm D'Arblay, which did introduce variations i the matter of social portraiture - variation important enough to make their writer th admitted precursor of Jane Austen-must b held to lie more properly within the scope of the present summary.

But if to found a school be the surest te of novelty, such a triumph must certain be conceded to Horace Walpole's Castle o Otranto. In 1764 that accomplished virtuos after a prolonged flirtation with the painte windows and plaster battlements of Strawbern Hill, dreamed that, on the uppermost bar nister of a great staircase, he saw a gigant: hand in armour, and straightway fell to scribb. a story on the subject. He began (and ended without a plan; but discovered (in his secon edition) that he had combined the old supe natural agencies of Scudéry and the rest wit the new personages of Tom Jones and real life and, in other words, had invented Goth romance. 'The actions, sentiments, convers tions, of the heroes and heroines of ancier days,' he declared, 'were as unnatural as th machines employed to put them in motion He would make his heroes and heroines natura in all these things, borrowing only from th elder school some of the imagination, invention and fancy which, in the literal reproduction of life, he thought too much neglected. blend proved a popular one. To the Casi of Otranto, with its sighing portraits, an cowled skeletons, and monstrous helmets, followed, a few years later, the Old English Baron of Miss Clara Reeve, who made her marvels slightly more credible, an innovation which Walpole, perhaps not unnaturally, regarded as insipid. After Miss Reeve came the greater Mrs Radcliffe, and the closing century 'supp'd full with horrors.' Clanging portals, echoing corridors, hollow voices, haunted chambers, moth-eaten manuscripts, and daggers that dripped blood became the order of the day. To make the Gothic compound more heady, the tear of sensibility was freely mingled with the goblet, and the sophisticated draught held the drugged public captive until the secret was explained, generally-and in this Mrs Radcliffe, too, differed from Walpole—by simple and natural causes. A quiet home-keeping lady, who described Switzerland and Italy without visiting those countries, Ann Radcliffe must have possessed considerable powers of imagination, and certainly moves a terror skilfully. The influence of The Italian and The Mysteries of Udolpho is to be traced in Lewis, Maturin, and others, and even in the great Wizard of the North As might be anticipated, Gothic romance did not escape the satirist. It was broadly burlesqued in the Heroine of E. S. Barrett, and, with a finer touch, in the admirable Northanger Abbey of Jane Austen, which, although not published until 1818, had been actually written very soon after the first appearance of The Italian.

The Novel, as the chief gift of the Eighteenth Century to English letters, has, of necessity, occupied exceptional space; and, for its further modification under the pens of Holcroft and Godwin, Henry Mackenzie and Moore, the reader must be referred to the different accounts of those writers. We may .now turn to another development of the plainsailing, prosaic spirit, which, through all its permutations, remains the leading characteristic of the epoch. Hitherto History in England had been little but chronicle and compilation, uncritical and unscientific. In the Eighteenth Century, however, there arose three writers who raised it at once to a definite art. The first of these, in point of time, was Hume. research, as we understand it now, he cared but little. But he gave to his History of England the charm of a sequent narrative and an effortless style which was as pleasant to read as a fairy-tale. After Hume comes Robertson with histories of Scotland, of Charles V., of America, a writer whose style was almost equal to that of his predecessor, and whose standard of investigation was somewhat higher. But both Hume and Robertson are only pioneers of the greater Gibbon. The History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, with its majestic march, its splendid sonority, and its sustained accomplishment, rises far beyond the flight of either, and perhaps even now constitutes the greatest gift of Clio to our literature. Patient inquiry, insight, breadth of view, and minuteness of detail are all united in this twenty years' labour. It was a new thing when it appeared; it is a new thing still: and it is not easy to conceive that a labour so concentrated and so continuous, so sustained and so single-minded, can fail of length of days.

From the history of a people to the history of one person, whether recounted by himself or by another, the transition is easy. That the Eighteenth Century can claim to have originated any particular form of Biography or Autobiography, in the sense that it can claim to have originated the modern Novel or the modern Essay, would be too much to contend. But that, in an age of prose, biographies and memoirs should abound is not surprising; and, from Anne onwards, they were not to seek. There were short biographies such as Goldsmith's Nash and Johnson's Savage,-to say nothing of the admirable Lives of the Poets; there were lengthy biographies such as Hawkesworth's Swift and Hawkins's Johnson; there were respectable and academic performances such as Middleton's Cicero, Carte's Ormonde, Lyttelton's Henry II., and Harte's ill-fated Gustavus Adolphus; there were also personal records as dissimilar as Cibber's Apology and Hume's account of My Own Life. But in the last decade of the century appeared two works, each of which, in its special kind, remains unrivalled. One is Gibbon's Autobiography, as compiled by his friend Lord Sheffield from the different sketches left by the historian, and since (1896) separately published. The version which has been so long familiar will, however, probably retain its charm, in spite of the editing to which it now appears to have been subjected; and what its writer calls 'the review of his moral and literary character,' although incomplete, must survive many memoirs that are professedly finished from headline to imprint. Nothing can be more interesting than Gibbon's account of the circumstances which moulded his career and determined the course and progress of his magnum opus. The other work referred to, which preceded the Autobiography by a few years, is Boswell's Life of Johnson, which also remains typical in its class, since it is the highest praise of any new biography to bring it within measurable distance of Boswell's book. Yet it may be doubted whether, except under analogous conditions in regard to author and subject, its success could ever be exactly repeated. The peculiar relations of biographer and biographee; the strongly-marked individuality of Johnson and the extraordinary quality of his conversation; the mimetic faculty which enabled Boswell, given the heads or minutes of an interview, to reproduce that interview with a fidelity more characteristic than shorthand, just as selective Art is more convincing than the camera—all these things, combined with a patience, an enthusiasm, and a devotion that no obstacle could daunt, produced a result which, seeing that it is impracticable to reproduce it without similar advantages, must always remain sui generis.

_ In an age favourable to prose, and withal exceptionally leisured and unhurried, it is not surprising that what was somewhat pompously described as Epistolary Correspondence should be found to flourish. And, as a fact, the development of Letter Writing is one of the manifest features of the period. Not only Maids of Honour who could spell,-to vary Swift's jibe,-but Maids of Honour who could not, resorted freely to this means of communication; and before Swift was an old man he recorded a considerable advance. 'The ladies in general,' he told Mrs Delany, were 'extremely mended both in writing and reading since he was young;' and he goes on to speak of a woman of quality, formerly his correspondent, who 'scrawled and spelt like a Wapping wench.' Hardly a month now passes by without some testimony in the shape of Diary or Miscellaneous Correspondence (the recent Francis Letters are an excellent case in point) to the activity with which our ancestors plied their pens under Anne and the Georges -an activity which modern appliances and modern manners have long since diverted into different channels. And if the Old-World in general was given to letter writing, literary men and women were also given to it. Swift himself, in the diary to Esther Johnson, commonly known as the Journal i to Stella, has left a series of utterances whic remain, and must remain, unapproached a examples of the chronique intime. Pope, to has a goodly budget of epistles; but they are in general, too artificial, and too obvious arranged for the public eye, to serve as model Goldsmith's legacy, on the other hand, is to slender, since the few examples which hav been preserved have all the simple charm an fluency of his other work. Steele, Gray, John son, Sterne, Burke, Gibbon, and many mino authors, all wrote voluminously—the letters of Gray and Sterne especially being hall-market with their particular idiosyncrasies. epistolary reputation clings chiefly to one o two authors, who, like Madame de Sevigné either did nothing but write letters, or at a events did that best. One of the first of thes is Lady Mary Wortley Montagu, whose dis patches from abroad reveal not only her ow shrewd impressions of travel, but her absolutel honest and unvarnished views of contemporar society and literature as she knew then Another who is best remembered by his letter The curious strand of is Lord Chesterfield. moral insensibility which runs through ther has seriously prejudiced their other merits, for apart from this, and the fact that their mai doctrine is the converse of Esse quam vider. they are everywhere packed with a very variecriticism of life, and a close, if cynical, ol servation of human nature. After these, an ranging over sixty years of the century, come the correspondence of Horace Walpole. Chesterfield dictates the conduct of life, Walpol exhibits the practice of it. Never was there wittier, a more vivacious, a more amusing, more original chronicler; never (as Thackera says) 'such a brilliant, jigging, smirking Vanity Fair as that through which he leads us Lastly must be mentioned the admirable, an in some respects more admirable, letters c Cowper, the most natural, most unfeigned most easy of English letter-writers. art of shedding a sedate playfulness over th least promising themes, in magnifying th occurrences of his 'set gray life' into incident worthy of record, in communicating to hi page all the variations of mood that swee across him as he writes, he has no equal. Bu these qualities will doubtless be treated a large hereafter, and it is time to turn onc more to the poets.

It was in the year 1764—the year whe Walpole wrote the Castle of Otranto—the Gibbon had planned his Decline and Fall, and it was not until 1788 that the last three of its eight volumes made their appearance. By that time Pope had been dead for more than fourand-forty years. His influence was still felt, and continued to be felt; but it was an influence that was gradually expending itself, while, side by side with it, other influences were gathering strength and volume. Slowly and almost imperceptibly at first, men were beginning to discard the gradus-epithet and the formal phrase, to substitute blank verse for the machine-made heroic couplet, to exercise themselves tentatively in older and long-neglected stanzaic forms, to write Odes and Elegies and Sonnets, and above all to exhibit an enfranchised proclivity towards romantic expression and the imitation of nature. That this was done systematically or all at once is not to be advanced. .. But that it existed is manifest from the attitude of such of those conservatives in poetry as still clung to the practice and teaching of Pope. In Goldsmith's first book, the Enquiry into the Present State of Polite Learning in Europe, he is found condemning blank verse as a 'disagreeable instance of pedantry,' and as a measure which 'nothing but the greatest sublimity of subject can render pleasing.' In the Dedication to the Traveller, he returns to the charge. The art of poetry, he says, is in danger from 'the mistaken efforts of the learned to improve it.' 'What criticisms have we not heard of late in favour of blank verse, and Pindaric odes, choruses, anapests, and iambics, alliterative care and happy negligence!' Elsewhere he falls foul of the fashion set by Gray's Elgy, which he regarded as 'overloaded with epithet,' and seriously proposed to amend by 'leaving out an idle word in every line;' while of Pope he writes that he 'carried the language to its highest perfection; and those who have attempted still further to improve it, instead of ornament, have only caught finery.' These last lines were written in 1764, and it is clear that, in the opinion of the author of the Traveller, which appeared in the same year, a considerable change had already come over the spirit of English poetry since Pope's death.

The change, in reality, had begun before that date, with the solemn-paced blank verse—then second only to that of Milton—and with the accurate nature-painting of Thomson's Seasons, and his revival in the Castle of Indolence of the Spenserian Stanza. After Thomson comes

Young, who, beginning as a Popesque satirist, proceeded, long after middle age, as the unrhyming author of those sombre and declamatory Night Thoughts which at once reflected and dominated the brooding unrest of the age. To Thomson followed the 'oaten stop' and 'pastoral song' of Collins, whose Persian Eclogues and Odes, with their clear-toned and varied music, brought new harmonies into English metre—harmonies which were farther elaborated by the patient art of Gray's undying Elegy and his wonderful Pindaric Odes. These-since the lesser names may be here omitted—were, save for the spasmodic outbreak of post-Popian satire in the hectoring couplets of Churchill's Rosciad, the dominant influences in English poetry until the date of Goldsmith's Traveller, which (like his later Deserted Village) was in the old manner, reflected through a medium more modern than its author imagined. Then, stirring men's minds with portentous cloud-form and shadowy suggestion, came the mysterious utterances of Macpherson's Ossian; to be succeeded by those Reliques of Percy, which opened to English poetry so much of unlessoned art and primitive simplicity; by the mediæval forgeries of Chatterton; and by the revelation, in Warton's History, of the neglected riches hidden in the barbaric and half-lit past which lay behind Dryden. All these things, with their searchings and unveilings, were 'prologue to the omen coming on,' and 'harbingers preceding still the fates' of that splendid advent, with the approaching century, of the new-risen spirit of Romance. There were still writers, the Whiteheads and Hayleys and Sewards and Darwins, who clung feebly and ineffectually to the passing classic fashion; but of those who fill worthily the space between the epoch-making Ossian of 1763 and the still more epoch-making Lyrical Ballads of 1798, the greatest names are Cowper and Burns and Crabbe and Blake. The first two belonged to the Eighteenth Century as defined at the outset of this paper; the last two far outlived Owing nothing to each other, distinct in gifts and speech, and having only in common their poetical sincerity, it is sufficient to say of them here that Cowper and Crabbe, more or less, but in a manner coloured strongly by an altered environment, preserved the old tradition, while Blake and Burns are too original and individual to be discussed except with that larger treatment which they will hereafter receive in this volume. But those who wish to estimate the immense distance between 1700 and 1800, measured poetically, will do well to contrast a passage of the Essay on Criticism with such a lyric as Robert Burns's 'O, my luve's like a red, red rose,' or the 'Tiger, Tiger burning bright' of William Blake.

Turning to the Drama of the time, it must be Aconfessed that the field is not a rich one, either for crop or diversity of product. When Anne came to the throne, the Comic Dramatists of the Restoration, as Macaulay styles them, were reduced to two. Wycherley had ceased to write for the stage; Congreve's last play, The Way of the World, had been played; and Vanbrugh and Farquhar were the only members of the group who were still in practice as playwrights. For many years to come their successors were only minor artists. Steele, in two or three average comedies, endeavoured honestly to purify the theatre in the sense of the precepts of Jeremy Collier, while Lillo, in George Barnwell and the Fatal Curiosity, seemed to promise a something which was not afterwards performed. Fielding maintained the Congreve tradition in its indecency only; and Cibber, Garrick, Macklin, Murphy, the elder Colman, Hoadly, Foote, and a number of lesser writers, purveyed the acted but now unreadable comedies and farces of the day. The chief novelties in stage composition which the Eighteenth Century contributed to dramatic art were the already->mentioned Ballad-opera of Gay and his imita->tors; and the semi-serious genre, which, based upon the comédie larmoyante of Voltaire and Diderot in France, became, for a brief season, the Sentimental Comedy of England. latter, which has been not inaptly described as a 'mulish production, with all the defects of its opposite parents, and marked with sterility,' professed to deal with the virtues and distresses of private life rather than with the vices and faults which had hitherto been regarded as the legitimate quarry of the Comic Muse. Cumberland's West Indian and Kelly's False Delicacy are the most successful examples in this short-lived kind. Then, as a protest against the Comedy of Tears, and in avowed imitation of 'the poets of the last age,' Goldsmith endeavoured to lead the public taste once more back to Nature and Humour. He followed up his Good Natur'd Man by his inimitable She Stoops to Conquer, to whose perennial qualities in vis comica, dialogue, plot, and character its stage popularity even to this hour abundantly testifies. His only competitor is Sheridan, whose three best plays, The Rivals, The School for Scandal, and The Critic, by their unflagging wit and brilliancy, reach a point of excellence which has never since been attained.

For nearly forty years after the Guardian of 1713, at which date we interrupted our account of the Essay, no successor of any importance assumed the mantle of Addison and Steele. Imitators there were in plenty; but, with the exception of the Champion of Fielding, more memorable by its author than its matter, none deserves a record until we reach the Rambler and Idler of Johnson. But even the Rambler and Idler, vigorous and weighty as is their writer's style, follow the Queen Anne model 'as a pack horse would do a hunter'—to use Lady Mary's illustration; and the same must be said of the Adventurer of Johnson's disciple, Hawkesworth. In the World and the Connoisseur, where the touch was lighter, and the pens those of wits like Walpole and Chesterfield, the Essay regained a certain buoyancy and verve. But the high-water mark of the midcentury examples in this species of writing is reached by Goldsmith's Citizen of the World, which, in its first form, appeared in the columns of Newbery's Public Ledger. Aftei this, there is nothing which deserves serious The mention of the Public Ledger, however, serves to remind us once more of the extraordinary increase which, in spite of prohibitive stamp-duties and other ob stacles, had taken place in the periodical press since the first establishment of the Daily Courant in 1702. In 1756 began the London Chronicle, that-folio of four pages, happy work, Which not e'en critics criticise—and for which Johnson wrote the 'Introduction (at about twopence a line); in 1760 the Public Ledger. In 1772 followed the Mornin; Post; in 1788, the Times; and these were a few only of the daily papers. Another fruit ful feature of Journalism was the Monthly Magazine, which, from the issue by Edward Cave in January 1731 of the first number o the Gentleman's Magazine; or, Monthly Intells gencer, grew and flourished vigorously to the end of the century. Mr Urban's purpose according to the preface to his first volume was 'to give Monthly a View of all the Piece of Wit, Humour, or Intelligence, daily offer's to the Publick in the News-Papers' (of which he estimates that 'no less than 200 Half-sheet per Month are thrown from the Press only in London'), and 'to join therewith some other Matters of Use or Amusement that will be communicated to us.' Besides this, his titlepage professes to record the 'most remarkable Transactions and Events, Foreign and Domestick,' the 'Births, Marriages, Deaths, Promotions, and Bankrupts,' the Prices of Goods and Stock, the Bills of Mortality, and a Register of Books. Most of the Magazines which followed, the London, the Scots, the Royal, the Literary, the Court, the Lady's, the Universal, the British, the Town and Country, the European, &c., were after the same model, varied more or less by 'Maps of the War,' 'Accurate Plans of Fortifications,' 'Prospects' of localities.

> pictures taken from the life Where all proportions are at strife, of 'Beasts just landed in the Tower,' problems by Philomath, Crambos and Rebuses, heads of Celebrities 'curiously engraved in Copper,' new country Dances, and the last Vauxhall or Ranelagh songs 'with the Musick.' In addition to these there were the Monthly and Critical Reviews, dealing exclusively, and not, on the whole, inadequately, with current literature. Lastly, dating from 1758, comes the Annual Register, planned by Edmund Burke, by whom it was at first wholly composed, though it was eventually continued by other hands.

In concluding the foregoing summary of certain of the more obvious characteristics of Eighteenth Century Literature, it is perhaps necessary to remind the reader of the limitations indicated in its opening paragraphs. there proposed only to treat of those new developments in literary expression which could fairly be claimed as originating in the period. With very slight deviation, this intention has been adhered to. Had a survey of the general literary product been proposed, it would have been necessary to say something, and even much, of Burke and Eloquence, of Philosophy and Berkeley, of Butler and Theology,-to say nothing of other themes and writers. But these things, besides involving the needless anticipation of much which must naturally form part of the pages that follow, would only have served to perplex the very explicit and definitely restricted function of this paper.

AUSTIN DOBSON.

The Revolution Period and After.

Revolutions in politics are not necessarily attended by revolutions in literature, since the development of art is largely independent of the conditions created by a change in the constitution of the State. The character and genius of a people, their social habits and ideals, and also the influence of the existing models and traditions of art, are much more potent factors in literary evolution than any mere alteration of their government, however radical or conspicuous. Especially must it be so when the revolution, like that of 1688 in England, is one that causes no disturbance of the national modes of life. The overthrow of the monarchy under Charles I., accompanied as it was by civil war, by a change of religion and of moral régime, and by the proscription of a whole party with all its fashions and ideals, could not fail to have very serious results in the domain of art, simply because it was so much more than a political revolution. The theatre was suppressed; the lighter poetry was discouraged; men's thoughts were turned to controversy and edification; and so for a decade our literature was an affair mainly of pamphlets and of sermons. Even Milton had to leave his song of Paradise until the reign of roisterers succeeded the reign of saints. But the Revolution of 1688 was marked by no proscription, and, in England at least, was unstained by civil war. There were no fines nor sequestrations, no puritanic justices nor domineering major-generals. The bishop sat safe in his palace, the Tory squire in his hall; the ritual of Laud was maintained in the parish churches, and the fellows of Oxford and Cambridge knew no change save that they were now protected from the intrusion of Papist colleagues. The court was still brilliant at Whitehall—more decorous, certainly, and very much duller than in the Merry Monarch's days, but still the court of an English king, or at least an English queen. At the theatre Mr Pepys might still enjoy the plays of Etherege and Wycherley, and the wits and templars still gathered round the chair of Dryden at Will's.

Under these conditions it was natural that the history of imaginative literature under William III. should show merely a lingering decline of the development which had marked former decades. Until after the opening of the new century we have to do mainly with the old men, or at least the old forms of art. Dryden remains the great central figure, and indeed it is only in this period, after his dismissal from the laureateship and the decay of his worldly prosperity, that he attains his acknowledged place as the first dictator of English letters. Much of the best of his poetical work -the translation of Virgil, Alexander's Feast, and the Fables—as well as five of his plays, was produced after the Revolution. plays are generally grouped among examples of the 'Restoration drama,' and this classification of them, as well as of the other plays of the same period, is accurate enough so far as concerns their intrinsic character. Yet it is noteworthy that much of the Restoration drama is really post-Revolution in its date. All the plays of Congreve and Vanbrugh were produced after 1689, and so were many of Southerne's and Shadwell's, while Farquhar came still later, and did his best work in the days of Queen Anne. Yet it was all essentially a bequest of the Restoration period, and, in spite of its brilliance, the drama after the Revolution was really on the decline. Doubtless it suffered from the loss of court patronage, and the substitution of an alien monarch, who cared nothing about literature, for a race of artistic amateurs like the Stuarts. Its grossness also grew offensive to the taste of the nation, or rather of the town, which was slowly recovering from the Restoration debauch. Jeremy Collier's famous Short View (1697) has been often regarded as the death-blow of the later Stuart drama; but in truth it was rather a sign of the prevalent tendency than itself that tendency's

The poetry of the age, however, bore far more evident marks of decline than its drama. The veteran Dryden, as has been said, was the solitary great poet, and the only hopeful new man was Matthew Prior, who followed up his clever parody of the Hind and the Panther with occasional verses like those on the death of Queen Mary and the recapture of Namur. Shadwell and Nahum Tate were the laureates, and Sir Richard Blackmore, the court physician, began to dose the public with the first of his six slumbrous epics in 1695. Garth's Dispensary appeared in 1699. Pope all the while was a child in his father's home in London, and Addison was writing negligible trifles at Oxford, with a whole decade and more between him and the Campaign. Nothing foreshadowed the Augustan age. Never perhaps in all our history have the prospects of English poetry been darker than in the interval when Dryden was making way for Pope.

The attention of Englishmen, indeed, was given to other things than pure literature in the years when the British Constitution and the Protestant Succession were first on their The discussion of the problems involved in the settlement of Church and State necessarily produced a shoal of tracts and pamphlets, which seldom rose to the level or literature, and have left us nothing of per manent interest save the treatises on Tolera tion and Government (1689-92) by Locke The questions of toleration and comprehen sion exercised the pens of the clergy, as also did the Nonjuring schism, which had as one of its consequences the keen Trinitarian con troversy (1692) between Sherlock and South These two divines, along with Stillingfleet Tillotson, Patrick, and others, are to be numbered among the ornaments of the Revolution Church; but in reality the grea days of the Anglican pulpit were over. The old questions were becoming exhausted; the polemic battle with Rome was virtually fough out; and it is significant of the drift of the time that the reign of William saw the appearance of Toland (1696) and Tindal and the beginning of that 'Deistical' move ment which was to be so potent, in one development or another, in the next century Significant is it, too, that the one great philo sophical work of the time, Locke's Essay on th Human Understanding (1690), is held to marl the starting-point of that century's characteristic speculation. The national mind, indeed, wa beginning to transcend those speculative limit which had been imposed by the great conflic between Romanism and Protestantism a cen tury and a half before. The inevitable result of the civil and religious struggle of the las sixty years were beginning to be felt. Some thing like a foreshadowing of the 'Broad Church' movement is seen in the career and work of Gilbert Burnet, who, however, did bette service by his History of his Own Time than b his narrative of the Reformation in England c his exposition of the Thirty-nine Articles.

the Revolution acted most powerfully upon our literature was the liberation of the press. The lapse of the licensing laws in 1695 marks the real birth of English journalism and periodical Within a few months after that event a whole host of newspapers had been started in London-the English Courant, the London Newsletter, the Post, the Postboy, the Postman-all those obscure and meagre sheets which are now remembered only through the mention of them in the pages of Addison and Steele. To the new freedom of the press these writers themselves owed their great opportunity, for doubtless it would have been impossible under the harassing and uncertain limitations of a censorship to produce a Tatler or a Spectator-at least with the delightful ease and spontaneity which are the very life and charm of the English periodical essay.

That, however, was still a thing of the future, and for some time the effect of a free press was felt mainly in the growth of pamphleteering and the enlargement of its scope. The pamphlet still continued to be the chief instrument of popular appeal, and one of the greatest of English pamphleteers, Daniel Defoe, began his career in the decade after the Revolution. But neither his work, nor indeed the bulk of the so-called Augustan literature, can be understood without taking account of another factor introduced by the Revolutionthe development of the system of government Parties, indeed, had existed in England since 1641, and had obtained their names of Whig and Tory in 1679; but it was only with the formation of the Whig Junto pabout 1694 that the system was fairly organised. The effect on literature was momentous, for thenceforth during more than a century our prose, and even our poetry, continued to be written mainly on party lines. The writers of Queen Anne's time attached themselves to one party or the other, supporting it not only in their acknowledged writings, but also by anonymous pamphleteering. Swift became the best champion and almost the literary 'handy man' of the Tories; Addison and Steele fought the battle for the Whigs. At the production of Cato in 1713 both sides mustered as at a political demonstration, and the speeches of Syphax and Sempronius were cheered alternately like hits in an election More than this, the party system had important effects on the patronage of literature and the social position of literary men. Some pamphleteers, no doubt, like Defoe, were mere understrappers and secretservice men; but the better and more respectable writers got honourable posts, and were even welcomed to friendship by the chiefs of the State. The intimacy of Bolingbroke and Oxford with Pope, Swift, and Arbuthnot served to dignify and enrich our literature hardly less than the friendship of Mæcenas and Horace adorned and exalted the literature of Rome. As for the more material aspects of party patronage, it needs but to recall part of the catalogue in one of Macaulay's essays: 'Congreve, when he had scarcely attained his majority, was rewarded for his first comedy with places which made him independent for life. . . . Locke was Commissioner of Appeals and of the Board of Trade. Newton was Master of the Mint. Stepney and Prior were employed in embassies of high dignity and importance. . . . Steele was a Commissioner of Stamps and a Member of Parliament. Arthur Mainwaring was a Commissioner of the Customs and auditor of the imprest. Tickell was secretary to the Lords Justices of Ireland. Addison was Secretary of State.'

Much of this, no doubt, was a late fruit of the Revolution; yet it was none the less a genuine product of that event-of the development of party which it occasioned, and of the transfer of power from the sovereign to the ministry which it brought about. Patronage, of course, there had been for long before, and the Stuarts were perhaps more intelligent patrons of letters than any of their successors on the throne. But it was assuredly a good thing for literature that its votaries had to turn from the galleries of Whitehall to the offices of the Lord High Treasurer and the Secretary of State. It may be more flattering, but it is far less salutary, to be patronised by a king than by his primeminister. To the former one can be but a servant; with the latter it is possible to be almost an equal and quite a friend. needs but to contrast the position of Dryden, the laureate of Charles II. and the butt of Rochester and Buckingham, with that of Swift and Pope, the friends of Harley and St John.

Another effect of the Revolution upon our literature is found in the check which it gave to the influence of France. The royal master and patron of Boileau, formerly our ally and our paymaster, was now to be our enemy, with a short interval of peace, for more than twenty years; and such a cessation of intercourse with what was then the great centre of literary influence in Europe could not be without its results. No gay Grammonts or Saint Evremonds were now seen at the court of Whitehall; the Frenchmen who came hither were Protestant refugees, driven forth by the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes. One of them, Motteux, completed Urquhart's translation of Rabelais; another, Rapin de Thoyras, wrote in his own language a history of England, which afterwards became for Englishmen the standard work on the subject until the days of David Hume. The result of these changed conditions was doubtless to leave our literature more to its own native and insular development, to throw poets like Pope more exclusively upon Spenser and Cowley and Dryden for models, and to foster the development of the simple idiomatic prose of Defoe and Swift. French influence, however—and nearly all for good—is discernible in the essays of Temple (1690-93) and in the later work of Bolingbroke, where, however, there is still more conspicuous evidence of the growing power of political oratory as a factor in prose style. As parliamentary debate, with the introduction of constitutionalism, became more important, the art of it was naturally studied with greater care; while the widening of the audience which had to be appealed to in pamphleteering combined with the gradual spread of rationalism to favour a more curt and familiar and less pedantic style than that which, in the hands of Hooker and Milton and Taylor, had been developed in the pulpit and the college. These probably are the main causes of the steady improvement made at this time in the writing of English prose.

To French influence, we must add, the Revolution period owed its one great literary controversy, for the battle of Boyle and Bentley (1696-99) over the Letters of Phalaris was one of the sequels of the dispute about the ancients and moderns between Perrault and Boileau and Fontenelle (1688-94). Started at first by Temple's unlucky essay, the fray is memorable mainly for having given Swift the subject of one of his earliest satires, and for establishing the fame of the greatest of English scholars. Richard Bentley's is one of the three or four great names which belong peculiarly to the age of the Revolution, or which, in other words, have won distinction by achievement that belong to the last ten or twelve year of the seventeenth century. The others an Locke, Congreve, and Newton—the last by far the greatest of all, although it belong largely to a domain that is excluded by th strict bounds of English literature, and ever of the English language. The Revolution ag is indeed more notable on the scientific sid than on the literary, and one can discern in the progress of that movement which had bee begun five-and-twenty years before by the for mation of the Royal Society-not only in th work of men like Ray, the naturalist, an Hooke, the physicist, but also in the fantasti speculations of Dr Thomas Burnet concerning the origin and ultimate fate of the earth.

The literary condition of England at the en of the seventeenth century cannot be unde stood without a knowledge of the very imperfer dissemination of books, and the other difficultie in the way of reading. John Locke was born at Wrington, Somerset, 29th August 1632, son of a country attorney, and from Westmaster School passed to Christ Church College, Oxford, where he became lecturer on Greek and on thetoric. He soon became disgusted with the verbal subtleties of the Aristotelian and scholastic philosophy; and experiments in medicine show his best towards the inductive interpretation of nature. In 1665 he went as secretary with Sir Walter Vane, envoy to the Elector of Brandenburg during the Dutch war: some lively and interestmg letters written by him from Germany on this occason were published by Lord King in 1829. Those who are acquainted with Locke only in the character of a grave philosopher will be surprised to find him giving to a friend at home a quite humorous description (quoted below) of some Christmas ceremonies witnessed by him in a church at Cleves.

ment in the Irish Church if he should think fit to take orders. This, after due consideration, he dethred. 'A man's affairs and whole course of his life, says he in a letter to the friend who made the Proposal to him, 'are not to be changed in a moment, and one is not made fit for a calling, and that in a day. I believe you think me too proud to undertake anything wherein I should acquit myself but unworthily. I am sure I cannot content myself with being undermost, possibly the middlemost, of my profession; and you will allow, on consideration, care is to be taken not to engage in a calling wherein, if one chance to be a bungler, there is no reneal.

In 1666 he was in a kind of amateur medical Plactice at Oxford, though he never took a degree in medicine. Problems of society, Church and State, and, above all, toleration largely exercised him. He became acquainted with Lord Ashley, afterwards Earl of Shaftesbury; and so valuable did his lordship find the medical advice and general conversation of the philosopher, that a close and permanent friendship sprang up between them, and Locke became an inmate of the Earl's house. This brought him into the society of Sheffield. Duke of Buckingham, the Earl of Halifax, and other celebrated wits of the time. While residing with Lord Ashley, Locke superintended the education first of his son, and subsequently of his grand-

The liberal opinions which it maintained were controverted by an Oxford writer, in reply to whom Locke succes-Asively wrote three additional Letters. In 1690 was published the work by which he is best known, An Essay concerning Human Understanding. On this treatise he had been engaged for eighteen years; its origin he explained in the Prefatory Epistle to the Reader: 'Were it fit to trouble thee with the history of this Essay, I should tell thee that five or six friends meeting at my chamber [at Oxford in 1670-71], and discoursing on a subject very remote from this, found themselves quickly at a stand by the difficulties that rose on every side. After we had a while puzzled ourselves, without coming any nearer a resolution of those doubts which perplexed us, it came into my thoughts, that we took a wrong course, and that, before we set ourselves upon inquiries of that nature, it was necessary to examine our own abilities, and see what objects our understandings were, or were not, fitted to deal with. This I proposed to the company, who all readily assented.' In proceeding to treat of the subject originally proposed, he found this matter increase upon his hands, and was gradually led into other fields of investigation. In the I first book of his Essay Locke treats of innate ideas. He denies altogether the doctrine of innate ideas or conscious principles in the mind: 'God having endued man with those faculties of knowing which he hath, was no more obliged by His goodness to implant those innate notions in his mind, than that having given him reason, hands, and materials, He should build him bridges or houses.' >Knowledge must be a gradual growth dependent on fallible experience. All our ideas, the most complex as well as the simplest, refer to data presented through the senses or to operations of the mind which have been made the objects of reflection. And he argues that the idea or sense of a God is so manifest from the visible marks of wisdom and power in creation, that no rational creature could, on reflection, miss the discovery of In the second book Locke follows up a Deity. this principle or position by tracing the origin of our ideas, simple and complex, which he derives I from sensation and reflection. The third book of the Essay is on language and signs as instruments of truth; and the fourth book is intended to determine the nature, validity, and limits of the understanding. In virtue of his Essay Locke ranks as father of the English empirical philosophy, and his influence was dominant in England till Kant's work became known. He profoundly influenced French thought in the next century; although he would have strenuously repudiated and refuted the French development of sensationalism into materialism. Berkeley and Hume were in different ways continuators of Locke's mode of thought. In 1690 Locke published two Treatises on Civil Government, in defence of the principles of the Revolution against the Tories; or, as he expresses himself, 'to establish the throne of our great restorer, our present King William; to make good his title in the consent of the people, which, being the only one of all lawful governments, he has more fully and clearly than any prince in Christendom; and to justify to the world the people of England, whose love of their just and natural rights, with their resolution to preserve them, saved the nation when it was on the very brink of slavery and ruin.' The chief of his other writings are his very suggestive Thoughts concerning Education (1693); an admirable tract On the Conduct of the Understanding, printed after the author's death; The Reasonableness of Christianity (1695), and two Vindications of that work, which was held to verge on deism (1696). He conducted a keen controversy with Stillingfleet, who had annoyed him by identifying his theological position with that of Toland and the Deists—to whom, in point of fact, he had decided affinities. For Locke, and many of the best minds of the time, it seemed essential that religion should be rational, regulated by common-sense and the evidences on which it is based; enthusiasm and fanaticism had had their day, and must make way for the age of reason. Locke is a conspicuous representation of the trend of English thought in the second half of the seventeenth century towards common-sense philosophy and scientific research His name and those of Boyle, Newton, Flamsteed Halley, Willis, Sydenham, Ray, the vegetable physiologist Grew, and the geologist Woodward show that 'Restoration literature,' specifically sc called, was but one form of the reaction agains the one-sidedness of the Puritan outlook on life and the world. Immediately after the Revolution employmen

Immediately after the Revolution employmen in the diplomatic service was offered to Locke, who declined it on the ground of ill-health. In 1695 having aided Government with his advice on the subject of the coinage, he was appointed a member of the new Council of Trade, an office the state of his health also obliged him to resign in 1700. He wrote also on Ireland and the poor-laws; and he was a Fellow of the Royal Society. The last year of his life, from 1691 on, were mainly spent a Oates in Essex, the seat of Sir Francis Masham who had invited him to make that mansion his home. His friend Lady Masham, a daughter of Dr Cudworth, soothed by her attention the infirmities of his declining years. Locke died 28th October 1704.

Locke's character, like his philosophy, wa

marked by caution, by adherence to experience and submission to facts, by suspicion alike of abstract speculation and mystical enthusiasm, and by calm reasonableness. His philosophy was sensible and rational rather than profound or original; it does not permanently satisfy the demands of the inquiring spirit; it is a philosophy of compromise, and is not sufficiently compact, systematic, and thorough-going to hold its own against the criticism of the Kantians. The style of the Essay, like the philosophy it expounds, is plain and straightforward, is occasionally colloquial, but on the whole is decidedly monotonous. Locke, who meant his books for general reading, hated scholastic jargon, and wrote in language intelligible to every man of commonsense. 'No one,' says his pupil, Shaftesbury (himself rather a superfine writer), 'has done more towards the recalling of philosophy from barbarity, into the use and practice of the world, and into the company of the better and politer sort, who might well be ashamed of it in its other dress.' In the non-philosophical writings, as in that on education and the political papers, there is more trenchancy, vigour, and variety.

Design of the Essay on the Human Understanding.

Since it is the understanding that sets man above the rest of sensible beings, and gives him all the advantage and dominion which he has over them, it is certainly a subject, even for its nobleness, worth our labour to enquire into. The understanding, like the eye, whilst it makes us see and perceive all other things, takes no notice of itself; and it requires art and pains to set it at a distance, and make it its own object. But whatever be the difficulties that lie in the way of this enquiry, whatever it be that keeps us so much in the dark to ourselves, sure I am that all the light we can let in upon our own minds, all the acquaintance we can make with our own understandings, will not only be very pleasant, but bring the great advantage, in directing our thoughts in the search of other things.

This, therefore, being my purpose, to enquire into the original, certainty, and extent of human knowledge; together with the grounds and degrees of belief, opinion, and assent; I shall not at present meddle with the Physical consideration of the mind, or trouble myself to examine wherein its essence consists, or by what motions of our spirits or alterations of our bodies we come to have any sensation by our organs, or any ideas in our understandings; and whether those ideas do in their formation, any or all of them, depend on matter or no: these are speculations which, however curious and entertaining, I shall decline as lying out of my way in the design I am now upon. It shall suffice to my present Purpose to consider the discerning faculties of a man as they are employed about the objects which they have to do with: and I shall imagine I have not wholly misemployed myself in the thoughts I shall have on this occasion, if in this historical, plain method I can give any account of the ways whereby our understandings come to attain those notions of things we have, and can set down any measures of the certainty of our knowledge, or the grounds of those persuasions which are to be found amongst men, so various, different, and wholly contradictory; and yet asserted somewhere or other with such assurance and confidence, that he that shall take a view of the opinions of mankind, observe their opposition, and at the same time consider the fondness and devotion wherewith they are embraced, the resolution and eagerness wherewith they are maintained, may perhaps have reason to suspect that either there is no such thing as truth at all, or that mankind hath no sufficient means to attain a certain knowledge of it. It is therefore worth while to search out the bounds between opinion and knowledge, and examine by what measures, in things whereof we have no certain knowledge, we ought to regulate our assent and moderate our persuasions. In order whereunto, I shall pursue this following method.

First, I shall enquire into the original of those ideas, notions, or whatever else you please to call them, which a man observes and is conscious to himself he has in his mind; and the ways whereby the understanding comes to be furnished with them. Secondly, I shall endeavour to shew what knowledge the understanding hath by those ideas; and the certainty, evidence, and extent of it. Thirdly, I shall make some enquiry into the nature and grounds of faith or opinion; whereby I mean that assent which we give to any proposition as true, of whose truth yet we have no certain knowledge: and here we shall have occasion to examine the reasons and degrees of assent.

If by this enquiry into the nature of the understanding I can discover the powers thereof; how far they reach; to what things they are in any degree proportionate; and where they fail us: I suppose it may be of use to prevail with the busy mind of man to be more cautious in meddling with things exceeding its comprehension; to stop when it is at the utmost extent of its tether; and to sit down in a quiet ignorance of those things which upon examination are found to be beyond the reach of our capacities. We should not then perhaps be so forward, out of an affectation of an universal knowledge, to raise questions and perplex ourselves and others with disputes about things to which our understandings are not suited, and of which we cannot frame in our minds any clear or distinct perceptions, or whereof (as it has perhaps too often happened) we have not any notions at all. If we can find out how far the understanding can extend its view, how far it has faculties to attain certainty, and in what cases it can only judge and guess, we may learn to content ourselves with what is attainable by us in this state. (From the Introduction to the Essay.)

Of Useless Reading.

Books and reading are looked upon to be the great helps of the understanding and instruments of knowledge, as it must be allowed that they are; and yet I beg leave to question whether these do not prove an hindrance to many, and keep several bookish men from attaining to solid and true knowledge. This I think I may be permitted to say, that there is no part wherein the understanding needs a more careful and wary conduct than in the use of books; without which they will prove rather innocent amusements than profitable employments of our time, and bring but small additions to our knowledge.

There is not seldom to be found even amongst those who aim at knowledge, who with an unwearied industry employ their whole time in books, who scarce allow themselves time to eat or sleep, but read, and read on, yet make no great advances in real knowledge, though there be no defect in their intellectual faculties, to which their little progress can be imputed. The mistake here is, that it is usually supposed that by reading the author's knowledge is transfused into the reader's understanding; and so it is, but not by bare reading, but by reading and understanding what he writ. Whereby I mean not barely comprehending what is affirmed or denied in each proposition (though that great readers do not always think themselves concerned precisely to do), but to see and follow the train of his reasonings, observe the strength and clearness of their connexion, and examine upon what they bottom. Without this a man may read the discourses of a very rational author, writ in a language and in propositions that he very well understands, and yet acquire not one jot of his knowledge; which consisting only in the perceived, certain, or probable connexion of the ideas made use of in his reasonings, the reader's knowledge is no farther increased than he perceives that; so much as he sees of this connexion, so much he knows of the truth or probability of that author's opinions.

All that he relies on without this perception he takes upon trust, upon the author's credit, without any knowledge of it at all. This makes me not at all wonder to see some men so abound in citations, and build so much upon authorities, it being the sole foundation on which they bottom most of their own tenets; so that in effect they have but a second-hand or implicit knowledge; i.e. are in the right, if such an one from whom they borrowed it were in the right in that opinion which they took from him; which indeed is no knowledge at all. Writers of this or former ages may be good witnesses of matter of fact which they deliver, which we may do well to take upon their authority; but their credit can go no farther than this; it cannot at all affect the truth and falsehood of opinions which have no other sort of trial but reason and proof, which they themselves made use of to make themselves knowing, and so must others too that will partake in their knowledge. (From the Conduct of the Understanding.)

On Hardening Children.

Give me leave therefore to advise you not to fence too carefully against the cold of this our climate: there are those in England who wear the same clothes winter and summer, and that without any inconvenience or more sense of cold than others find. But if the mother will needs have an allowance for frost and snow, for fear of harm; and the father, for fear of censure; be sure let not his winter-clothing be too warm: and amongst other things remember that when nature has so well covered his head with hair, and strengthened it with a year or two's age, that he can run about by day without a cap, it is best that by night a child should also lie without one; there being nothing that more exposes to head-ach, colds, catarrhs, coughs, and several other diseases, than keeping the head warm.

I have said "he' here, because the principal aim of my discourse is, how a young gentleman should be brought up from his infancy, which in all things will not so perfectly suit the education of daughters; though where the difference of sex requires different treatment, it will be no hard matter to distinguish.

I would also advise his feet to be washed every day in cold water; and to have his shoes so thin that they might leak and let in water whenever he comes near it.

Here I fear I shall have the mistress, and maids to against me. One will think it too filthy; and the other perhaps, too much pains to make clean his stocking But yet truth will have it that his health is much mor worth than all such considerations, and ten times as muc And he that considers how mischievous ar mortal a thing taking wet in the feet is to those wl have been bred nicely, will wish he had, with the po people's children, gone bare-foot; who by that mean come to be so reconciled by custom to wet their fer that they take no more cold or harm by it than if the were wet in their hands. And what is it, I pray, th makes this great difference between the hands and tl feet in others, but only custom? I doubt not but if man from his cradle had been always used to go bar foot, whilst his hands were constantly wrapped up warm mittins, and covered with handshoes, as the Dute call gloves; I doubt not, I say, but such a custom would make taking wet in his hands as dangerous to him, now taking wet in their feet is to a great many other The way to prevent this is to have his shoes made so : to leak water, and his feet washed constantly every da in cold water. It is recommendable for its cleanliness but that which I aim at in it is health. And therefore limit it not precisely to any time of the day. I hav known it used every night with very good success, an that all the winter, without the omitting it so much : one night in extreme cold weather: when thick is covered the water, the child bathed his legs and feet i it, though he was of an age not big enough to rub an wipe them himself, and when he began this custom w puling and very tender. But the great end being t harden those parts by a frequent and familiar use of col water, and thereby to prevent the mischiefs that usual attend accidental taking wet in the feet in those who a bred otherwise; I think it may be left to the prudence and convenience of the parents to choose either night morning. The time I deem indifferent, so the thing I effectually done. The health and hardiness procured 1 it would be a good purchase at a much dearer rate. I which if I add the preventing of corns, that to some me would be a very valuable consideration. But begin fir in the spring with lukewarm, and so colder and cold every time, till in a few days you come to perfectly co water, and then continue it so winter and summer. Fe it is to be observed in this as in all other alteration from our ordinary way of living, the changes must 1 made by gentle and insensible degrees; and so we ma bring our bodies to any thing without pain and witho danger. (From Thoughts concerning Education.)

On Writing and Speaking English Correctly.

There can scarce be a greater defect in a gentlema than not to express himself well, either in writing speaking. But yet I think I may ask my reade Whether he doth not know a great many who li upon their estates, and so with the name should hat the qualities of gentlemen, who cannot so much as te a story as they should, much less speak clearly and pe suasively in any business? This I think not to be much their fault, as the fault of their education; for must without partiality do my countrymen this right that where they apply themselves, I see none of the neighbours outgo them. They have been taught rhetori but yet never taught how to express themselves han somely with their tongues, or pens, in the language the are always to use; as if the names of the figures that embellished the discourses of those who understood the art of speaking were the very art and skill of speaking well. This, as all other things of practice, is to be learned not by a few or a great many rules given, but by exercise and application, according to good rules or rather patterns, till habits are got and a facility of doing it well.

Agreeable hereunto, perhaps it might not be amiss to make children, as soon as they are capable of it, often to tell a story of any thing they know; and to correct at first the most remarkable fault they are guilty of in their way of putting it together. When that fault is cured, then to show them the next, and so on, till one after another, all, at least the gross ones, are mended. When they can tell tales pretty well, then it may be time to make them write them. The fables of Æsop, the only book almost that I know fit for children, may afford them matter for this exercise of writing English, as well as for reading and translating, to enter them in the Latin tongue. When they are got past the faults of grammar, and can join in a continued coherent discourse the several parts of a story without bald and unhandsome forms of transition (as is usual) often repeated; he that desires to perfect them yet farther in this, which is the first step to speaking well, and needs no invention, may have recourse to Tully; and by putting in practice those rules which that master of eloquence gives in his first book De Inventione, § 20, make them know wherein the skill and graces of an handsome narrative, according to the several subjects and designs of it, lie. Of each of which rules fit examples may be found out, and therein they may be shown how others have practised them. The ancient classic authors afford plenty of such examples, which they should be made not only to translate, but have set before them as patterns for their daily imitation.

When they understand how to write English with due connexion, propriety, and order, and are pretty well masters of a tolerable narrative style, they may be advanced to writing of letters; wherein they should not be put upon any strains of wit or compliment, but laught to express their own plain easy sense, without any incoherence, confusion, or roughness. And when they are perfect in this, they may to raise their thoughts have set before them the example of Voiture's, for the entertainment of their friends at a distance, with letters of compliment, mirth, raillery, or diversion; and Tully's epistles, as the best pattern whether for business or conversation. The writing of letters has so much to do in all the occurrences of human life, that no gentleman can avoid showing himself in this kind of writing: occasions will daily force him to make this use of his pen, which, besides the consequences that in his affairs his well or ill managing of it often draws after it, always lays him open to a severer examination of his breeding, sense, and abilities, than oral discourses; whose transient faults, dying for the most part with the sound that gives them life, and so not subject to a strict review, more easily escape observation and censure.

Had the methods of education been directed to their right end, one would have thought this so necessary a part could not have been neglected, whilst themes and verses in Latin, of no use at all, were so constantly every where pressed, to the racking of children's inventions beyond their strength, and hindering their cheerful progress in learning the tongues, by unnatural difficulties.

But custom has so ordained it, and who dares disobey? And would it not be very unreasonable to require of a learned country school-master (who has all the tropes and figures in Farnaby's rhetoric at his fingers ends) to teach his scholar to express himself handsomely in English, when it appears to be so little his business or thought, that the boy's mother (despised, it is like, as illiterate, for not having read a system of logic and rhetoric) outdoes him in it?

To write and speak correctly gives a grace, and gains a favourable attention to what one has to say: and since it is English that an English gentleman will have constant use of, that is the language he should chiefly cultivate, and wherein most care should be taken to polish and perfect his style. To speak or write better Latin than English may make a man be talked of; but he would find it more to his purpose to express himself well in his own tongue, that he uses every moment, than to have the vain commendation of others for a very insignificant quality. This I find universally neglected, and no care taken any-where to improve young men in their own language, that they may thoroughly understand and be masters of it. If any one among us have a facility or purity more than ordinary in his mother tongue, it is owing to chance, or his genius, or any thing rather than to his education, or any care of his teacher. To mind what English his pupil speaks or writes is below the dignity of one bred up amongst Greek and Latin, though he have but little of them himself. These are the learned languages, fit only for learned men to meddle with and teach; English is the language of the illiterate vulgar; though yet we see the policy of some of our neighbours hath not thought it beneath the public care to promote and reward the improvement of their own language. Polishing and enriching their tongue is no small business amongst them: it hath colleges and stipends appointed it, and there is raised amongst them a great ambition and emulation of writing correctly: and we see what they are come to by it, and how far they have spread one of the worst languages, possibly, in this part of the world, if we look upon it as it was in some few reigns backwards, whatever it be now. The great men amongst the Romans were daily exercising themselves in their own language; and we find yet upon record the names of orators who taught some of their emperors Latin, though it were their mother-tongue.

It is plain the Greeks were yet more nice in theirs; all other speech was barbarous to them but their own, and no foreign language appears to have been studied or valued amongst that learned and acute people; though it be past doubt that they borrowed their learning and philosophy from abroad.

I am not here speaking against Greek and Latin; I think they ought to be studied, and the Latin, at least, understood well, by every gentleman. But whatever foreign languages a young man meddles with (and the more he knows the better), that which he should critically study and labour to get a facility, clearness, and elegancy to express himself in, should be his own, and to this purpose he should daily be exercised in it.

(From Thoughts Concerning Education.)

Of History.

The stories of Alexander and Casar, further than they instruct us in the art of living well, and furnish us with observations of wisdom and prudence, are not one jot to be preferred to the history of Robin Hood, or the Seven Wise Masters. I do not deny but history is very useful, and very instructive of human life; but if it be studied only for the reputation of being a historian, it is a very empty thing; and he that can tell all the particulars of Herodotus and Plutarch, Curtius and Livy, without making any other use of them, may be an ignorant man with a good memory, and with all his pains hath only filled his head with Christmas tales. And, which is worse, the greatest part of the history being made up of wars and conquests, and their style, especially the Romans, speaking of valour as the chief if not the only virtue, we are in danger to be misled by the general current and business of history; and, looking on Alexander and Cæsar, and such-like heroes, as the highest instances of human greatness, because they each of them caused the death of 100,000 men, and the ruin of a much greater number, overran a great part of the earth, and killed the inhabitants to possess themselves of their countries—we are apt to make butchery and rapine the chief marks and very essence of human greatness. And if civil history be a great dealer of it, and to many readers thus useless, curious and difficult inquirings in antiquity are much more so; and the exact dimensions of the Colossus, or figure of the Capitol, the ceremonies of the Greek and Roman marriages, or who it was that first coined money; these, I confess, set a man well off in the world, especially amongst the learned, but set him very little on in his way. . . .

I shall only add one word and then conclude; and that, is that whereas in the beginning I cut off history from our study as a useless part, as certainly it is where it is read only as a tale that is told; here, on the other side, I recommend it to one who hath well settled in his mind the principles of morality, and knows how to make a judgment on the actions of men, as one of the most useful studies he can apply himself to. There he shall see a picture of the world and the nature of mankind, and so learn to think of men as they are. There he shall see the rise of opinions, and find from what slight and sometimes shameful occasions some of them have taken their rise, which yet afterwards have had great authority, and passed almost for sacred in the world, and borne down all before them. There also one may learn great and useful instructions of prudence, and be warned against the cheats and rogueries of the world. with many more advantages which I shall not here enumerate. Christmas at Cleves.

DEAR SIR,—Are you at leisure for half an hour's trouble? Will you be content I should keep up the custom of writing long letters with little in them? 'Tis a barren place, and the dull frozen part of the year, and therefore you must not expect great matters. 'Tis enough that at Christmas you have empty Christmas tales fit for the chimney corner. To begin therefore; December 15th (here 25th) Christmas day, about one in the morning I went a-gossipping to our Lady; think me not profane, for the name is a great deal modester than the service I was at. I shall not describe all the particulars I observed in that church, being the principal of the Catholics in Cleves; but only those that were particular to the occasion. Near the high-altar was a little altar for this day's solemnity; the scene was a stable, wherein was an ox, an ass, a cradle, the Virgin, the babe, Joseph, shepherds, and angels, dramatis persona. Ha they but given them motion, it had been a perfect puppet play, and might have deserved pence apiece; for the were of the same size and make that our English puppet are; and I am confident these shepherds and this Josep are kin to that Judith and Holophernes which I hav seen at Bartholomew Fair. A little without the stabl was a flock of sheep, cut out of cards; and these, a they then stood without their shepherds, appeared to m the best emblem I had seen a long time, and methough represented these poor innocent people, who, whilst the shepherds pretend so much to follow Christ and pa their devotion to him, are left unregarded in the barre wilderness. This was the show: the music to it was a vocal in the quire adjoining, but such as I never heard They had strong voices, but so ill-tuned, so ill-manager that it was their misfortune, as well as ours, that the could be heard. He that could not, though he had cold, make better music with a Chevy Chace [apparentl a tune to which the ballad was then sung] over a pot of smooth ale, deserved well to pay the reckoning, and g away athirst. However, I think they were the honester singing-men I have ever seen, for they endeavoured t deserve their money, and earned it certainly with pain enough; for what they wanted in skill, they made up i loudness and variety. Every one had his own tune, an the result of all was like the noise of choosing parliament men, where every one endeavours to cry loudest. Beside the men, there were a company of little choristers. thought, when I saw them at first, they had danced t the others' music, and that it had been your Gray's In revels; for they were jumping up and down about good charcoal-fire that was in the middle of the quir (this their devotion and their singing was enough, I thinl to keep them warm, though it were a very cold night but it was not dancing, but singing they served for; for when it came to their turns, away they ran to the places, and there they made as good harmony as a cor cert of little pigs would, and they were much about : cleanly. Their part being done, out they sallied aga to the fire, where they played till their cue called ther and then back to their places they huddled. So negl gent and slight are they in their service in a place whe the nearness of adversaries might teach them to be mo careful. . . .

A Letter to Anthony Collins.

SIR,-Till your confidence in my friendship at freedom with me can preserve you from thinking yo have need to make apologies for your silence whe ever you omit a post or two, when in your kind wa of reckoning you judge a letter to be due, you kno me not so well as I could wish; nor am I so litt burthensome to you as I desire. I could be pleas to hear from you every day; because the ve thoughts of you every day afford me pleasure as But I beseech you to believe that satisfaction. measure not your kindness by your opportunities writing; nor do suspect that your friendship flatter whenever your pen lies a little still. The sinceri you profess and I am convinced of has charms it against all the little phantoms of ceremony. it be not so that true friendship sets one free from scrupulous observance of all those little circumstance I shall be able to give but a very ill account of mys to my friends; to whom when I have given possession of my beart, I am less punctual in making of legs and kising my hand than to other people to whom that outside civility is all that belongs.

I received the three books you sent me. That which the author sent me deserves my acknowledgment more ways than one; and I must beg you to return it. His demonstrations are so plain, that if this were an age that followed reason, I should not doubt but his would prevail. But to be rational is so glorious a thing that two-legged creatures generally content themselves with the full; but will not debase so excellent a faculty about the conduct of so trivial a thing as they make themselves.

There never was a man better suited to your wishes than I am. You take a pleasure in being troubled with my commissions; and I have no other way of commerce with you, but by such importunities, I can only say, that, were the tables changed, I should, being in your place, have the same satisfaction; and therefore confi dently make use of your kind offer. I therefore beg the favour of you to get me Mr Le Clerc's //armony of the Evangelists in English, bound very finely in call, git, and lettered on the back, and gilt on the leaves. So also I would have Moliere's works (of the best edition you can get them) bound. These books are for lader; and therefore I would have them fine, and the leaves gilt as well as the back. Mohere of the Paris edium I think is the best, if it can be got in London in quies. You see the liberty I take. I should be glad 700 could find out something for me to do for you here. I am perfectly, &c. TOHN LOCKS.

Not a few of the shrewd and wise sayings in Locke's philosophy of life might be quoted as aphonsms: thus, 'It is one thing to show a man that he is in error, and another to put him in possession of the truth;' and 'Tis in vain to find fault with those arts of deceiving wherein men find pleasure to be deceived.' Locke on quotation deserves to be cited in a work like the present. 'He that has but ever so little examined the citations of writers cannot doubt how little credit the quotations deserve where the originals are wanting; and consequently how much less quotations of quotations can be relied on.'

There are Lives of Locke by Lord King (1889 and 1890) and Fox Brane (2 vols. 1876), and small works on his philosophy by Dr Fovier (1880) and Dr Campbell Fraser (1890). The standard edition of the Essay is by Campbell Fraser (2 vols. 1894). The most hotable contemporary criticism is contained in the Nontvanz Essat of Lesbarts; the most trenchant of modern critiques is to be load in T. H. Green's Introduction to his edition of Hume (1874). Dr John Brown's essay 'Locke and Sydenham' in his Heree Salvinose (1888) gives an account of his friendship with the great physicas.

Sir Isaac Newton.

Frestest of the world's physicists, was born 25th December 1642, at Woolsthorpe in Lincolnshire, where his father cultivated a small paternal estate; and from childhood he manifested a strong inclination towards mechanical and mathematical Pursuits. Having received his early education at the grammar-school of Grantham, at the age of fifteen he was summoned to take charge of the fam; but, found unsuited for this uncongenial occupation, he was allowed to return to school and follow the bent of his genius. In 1661 he was admitted a sizar in Trinity College, Cambridge, became a Junior Fellow in 1667, and M.A. in 1668. In 1669 he succeeded Barrow as mathematical professor; in 1671 he became a Fellow of the Royal Society, and communicated to it his new theory of Light. He served repeatedly in Parliament as member for the university, was appointed Warden (1696) and Master (1699) of the Mint during Montague's reform of the currency, became President of the Royal Society in 1703, and two years afterwards received the honour of knighthood from Queen Anne. While at the Mint he devoted himself entirely to his official work, refusing testily to be 'dunned and teased by foreigners about mathematical things' so long as he was 'about the King's business.' To the unrivalled genius and sagacity of Newton the world is indebted for many splendid discoveries in mathematics and physics, above all of the laws which regulate the movements of the solar system. The first step towards the establishment of the Newtonian system-his philosophy, as it used to be called-was his discovery of the law of gravitation, which, as he proved, affected the vast orbs that revolve around the sun not less than the smallest objects on our own globe. It was Voltaire who gave the apple story currency in its present shape. His nephew's record was: 'In the same year [1665], at his mother's in Lincolnshire, when musing in a garden it came into his thoughts that the same power of gravity which made an apple fall from the tree to the ground was not limited to a certain distance.1 He saw that there was, a remarkable power or principle which caused all bodies to descend towards the centre of the earth, and that this unseen power operated at the top of the highest mountains and at the bottom of the deepest mines. When the true cause, the law of gravitation, dawned upon his mind, Newton was so much agitated as to be unable to work out the problem. When he did attempt to explain on this theory the lunar and planetary motions, the then erroneous estimate of the radius of the earth produced such discrepancies that he gave up his calculation for work in optics and about telescopes; and it was not till after he had utilised Picard's more correct measure of the earth (1670) that he was able to work out his theory, finally demonstrated by 1684, and for ever put beyond cavil (see page 159). 'The whole material universe, Sir David Brewster said, 'was spread out before him; the sun with all his attending planets, the planets with all their satellites, the comets wheeling in their eccentric orbits, and the system of the fixed stars stretching to the remotest limits of space.' When Columbus first descried the shores of the new world he had adventurously sailed to explore, he attained an unparalleled pitch of moral and intellectual grandeur. So did Milton when, old and blind and poor, he had realised the dream of his youth, completed his great epic, and sent it forth on its voyage of immortality. But the achievement of Newton was still more transcendent—perhaps the most sublime ever permitted to mortal; he had done more than any mere man towards the scientific understanding and explanation of the world.

The work in which Newton unfolded his simple but sublime system was expounded in Latin in De Motu Corporum, and finally appeared in 1687 as the truly epochmaking Philo-sophiæ Naturalis Principia Mathematica. To Newton we owe likewise discoveries by which the science of optics was so entirely changed that he may very justly be termed its founder. He was the first to conceive and demonstrate the divisibility of light into rays of seven different colours, and possessing different degrees of refrangibility. His thirty years' optical investigations were set forth in 1704 in Optics: or a Treatise of the Refractions, Inflections, and Colours of Light. Controversies about the priority of Newton's discovery of fluxions and Leibnitz's (independent) discovery of the differential calculus embittered many years of Newton's life. He wrote not a little on chemistry, had studied the alchemists carefully, and in his earlier years actually sought for the philosopher's stone. Like his illustrious contemporaries Boyle, Barrow, and Locke, Newton devoted much attention to theology as well as to natural science. His Observations upon the Prophecies of Holy Writ, particularly the Prophecies of Daniel and the Apocalypse of St John, was published after his death. Among his manuscripts were found many other theological pieces, mostly on such subjects as the Prophetic Style, the Host of Heaven, the Revelation, the Temple of Solomon, the Sanctuary, the Working of the Mystery of Iniquity, and the Contest between the Host of Heaven and the Transgressors of the Covenant. Only one was issued at oncethat on The Chronology of Ancient Kingdoms Amended, in which Newton suggested how astronomy might be used to check and verify Babylonian and Egyptian chronology. An Historical Account of Two Notable Corruptions of Scriptum (John, v. 7, and 1 Tim. iii. 16) first appeared in a perfect form in Dr Horsley's edition of his works in 1779. Newton, like all competent scholars thet and since, regarded the 'Three Heavenly Witnesses

That is, w are to worship th Father alone a God Almight and Jesus alor. as the Lord, th Messiah, the Gree

King, the Lamb of God who was slain, and hat redeemed us with his blood, and made us king and priests.' Another is: 'We need not pray t Christ to intercede for us. If we pray aright t the Father, he will intercede for us.' Newton decided Arian convictions are visible also in the strong ill-will he cherished-like the Deists, wit whom as a devout believer in revelation he ha little in common-against the Nicene Council at its methods, his utter disrespect for Athanasius (a a liar, falsifier of evidence, and malignant enemy his pronounced suspicion of every step that le to the acceptance of the 'homoousion,' and h query, 'Whether Christ sent his apostles preach metaphysics to the unlearned commo people and to their wives and children?' His w willingness that his views on these points (though communicated to friends like Locke) should be published under his name during his lifetime is explained by the fact that unsoundness on the Trinity disqualified for public service. Whiston was deprived of his professorship and banished the University of Cambridge for Arianism in 1710. Galileo recanted to please the Roman Church; the English Galileo would have been driven from his posts a hundred years later had he not been content to keep his real views on theology in retentis. And the pious and orthodox Sir David Brewster, painfully disturbed by Newton's theological aberrations, was attacked in 1831 by the Bishop of Salisbury as having done great injury to Newton's memory by publishing his true opinions from Newton's own undisputed MSS.! But on Scripture revelation Newton was hyper-orthodox. In his elucubration on Daniel he insisted that 'the authority of emperors, kings, and princes is human. The authority of councils, synods, bishops, and presbyters is human. The authority of the prophets is divine, and comprehends the sum of religion, reckoning Moses and the Apostles among the prophets.' How far he was from present-day views may be gathered from his statement: 'The predictions of things to come relate to the state of the Church in all ages: and amongst the old prophets Daniel is the most distinct in order of time, and easiest to be understood; and therefore in those things which relate to the last times he must be made the key to the rest.' The following is part of his scheme for the non-natural interpretation of the prophets:

Of the Prophetic Language.

For understanding the prophecies, we are in the first place to acquaint ourselves with the figurative language of the prophets. This language is taken from the analogy between the world natural, and an empire or kingdom considered as a world politic. Accordingly the whole world natural, consisting of heaven and earth, signifies the whole world politic, consisting of thrones and people; or so much of it as is considered in the prophecy. And the things in that world signifies the analogous things in this. For the heavens, and the things therein, signify thrones and dignities, and those who enjoy them; and the earth, with the things thereon, the inferior people; and the lowest parts of the earth, called Hades, or Hell, the lowest or most miserable part of them. Whence ascending towards heaven, and descending to the earth, are put for rising and falling in power and honour; rising out of the earth or waters, and falling into them, for the rising up to any dignity, or dominion, out of the inferior state of the people, or falling down from the same into that inferior state; descending into the lower parts of the earth, for descending to a very low and unhappy state; speaking with a faint voice out of the dust, for being in a weak and low condition; moving from one place to another, for translation from one office, dignity, or dominion to another; great earthquakes, and the shaking of heaven and earth, for the shaking of dominions, so as to distract or overthrow them; the creating a new heaven and earth, and the Passing away of an old one, or the beginning and end of the world, for the rise and reign of the body politic signified thereby.

In the heavens, the sun and moon are, by the interpreters of dreams, put for the persons of kings and queens. But in sacred prophecy, which regards not single persons, the sun is put for the whole species and race of kings, in the kingdom or kingdoms of the world politic, shining with regal power and glory; the moon for the body of the common people, considered as the king's wife; the stars for subordinate princes and great men, or for bishops and rulers of the people of God, when the sun is Christ; light for the glory, truth, and knowledge, wherewith great and good men shine and illuminate others; darkness for obscurity of condition, and for error, blindness, and ignorance; darkening, smiting, or setting of the sun, moon, and stars, for the ceasing of a kingdom, or for the desolation thereof, proportional to the darkness; darkening the sun, turning the moon into blood, and falling of the stars, for the same; new moons, for the return of a dispersed people into a body politic or ecclesiastic. . . .

If the world politic, considered in prophecy, consists of many kingdoms, they are represented by as many parts of the world natural, as the noblest by the celestial frame, and then the moon and clouds are put for the common people; the less noble, by the earth, sea, and rivers, and by the animals or vegetables, or buildings therein; and then the greater and more powerful animals and taller trees, are put for kings, princes, and nobles. And because the whole kingdom is the body politic of the king, therefore the sun, or a tree, or a beast, or bird, or a man, whereby the king is represented, is put in a large signification for the whole kingdom; and several animals, as a lion, a bear, a leopard, a goat, according to their qualities, are put for several kingdoms and bodies politic; and sacrificing of beasts, for slaughtering and conquering of kingdoms; and friendship between beasts, for peace between kingdoms. Yet sometimes vegetables and animals are, by certain epithets or circumstances, extended to other significations; as a tree, when called the 'tree of life' or 'of knowledge;' and a beast, when called 'the old serpent,' or worshipped.

During the last forty years of his life the inventive powers of this great thinker seemed to have lost their activity; he made no further discoveries, and in his later scientific publications published to the world only the views which he had formed in early life. An unamiable attempt was even made (by M. Biot) to prove that his mental powers were impaired by an attack of insanity in the years 1692 and 1693, and that accordingly he took to theology! Brewster, who proved that theology was an early study with him, and that some admirable physical work was done after the date in question, goes so far as to say (quite extravagantly, on the evidence), 'If he had not been distinguished as a mathematician and natural philosopher he would have enjoyed a high reputation as a theologian.' A Cambridge student has recorded, on 3rd February 1693, the loss of Newton's papers by fire while he was at chapel; adding that when the philosopher came home, 'and had seen what was done, every one thought he would have run mad; he was so troubled thereat, that he was not himself for a month after.' That his mind was then seriously disturbed is proved, and the disturbance was occasionally followed by fits of melancholia. Newton himself, writing on the 13th of September 1693 to Pepys, Secretary to the Admiralty, says: 'I am extremely troubled at the embroilment I am in, and have neither ate nor slept well this twelvemonth, nor have my former consistency of mind.' He wrote an apology to his friend Locke for having charged him with 'embroiling' him with other peoplethis being one of his hallucinations; and Locke's answer, also extant, is admirable for its gentle and kindly spirit. In 1722 Newton's health began to fail. In February 1727 he came to London to preside at a meeting of the Royal Society, suffered from the journey, and died at Kensington on the 20th of March. He was buried in his rightful place in Westminster Abbey, the Lord Chancellor, two scientific dukes, and three learned earls being

A letter from Newton to Dr John Mill, written in January 1694, shows how painstaking Newton was in matters of biblical criticism, and implies the value attached to his help by the foremost New Testament scholar of his time:

SIR,-I fear you think I have kept your book too long: but to make some amends for detaining it so long, I have sent you not only my old collations so far as they vary from yours, but also some new ones of Dr Covil's two MSS.; for I have collated them anew, and sent you those readings which were either omitted in your printed ones, or there erroneously printed. In collating these MSS., I set the readings down in the margin of your book, and thence transcribed them into a sheet of paper, which you will find in your book at the end of the Apocalypse, together with my old collations, and a copy of a side of Beza's MS. The collations I send you of Dr Covil's two MSS. you may rely upon; for I put them into Mr Laughton's hand with the two MSS., and he compared them with the MSS. and found them right. In the other col-·lations you will find that Stephens made several omissions and some other mistakes, in collating the Complutensian edition, though it is probable that he collated this edition with more diligence and accurateness than he did any of the MSS. Where I have noted any readings of the Alexandrin MS., I desire you would collate that MS. again with my readings, because I never had a sight of it. I could not observe any accurateness in the stops or commas in Beza's MS. You may rely upon the transcript of something more than a side of it, which you will find in your book at the end of the Apocalypse. In your little MS. book, which I return you, tied up together with your New Testament, you will find those transcripts you desired out of MSS., except two, which were in such running hands that I could not imitate them, nor did it seem worth the while, the MSS. being very new ones.-I am, in all sincerity, your most humble and most obedient servant,

Is. NEWTON.

In character Newton was gentle and courteous. He loathed hunting and the shooting of animals, and held it a serious defect in a friend's character that 'he loved killing of birds.' As Burnet said on him, 'he had the whitest soul he ever knew.' He took little interest in art: he playfully reproached a friendly archæologist with fondness for 'stone dolls.' He was singularly straightforward, modest, and willing to accept criticism, though at times a little difficult and 'nice' on questions of priority—hence many rather futile controversies in which he was engaged. No proposition of his Principia no theorem of his Optics, has sunk so deeply into men's minds as the saying reported to have beer made by him shortly before his death:

I do not know what I may appear to the world, but to myself I seem to have been only like a boy playing on the seashore, and diverting myself in now and ther finding a smoother pebble or a prettier shell than ordinary, whilst the great ocean of truth lay all undiscovered before me.

See the Life of Newton by Sir David Brewster (1831; 2nd ed 1855); A. de Morgan's Newton, his Friend, and his Niece (1885) G. J. Gray's bibliography of Newton's works and works about him (nearly 250 in all; 1888); and Professor P. G. Tait's Newton's Law of Motion (1899).

John Ray (1627-1705), the son of a black smith at Black Notley in Essex, was an eminen naturalist. In botany his very numerous and im portant works rank him among the founders of the science; and he is commonly regarded as the fathe: of natural history in England. He was educated a Braintree and Cambridge, becoming a Fellow o Trinity, and taking orders in 1660; but in 1662 he was ejected by the 'Black Bartholomew.' There upon, with his friend and former pupil, Francis Willughby, he travelled over Wales and southern England, collecting botanical and zoological speci mens; and in 1663 they set out on a three years Continental tour, Willughby taking the zoology and Ray the botany. Willughby died in 1672, and Ray, after acting as tutor to his friend's sons, it 1679 settled down in his native village. Beside their joint Observations, Topographical, Moral, an Physiological, made in a Journey through th Low Countries, Germany, Italy, and France (1673) Ray edited Willughby's Ornithologia and Historia Piscium, and himself published A Collection of English Proverbs (1670), A Collection of Englis. Words not generally used (1674), Historia Plan tarum Generalis (3 vols. 1686-1704), Synopsi Methodica Animalium (1693), &c. 'Ray,' said Cuvier, 'was the first true systematist of th Animal Kingdom;' and White of Selborne speak of him as 'the only describer that conveys som precise idea in every term or word, maintaining his superiority over his followers and imitators, i spite of the advantage of fresh discoveries an modern information.' Ray's famous treatise on Th Wisdom of God Manifested in the Works of th Creation (1691; 12th ed. 1759) was translated int several Continental languages. He gives as on reason for writing it: 'By virtue of my function I suspect myself to be obliged to write somethin in divinity, having written so much on other subjects; for, not being permitted to serve the Church with my tongue in preaching, I know not but it may be my duty to serve it with my hand in writing; and I have made choice of this subject, as thinking myself best qualified to treat of it.' Natural theology had previously been developed in England by Boyle, Stillingfleet, Wilkins, Henry More, and Cudworth, and the Essex clergyman, William Derham (1657-1735); but Ray systematised and popularised the subject. Paley's Natural Theology (1802), which superseded Ray's work, is really a development of Ray's argument.

The following excerpts are from the Observations, a book of travels which, always lucid and often very entertaining, yet sometimes—as in the greater Italian towns-becomes almost like a guide-book. On the journey up the Rhine from 'Collen' to Mentz, hardly one of the castles escapes mention. In university towns, Ray prints the professors' names and the courses of lectures being delivered when he was there. He had an especially open eye for botany and zoology, and 'natural curiosities;' thus at Naples he ascended Vesuvius, stood in the Grotto del Cane till 'the sulphureous twinge in his nose' threatened to stiffe him, and thrust a sword into the vents of the Solfatara of Pozzuoli.

The Dutch People.

The common people of Holland, especially inn-keepers, waggoners (foremen they call them), boat-men, and porters, are surly and uncivil. The waggoners bait themselves and their horses four or five times in a day's journey. Generally the Dutch men and women are almost always eating as they travel, whether it be by boat, coach, or waggon. The men are for the most part big-boned and gross-bodied. The first dish at ordinaries and entertainments is usually a salade, Sla they call it, of which they eat abundance in Holland. The meat they commonly stew, and make their Hotchpots of it. Puddings neither here nor in any place we have travelled beyond sea do they eat any; either not knowing the goodness of the dish, or not having the skill to make them: puddings and brawn are dishes proper to England. Boil'd spinage mine'd and butter'd (sometimes also with currans added) is a great dish all over these countries. The common People feed much upon cabiliau (that is cod-fish) and pickled herrings, which they know how to cure or pre-Pare better than we do in England. You shall seldom fail of hung beef in any inn you come into, which they cat into thin slices and eat with bread and butter, laying the slices upon the butter. They have four or five sorts of cheese; three they usually bring forth and set before 700. (1) Those great round cheeses, colour'd red on the outside, commonly in England called Holland-cheeses. (2) Cummin-seed cheese. (3) Green cheese, said to be Colour'd with the juice of sheep's-dung. This they pe upon bread butter'd, and so eat. (4) Sometimes Relots. (5) Cheese like to our common country Milk is the cheapest of all belly-provi-Their strong beer (thick beer they call it, and they may) is sold for three stivers the quart, which more than three pence English. All manner of victuals, th meat and drink, are very dear, not for the scarcity of such commodities, but partly by reason of the great excise and impost wherewith they are charged, partly by reason of the abundance of money that is stirring here. By the way we may note, that the dearness of this sort of provisions is an argument of the riches of a town or country, these things being always cheapest in the poorest places. Land is also here sold at 30 or 40 years. purchase, and yet both houses and land set at very high annual rents: so that, were not the poor workmen and labourers well paid for their pains, they could not possibly live. Their beds are for the most part like cabbins, inconveniently short and narrow; and yet such as they are, you pay in some places ten stivers a night the man for them, and in most six. There is no way for a stranger to deal with inn-keepers, waggoners, porters, and boatmen but by bargaining with them before-hand. houses in Holland are kept clean with extraordinary niceness, and the entrance before the door curiously paved with stone. All things both within and without, floor, posts, walls, glass, houshold stuff, marvellously clean, bright and handsomly kept: nay, some are so extraordinarily curious as to take down the very tiles of their pent-houses and cleanse them. Yet about the preparing and dressing of their victuals our English houswives are, I think, more cleanly and curious than they; so that no wonder Englishmen were formerly noted for excessive eating, they having greater temptation to eat, both from the goodness of their meat, and the curiosity of the dressing it; than other nations.

Ray's 'foreman' is the Dutch voerman, German fuhrmann.
Angelots were well-known Normandy cheeses.

At Heidelberg.

About the middle of the ascent of the hill, called Koningsthall, stands the castle where the prince keeps his court, a stately pile and of great capacity, encompassed with a strong wall and a deep trench hewn out of the rock, which upon occasion may be filled with water. Over the gate leading into the palace is a Dutch inscription, signifying the building of it by Ludovicus V. in the year 1519. It is not all of one piece, but since the first foundation several buildings have been added by several princes. One part is called the English building. Under one of the towers stood the great tun, which almost fill'd a room. It held 132 fudders, a fudder (as we were informed) being equal to four English hogsheads. The old tun is taken in pieces, and there is a new one in building by the prince's order, which is to contain 150 fudders, or 600 hogsheads. Being invited by the prince's order, we dined in the palace, where we observed all things carried with little noise and great decency. After dinner his highness was pleased to call us into his closet and shew us many curiosities, among others (1) a purse made of Alumen plumosum, which we saw put into a pan of burning charcoal, till it was thoroughly ignite, and yet when taken out and cool, we could not perceive that it had received any harm at all from the fire. (2) Two unicorns horns, each eight or ten foot long, wreathed and hollow to the top. By the way we may note, that these are the horns of a fish of the cetaceous kind (two distinct species whereof you may find described and figured in the History and Description of the Antilles, or Caribee Islands, written in French by R. F. of Tertre, and the head of one in Wormius's Musæum), not the horns of a quadruped, as is vulgarly but erroneously thought. Whatever the antients have delivered, modern voyages and enquiries have discovered no other terrestrial unicorn besides the rhinoceros, which it's most likely is signified by the word RAM used in scripture, which the Septuagint render Μονοκέρωs. (3) The imperial crown and globe of Rupertus Imp., who was of this family, richly adorned with precious stones. (4) An excellent and well digested collection of antient and modern coins and medals of all sorts, in which the prince himself is very knowing. Among the rest, we could not but take notice of a Swedish doller of copper, about the bigness and of the figure of a square trencher, stamped at the four corners with the king's image and arms, of that weight, that if a man be to receive ten or twenty pound in such coin, he must come with a cart and team of horse to carry it home. The Prince Palatine's name and titles are Carolus Ludovicus, Comes Palatinus Rheni, sacri Romani Imperii Elector, utriusque Bavaria Dux. He speaks six languages perfectly well, viz., High-Dutch, Low-Dutch, English, French, Italian and Latin, is greatly beloved of his subjects, of whom he hath a paternal care, and whose interest he makes his own. In the great church where the famous library was kept, we observed many fair monuments of princes of this family, some with Dutch, most with Latin epitaphs or inscriptions: others in the Franciscans church. In St. Peter's church also a great number of monuments of learned men of the university; which is of good account and one of the best in Germany. Three or four colleges there are built and endowed chiefly for the maintenance and accommodation of poor students. The government of this university is by a senate, which consists only of sixteen professors. The number of professors is limited, and their stipends fix'd by the statutes of the university given them by their founder Rupertus count palatine anno 1346, and confirmed by the pope and emperor. Of these professors three are of divinity; four of law; three of medicine; and six of philosophy.

Ray's Remains, published in 1760 by Derham, contained this touching letter, written with difficulty on his death-bed, to Sir Hans Sloane:

DEAR SIR, the best of friends, these are to take a finall leave of you as to this world: I look upon my self as a dying man. God requite your kindnesse expressed any ways toward me a hundred-fold, blesse you with a confluence of all good things in this world, and eternall life and hapinesse heer after; grant us an happy meeting in heaven.—Sr, eternally yours, JOHN RAY.

Dr Thomas Burnet (1635?-1715), born at Croft near Darlington, studied at Cambridge, became in 1685 Master of the Charterhouse in London, and acquired great celebrity by the publication of his work, Telluris Theoria Sacra (1680-89), of which he published versions in English in 1684-89, entitled The Sacred Theory of the Earth. The unequal and rugged appearance of the earth's surface suggested that this our globe is the ruin of some more regular fabric. Unlike Kant of the Heavens, published seventy years is no serious and reasonable theory of t tion of a planet from nebulæ; it has n to geology or physics, and is purely and hypothetical, a cosmogonic drear journey across the Alps and Apennine says, 'the sight of those wild, vast, digested heaps of stones and earth did strike my fancy, that I was not easy ti give myself some tolerable account how fusion came in nature.' The theory formed was the following: The globe ir of chaos was a dark fluid mass, in v elements of air, water, and earth were into one universal compound. heavier parts fell towards the centre, ar a nucleus of solid matter. Around th the liquid ingredients, and over them wa lighter atmospheric air. By-and-by t mass became separated into two layer separation of the watery particles from an oily composition, which, being the tended upwards, and, when hardened became a smooth and solid crust. the surface of the antediluvian globe. smooth earth,' says Burnet, 'were the fit of the world, and the first generations kind; it had the beauty of youth and nature, fresh and fruitful, and not a scar, or fracture in all its body; no 1 mountains, no hollow caves nor gaping but even and uniform all over. And the ness of the earth made the face of the so too; the air was calm and serene; those tumultuary motions and conflicts o which the mountains and the winds ours. 'Twas suited to a golden age, a: first innocency of nature.' By degrees, the heat of the sun, penetrating the ! crust, converted a portion of the water into steam, the expansive force of which burst the superincumbent shell, already by the dryness and cracks occasioned solar rays. When, therefore, the 'appoi was come that All-wise Providence had for the punishment of a sinful world, fabric brake, and the frame of the e torn in pieces, as by an earthquake; a great portions or fragments into whice divided fell into the abyss, some in one and some in another.' The waters of co appeared, tumultuously raging as the roc plunged into the abyss. The impact ' but impel the water with so much sti would carry it up to a great height in and to the top of anything that lay in any eminency or high fragment wh and then rolling back again, it wou down with it whatsoever it rushed upor buildings, living creatures—and carry headlong into the great gulf. Sometim of water would be quite struck off and separate from the rest, and tossed through the air like a flying river; but the common motion of the waves was to climb up the hills, or inclined fragments, and then return into the valleys and deeps again, with a perpetual fluctuation going and coming, ascending and descending, till the violence of them being spent by degrees, they settled at last in the places allotted for them; where "bounds are set that they cannot pass over, that they return not again to cover the earth."

Noah's Flood.

Thus the flood came to its height; and it is not easy to represent to ourselves this strange scene of things, when the deluge was in its fury and extremity; when the earth was broken and swallowed up in the abyss, whose raging waters rose higher than the mountains, and filled the air with broken waves, with a universal mist, and with thick darkness, so as nature seemed to be in a second chaos; and upon this chaos rid the distressed ark that bore the small remains of mankind. No sea was ever so tumultuous as this, nor is there anything in present nature to be compared with the disorder of these waters. All the poetry, and all the hyperboles that are used in the description of storms and raging seas, were literally true in this, if not beneath it. The ark was really carried to the tops of the highest mountains, and into the places of the clouds, and thrown down again into the deepest gulfs; and to this very state of the deluge and of the ark, which was a type of the church in this world, David seems to have alluded in the name of the church (Psalm, xlii. 7): 'Abyss calls upon abyss at the noise of thy cataracts or water-spouts: all thy waves and billows have gone over me.' It was no doubt an extraordinary and miraculous providence that could make a vessel so ill-manned live upon such 2 sea; that kept it from being dashed against the hills, or overwhelmed in the deeps. That abyss which had devoured and swallowed up whole forests of woods, cities, and provinces, nay, the whole earth, when it had conquered all and triumphed over all, could not destroy this single ship. I remember in the story of the Argonantics, when Jason set out to fetch the golden fleece, the poet saith, all the gods that day looked down from heaven to view the ship, and the nymphs stood upon the mountain-tops to see the noble youth of Thessaly pulling at the oars; we may with more reason suppose the good angels to have looked down upon this ship of Noah's, and that not out of curiosity, as idle spectators, but with a passionate concern for its safety and deliverance. A ship whose cargo was no less than a whole world; that carried the fortune and hopes of all posterity; and if this had perished, the earth, for anything we know, had been nothing but a desert, a great ruin, a dead heap of rubbish, from the deluge to the conflagration. But death and hell, the grave and destruction, have their bounds.

The concluding part of his work relates to the final conflagration of the world, by which, he supposes, the surface of the new chaotic mass will be restored to smoothness, and 'leave a capacity for another world to rise from it.' Here the style rises to a dignity almost worthy of the sublimity of the theme; the passage was aptly termed by Addison the author's funeral oration over this globe.

The Final Conflagration.

But 'tis not possible from any station to have a full prospect of this last scene of the earth, for 'tis a mixture of fire and darkness. This new temple is filled with smoke while it is consecrating, and none can enter into it. But I am apt to think, if we could look down upon this burning world from above the clouds, and have a full view of it in all its parts, we should think it a lively representation of hell itself; for fire and darkness are the two chief things by which that state or that place uses to be described; and they are both here mingled together, with all other ingredients that make that Tophet that is prepared of old (Isaiah, xxx.). Here are lakes of fire and brimstone, rivers of melted glowing matter, ten thousand volcanoes vomiting flames all at once, thick darkness, and pillars of smoke twisted about with wreaths of flame, like fiery snakes; mountains of earth thrown up into the air, and the heavens dropping down in lumps of fire. These things will all be literally true concerning that day and that state of the earth. And if we suppose Beelzebub and his apostate crew in the midst of this fiery furnace—and I know not where they can be else-it will be hard to find any part of the universe, or any state of things, that answers to so many of the properties and characters of hell as this which is now before us.

But if we suppose the storm over, and that the fire hath gotten an entire victory over all other bodies, and subdued everything to itself, the conflagration will end in a deluge of fire, or in a sea of fire, covering the whole globe of the earth; for when the exterior region of the earth is melted into a fluor like molten glass or running metal, it will, according to the nature of other fluids, fill all vacuities and depressions, and fall into a regular surface, at an equal distance everywhere from its centre. This sea of fire, like the first abyss, will cover the face of the whole earth, make a kind of second chaos, and leave a capacity for another world to rise from it. But that is not our present business. Let us only, if you please, to take leave of this subject, reflect upon this occasion on the vanity and transient glory of all this habitable world; how by the force of one element breaking loose upon the rest, all the varieties of nature, all the works of art, all the labours of men, are reduced to nothing; all that we admired and adored before, as great and magnificent, is obliterated or vanished; and another form and face of things, plain, simple, and everywhere the same, overspreads the whole earth. Where are now the great empires of the world, and their great imperial cities? Their pillars, trophies, and monuments of glory? Shew me where they stood, read the inscription, tell me the victor's name! What remains, what impressions, what difference or distinction do you see in this mass of fire? Rome itself, eternal Rome, the great city, the empress of the world, whose domination and superstition ancient and modern, make a great part of the history of this earth, what is become of her now? She laid her foundations deep, and her palaces were strong and sumptuous: she glorified herself, and lived deliciously, and said in her heart, I sit a queen, and shall see no sorrow. But her hour is come; she is wiped away from the face of the earth, and buried in perpetual oblivion.

But it is not cities only, and works of men's hands, but the everlasting hills, the mountains and rocks of the earth, are melted as wax before the sun, and their place is nowhere found. Here stood the Alps, a prodigious range of stone, the load of the earth, that covered many countries, and reached their arms from the ocean to the Black Sea; this huge mass of stone is softened and dissolved as a tender cloud into rain. Here stood the African mountains, and Atlas with his top above the clouds. There was frozen Caucasus, and Taurus, and Imaus, and the mountains of Asia. And yonder towards the north stood the Riphæan hills, clothed in ice and snow. All these are vanished, dropped away as the snow upon their heads, and swallowed up in a red sea of fire. (Rev. xv. 3)—Great and marvellous are thy works, Lord God Almighty; just and true are thy ways, thou King of saints. Hallelujah.

Steele in the Spectator (No. 146) praised the Theory; and Warton thought it proved that Burnet had an imagination nearly equal to Milton's, as well as a solid understanding. Burnet's Archæologia Philosophica, on the origin of things (1692; Englished in the same year), 'reconciles' by a non-literal interpretation the story of Genesis with his own theory—one of the earliest 'reconciliations' of Genesis with modern views; the Fall becomes little more than an allegory; and his report of the conversation between Eve and the serpent startled society even more than the heretical character of his speculations, which led to a multitude of examinations and refutations and answers. In consequence he had to retire from the office of Clerk of the Closet to the king, and lived in the Charterhouse till his death. Latin treatises On Christian Faith and Duties, and On the State of the Dead and Reviving (translated in 1728 and 1733), contain unorthodox views on original sin and the sacraments, and maintain the ultimate salvation of the whole human race.

Gilbert Burnet (1643-1715), Bishop of Salisbury, was equally active and eminent as theologian, politician, and historian. He was the son of a royalist and Episcopalian lawyer in Edinburgh, who was after the Restoration raised to the Bench. His mother was of a strong Presbyterian house, being a sister of the Covenanting leader Johnston of Warriston, who was created a peer by Cromwell, and put to death in the reign of Charles II. by a mockery of legal forms. Gilbert adhered to the Episcopalian side of his house, but his divided parental allegiance in Church matters taught him the importance of religious toleration. He was M.A. of Marischal College, Aberdeen, before he was fifteen years of age, and in 1664 he studied Hebrew under a learned rabbi in Amsterdam. Having become a probationer in 1661, the year of the re-establishment of Episcopacy in Scotland, he was in 1665-69 minister of Saltoun, in East Lothian, whence he removed to Glasgow as professor of divinity. Always zealous and ambitious, Burnet wrote pamphlets in favour of reconciling Presbyterianism and Episcopacy, remedying abuses, and vindicating the authority and constitution of Church and State in Scotland. He was offered a bishopricbut refused it; and opposing the Scottish administration of Lauderdale, he removed in 1674 to London, where he obtained the appointment preacher at the Rolls Chapel, and lecturer at St As a preacher Burnet was highly Clement's. popular. His appearance and action were consmanding, his manner was frank and open, and he was a master of extempore eloquence. It was there not unusual for congregations to express approbation of particular passages by a deep hum, and Burnet's hearers, it is said, used to hum so long and loud that he would, during the pause, sit down and wipe the perspiration from his forehead. His first historical work was the Memoirs of the Dukes of Hamilton (1676), and his reputation was raised by the publication, in 1679, of the first volume of his History of the Reformation of the Church of England (vol. ii. 1681; supplement, 1714). Some Passages in the Life and Death of the Earl of Rochester, whom Burnet had attended on his deathbed (see Vol. I. page 780), appeared in 1680, and heightened the impression of Burnet's talents and piety. Charles would have pressed a bishopric on the popular divine; but Burnet declined court favour. He even went the length of writing a strong remonstrance to the king on the errors of his government and his personal vices. Charles threw the letter into the fire; and when Burnet attended Lord Russell to the scaffold, wrote an account of his last moments, and preached against popery, he increased the Duke of York's resentment against The king was also so him to the uttermost. incensed that he dismissed Burnet from his lectureship, and prohibited him from preaching at the Rolls Chapel. Burnet, however, went on writing treatises and sermons in favour of toleration, and he compiled Lives of Sir Matthew Hale (1682) and Bishop Bedell (1685). He wrote a narrative of a tour in France, Switzerland, and Italy; and settling at the Hague in 1687, became one of the counsellors and adherents of the party of William of Orange. In the Revolution of 1688 he played a conspicuous part, accompanying William to England as chaplain; and was rewarded with the bishopric of Salisbury. As a prelate Burnet was noted for liberality and attention to his duties, and besides discharging the duties of his see, found time for work such as his Exposition of the Thirty-nine Articles, long a standard work.

Burnet left for publication the work by which he is best known, the *History of my Own*Time, giving an outline of the events of the Civil War and Commonwealth, and a full narrative of the succeeding period down to 1713. As he had personally known the conspicuous characters of a century, and penetrated most of its State secrets, he was able to relate events with a fullness and authority not inferior to Clarendon's. This he did in an easier, if vastly less dignified, style, and at least as much allowance must be made for the unmistakable influence of political and personal prejudices. Foreseeing that the fredom of his strictures would give offence in many quarters, Burnet left an injunction in his will that the work should not be published till six years after his death, so that it did not make ib appearance till 1723, and even then some passages-afterwards restored-were omitted by his sons. Its publication, as might have been expected, was a signal for fierce attacks on the reputation of the author, whose candour and veracity were loudly impeached. All the Tory and lacobite pens of the age were pointed against the History. Swift, Dartmouth, Lansdowne, and many others proclaimed it to be grossly partial and inaccurate; Pope and Arbuthnot ridiculed its egotistic style; and Hume and later historians continued the depreciatory attacks, which cannot yet be said to have ceased. Whoever wntes of the period or of its leading public characters must consult Burnet, and will find plesty of points for assault on the theological and political views so complacently advanced by the author. Burnet was a strong and somewhat cedulous partisan, a minute and garrulous desorber of events great and small. But he was doubtless an honest, well-meaning, and usually good-natured man. He appealed to the God of trath that he had on all occasions in his work told the truth, and, however mistaken or biassed he may be on some points, he may claim the praise of having been, according to his lights, a faithful chronicler. That he is a lively and interesting one has never been disputed; his book is a gallery of picturessome overshaded, some too bright, but all life-like. 'It seems,' as Horace Walpole said, 'as if he had just come from the king's closet, or from the apartments of the men whom he describes, and was telling his readers, in plain, honest terms, what he had seen and heard.' The diaries of Evelya and Pepys serve as supplements to Burnet. It should perhaps be added that Dr Routh, Tory 45d High Churchman, who published two editions of the History of my Own Time (1823-33), did not take the most favourable view of Burnet; succinctly declaring, 'I know the man to be a liar, and I am determined to prove him so.' The first extract is from the History of the Reformation, the others all from the History of my Own Time:

Death and Character of Edward VI

But now the King's death broke off this negociation. He had last year first the measles, and then the small-pox, of which he was perfectly recovered: in his progress he has been sometimes violent in his exercises, which had cast him into great colds; but these went off, and he seemed to be well after it: in the beginning of January this year [1553], he was seized with a deep cough, and all medicines that were used did rather increase than spread over all the world (so that it is mentioned by most of the historians of that age) that some lingering poison had been given him; but more than rumours, and some ill-favoured circumstances, could never discover concerning this. He was so ill when the parliament met that he was not able to go to Westminster, but ordered their first meeting and the sermon to be at Whitehall. In the time of his sickness, Bishop Ridley preached before him, and took occasion to run out much on works of charity, and the obligation that lay on men of high condition to be eminent in good works. This touched the King to the quick; so that presently after the sermon he sent for the Bishop. And after he had commanded him to sit down by him and be covered, he resumed most of the heads of the sermon, and said he looked on himself as chiefly touched by it: he desired him, as he had already given him the exhortation in general, so to direct him to do his duty in that particular. The Bishop, astonished at this tenderness in so young a prince, burst forth in tears, expressing how much he was overjoyed to see such inclinations in him; but told him he must take time to think on it, and craved leave to consult with the Lord-Mayor and court of Aldermen. So the King writ by him to them to consult speedily how the poor should be relieved. They considered there were three sorts of poor; such as were so by natural infirmity or folly, as impotent persons, and madmen or idiots; such as were so by accident, as sick or maimed persons; and such as by their idleness did cast themselves into poverty. So the King ordered the Greyfriars' church, near Newgate, with the revenues belonging to it, to be a house for orphans; St Bartholomew's, near Smithfield, to be an hospital; and gave his own house of Bridewell to be a place of correction and work for such as were wilfully idle. He also confirmed and enlarged the grant for the hospital of St Thomas in Southwark, which he had erected and endowed in August last. And when he set his hand to these foundations, which was not done before the 26th of June this year, he thanked God that had prolonged his life till he had finished that design. So he was the first founder of those houses, which by many great additions since that time have risen to be amongst the noblest in Europe. . . .

Death thus hastening on him, the Duke of Northumberland, who knew he had done but half his work, except he had the King's sisters in his hands, got the Council to write to them in the King's name, inviting them to come and keep him company in his sickness. But as they were on the way, on the 6th of July, his spirits and body were so sunk that he found death approaching; and so he composed himself to die in a most devout manner. His whole exercise was in short prayers and ejaculations. The last that he was heard to use was in these words: 'Lord God, deliver me out of this miserable and wretched life, and take me among thy chosen; howbeit not my will but thine be done; Lord, I commit my spirit to thee. O Lord, thou knowest how happy it were for me to be with thee; yet for thy chosen's sake send me life and health, that I may truly serve thee. O my Lord God, bless my people, and save thine inheritance. O Lord God, save thy chosen people of England; O. Lord God, defend this realm from papistry, and maintain thy true religion, that I and my people may praise thy holy name, for Jesus Christ his sake.' Seeing some about him, he seemed troubled that they were so near, and had heard him; but with a pleasant countenance, he said he had been praying to God. And soon after, the pangs of death coming upon him, he said to Sir Henry Sidney, who was holding him in his arms: 'I am faint; Lord, have mercy on me, and receive my spirit;' and so he breathed out his innocent soul.

Thus died King Edward VI., that incomparable young prince. He was then in the sixteenth year of his age, and was counted the wonder of that time. not only learned in the tongues and other liberal sciences, but knew well the state of his kingdom. He kept a book in which he writ the characters that were given him of all the chief men of the nation, all the judges, lord-lieutenants, and justices of the peace over England: in it he had marked down their way of living and their zeal for religion. He had studied the matter of the mint, with the exchange and value of money; so that he understood it well, as appears by his Journal. He also understood fortification and designed well. He knew all the harbours and ports both of his own dominions and of France and Scotland; and how much water they had, and what was the way of coming into them. He had acquired great knowledge in foreign affairs; so that he talked with the ambassadors about them in such a manner that they filled all the world with the highest opinion of him that was possible; which appears in most of the histories of that age. He had great quickness of apprehension; and being mistrustful of his memory, used to take notes of almost everything he heard; he writ these first in Greek characters, that those about him might not understand them; and afterwards writ them out in his Journal. . . . King Edward was tender and compassionate in a high measure; so that he was much against the taking away the lives of heretics; and therefore said to Cranmer, when he persuaded him to sign the warrant for the burning of Joan of Kent, that he was not willing to do it, because he thought that was to send her quick to hell. He expressed great tenderness to the miseries of the poor in his sickness, as hath been already shewn. He took particular care of the suits of all poor persons; and gave Dr Cox special charge to see that their petitions were speedily answered, and consult with him how to get their matters: He was an exact keeper of his word; and appears by his Journal, was most careful debts, and to keep his credit, knowing that chief nerve of government; since a prince his faith, and loses his credit, has thrown up he can never recover, and made himself lipetual distrusts and extreme contempt.

Archbishop Leighton.

He was the son of Dr Leighton, who ha bishop Laud's time writ Zion's Plea against for which he was condemned in the Star have his ears cut and his nose slit. He wa a violent and ungoverned heat. He sent hi Robert to be bred in Scotland, who was saint from his youth up. He had great a parts, a lively apprehension, with a charmin thought and expression. He had the greate of the purest Latin that ever I knew in any was a master both in Greek and Hebrew, whole compass of theological learning, ch study of the Scriptures. But that which the rest, he came to be possessed with the noblest sense of divine things that I ever man. He had no regard to his person, ui to mortify it by a constant low diet, that perpetual fast. He had a contempt both c reputation. He seemed to have the lowest himself possible, and to desire that all ot should think as meanly of him as he himse bore all sort of ill-usage and reproach like took pleasure in it. He had so subdued heat of his temper, that in a great variety c and in a course of 22 years' intimate conve him, I never observed the least sign of passic one single occasion. He brought himself in posed a gravity, that I never saw him lau seldom smile. And he kept himself in sucl recollection, that I do not remember that e him say one idle word. There was a visilin all he said to raise his own mind, and th versed with, to serious reflections. He seem perpetual meditation. And though the w of his life was strict and ascetical, yet he of the sourness of temper that generally poss that sort. He was the freest of superstition, others, or of imposing his own methods on sible; so that he did not so much as recon to others. He said there was a diversity and every man was to watch over his own, it in the best manner he could. When I divine matters, which he did almost pe was in such an elevating manner that I reflected on these words, and felt somewha within myself while I was with him, Did no burn within us while he talked with us b His thoughts were lively, oft out of the w prising, yet just and genuine. And he had I in his memory the greatest treasure of the bes of all the ancient sayings of the heathens Christians, that I have ever known any ma and he used them in the aptest manner pe had been bred up with the greatest aversion to the whole frame of the Church of Engl

I his father sent him to travel. He spent some France, and spoke that language like one born He came afterwards and settled in Scotland, i Presbyterian ordination; but he quickly broke the prejudices of his education. His preaching sublimity both of thought and expression in it; we all, the grace and gravity of his pronunciation ch that few heard him without a very sensible : I am sure I never did. It was so different l others, and indeed from every thing that one ope to rise up to, that it gave a man an indignahimself and all others. It was a very sensible tion to me, and for some time after I heard him, not bear the thought of my own performances, out of countenance when I was forced to think thing. His style was rather too fine: but there najesty and beauty in it that left so deep an on, that I cannot yet forget the sermons I heard ach thirty years ago. And yet with all this he to look on himself as so ordinary a preacher, ile he had a cure he was ready to employ all and when he was a bishop, he chose to preach auditories, and would never give notice before-He had indeed a very low voice, and so could eard by a great crowd. He soon came to see follies of the presbyterians and to hate their t, particularly the imposing it, and their fury all who differed from them.

his coming to me [in London], I was amazed im, at above 70, look so fresh and well, that age as it were to stand still with him: his hair was :k, and all his motions were lively: he had the ickness of thought and strength of memory, but l the same heat and life of devotion, that I had a in him. When I took notice to him upon my ng him how well he looked, he told me he was r his end for all that, and his work and journey re now almost done. This at that time made no pression on me. He was the next day taken oppression, and as it seemed with a cold, with tches, which was indeed a pleurisy, but was not so by himself. So he sent for no physician, but common things for a cold. Lord Perth went to id he was almost suffocated while he was with he recovered himself, and, as Dr Fall, who was ld me, he spoke to him with a greater force than I even in him, recommending to him both firmreligion and moderation in government, which 1at lord somewhat, but the impression was soon ext day Leighton sunk so that both speech e went away of a sudden: and he continued about twelve hours, and then died without r convulsions. I was by him all the while. lost him who had been for so many years the de of my whole life. He had lived ten years x, in great privacy, dividing his time wholly study and retirement and the doing of good; he parish where he lived, and in the parishes bout, he was always employed in preaching sading of prayers. He distributed all he had in choosing rather to have it go through other hands than his own; for I was his almoner on. He had gathered a well-chosen library of as well as useful books, which he left to the of Dumblane for the use of the clergy there, that country being ill furnished with books. He lamented oft to me the stupidity that he observed among the commons of England, who seemed to be much more insensible in the matters of religion than the commons of Scotland were. He retained still a particular inclination to Scotland; and if he had seen any prospect of doing good there, he would have gone and lived and died among them. . . .

There were two remarkable circumstances in his death. He used often to say, that if he were to choose a place to die in, it should be an inn; it looking like a pilgrim's going home, to whom this world was all as an inn, and who was weary with the noise and confusion in it. He added, that the officious tenderness and care of friends was an entanglement to a dying man; and that the unconcerned attendance of such as could be procured in such a place would give less disturbance. And he obtained what he desired, for he died at the Bell Inn in Warwick Lane. Another circumstance was, that while he was bishop in Scotland, he took what his tenants were pleased to pay him: so that there was a great arrear due, which was raised slowly by one whom he left in trust with his affairs there: and the last payment that he could expect from thence was returned up to him about six weeks before his death: so that his provision and journey failed both at once.

Leighton's wish must have been quite independent of the couplet in Dryden's Palamon and Arcite (1699):

'Like pilgrims to the appointed place we tend;
The world's an inn and death the journey's end'— which is a paraphrase of Chaucer's,

'This world nys but a thurghfare ful of wo, And we been pilgrymes passynge to and fro; Deeth is an end of every worldly score;

but only in form contrasts with Sir Thomas Browne's, 'For the world, I count it not an inn but an hospital, and a place not to live but to die in.' And Cicero said, 'Ex hac vita discedo tanquam ex hospitio, non tanquam ex domo.' Shenstone's 'Warmest welcome in an inn' belongs to a very different category.

Character of Charles II.

Thus lived and died King Charles II. He was the greatest instance in history of the various revolutions of which any one man seemed capable. He was bred up the first twelve years of his life with the splendour that became the heir of so great a crown. After that he passed through eighteen years in great inequalities; unhappy in the war, in the loss of his father, and of the crown of England. Scotland did not only receive him, though upon terms hard of digestion, but made an attempt upon England for him, though a feeble one. He lost the battle of Worcester with too much indifference; and then he shewed more care of his person than became one who had so much at stake. He wandered about England for ten weeks after that, hid from place to place; but, under all the apprehensions he had then upon him, he shewed a temper so careless, and so much turned to levity, that he was then diverting himself with little household sports, in as unconcerned a manner as if he had made no loss, and had been in no danger at all. He got at last out of England: but he had been obliged to so many who had been faithful to him, and careful of him, that he seemed afterwards to resolve to make an equal return to them all; and finding it not so easy to reward them all as they deserved, he forgot them all alike. Most princes seem to have this pretty deep in them, and think that they ought never to remember past services, but that their acceptance of them is a full reward. He, of all in our age, exerted this piece of prerogative in the amplest manner; for he never seemed to charge his memory or to trouble his thoughts with the sense of any of the services that had been done him. While he was abroad, at Paris, Cologne, or Brussels, he never seemed to lay anything to heart. He pursued all his diversions and irregular pleasures in a free career, and seemed to be as serene under the loss of a crown as the greatest philosopher could have been. Nor did he willingly hearken to any of those projects with which he often complained that his chancellor persecuted him. That in which he seemed most concerned was, to find money for supporting his expense. So that it was often said, that if Cromwell would have compounded the matter, and had given him a good round pension, that he might have been induced to resign his title to him. During his exile he delivered himself so entirely to his pleasures, that he became incapable of application. He spent little of his time in reading or study, and yet less in thinking; and in the state his affairs were then in, he accustomed himself to say to every person, and upon all occasions, that which he thought would please them. So that words or promises went very easily from him, and he had so ill an opinion of mankind, that he thought the great art of living and governing was to manage all things and all persons with a depth of craft and dissimulation. And in that few men in the world could put on the appearances of sincerity better than he could; under which so much artifice was usually hid, that in conclusion he could deceive none, for all were become mistrustful of him. He had great vices, but scarce any virtues to correct them. He had in him some vices that were less hurtful, which corrected his more hurtful ones. He was during the active part of life given up to sloth and lewdness to such a degree that he hated business, and could not bear the engaging in any thing that gave him much trouble, or put him under any constraint; and though he desired to become absolute, and to overturn both our religion and our laws, yet he would neither run the risk, nor give himself the trouble, which so great a design required. He had an appearance of gentleness in his outward deportment; but he seemed to have no bowels nor tenderness in his nature, and in the end of his life he became cruel. He was apt to forgive all crimes, even blood itself, yet he never forgave any thing that was done against himself, after his first and general act of indemnity, which was to be reckoned as done rather upon maxims of state than inclinations of mercy. He delivered himself up to a most enormous course of vice, without any sort of restraint, even from the consideration of the nearest relations: and the most studied extravagances that way seemed to the very last to be much delighted in and pursued by him. He had the art of making all people grow fond of him at first, by a softness in his whole way of conversation, as he was certainly the best bred man of the age: but when it appeared how little could be built on his promise, they were cured of the fondness that he was apt to raise in them. When he saw young men of quality that had something more than ordinary in them, he drew them about him, and set himself to corrupt them both in religion and morality; in which he proved so unhappily successful, that he left England much changed at his death from what he had found it at his restoration.

He loved to talk over all the stories of his life t new man that came about him. His stay in S and the share he had in the war of Paris [was Fronde], in carrying messages from the one the other, were his common topics. He were these in a very graceful manner, but so oft so copiously, that all those who had been long tomed to them grew very weary of them; and v entered on those stories, they usually withdrew: he often began them in a full audience, and he had done, there were not above four or ! about him: which drew a severe jest from ' Earl of Rochester. He said he wondered to se have so good a memory as to repeat the san without losing the least circumstance, and remember that he had told it to the same pervery day before. This made him fond of strang they hearkened to all his often-repeated stories, a away as in a rapture at such an uncommon conde in a king.

His person and temper, his vices as well as his f resemble the character that we have given us of ' so much, that it were easy to draw the parallel them. Tiberius his banishment, and his comin wards to reign, makes the comparison in that come pretty near. His hating of business, and of pleasures, his raising of favourites and trusting entirely, and his pulling them down, and hatir excessively; his art of covering deep designs, part of revenge, with an appearance of softness, bring so near a likeness, that I did not wonder much to the resemblance of their face and person. At saw one of the last statues made for Tiberius, had lost his teeth; but bating the alteration wh made, it was so like King Charles that Prince F and Signior Dominico, to whom it belonged, di with me in thinking that it looked like a statu for him. Few things ever went near his hear Duke of Gloucester's death seemed to touch him but those who knew him best thought it was he had lost that by which only he could have t the surviving brother, whom he hated, and yet broiled all his affairs to preserve the succession to

His ill conduct in the first Dutch war, an terrible calamities of the plague and fire of Londo that loss and reproach which he suffered by th at Chatham, made all people conclude there was upon his government. His throwing the public at that time upon Lord Clarendon was both unj ingrateful. And when his people had brought ! of all his difficulties upon his entering into th alliance, his selling that to France, and his ente the second Dutch war with as little colour as he the first, his beginning it with the attempt on the Smyrna fleet, the shutting up the exchequer, declaration for toleration, which was a step introduction of popery, was such a chain o actions, flowing from blacker designs, that it those who had known all this to see with what ir strains of flattery addresses were penned during and yet more grossly after his death. His cont so much to the raising the greatness of France at sea, was such an error, that it could not fle want of thought, or of true sense. Ruvigny he desired that all the methods the French tool increase and conduct of their naval force might nd he said he seemed to study them with concern . He shewed what errors they committed, and y ought to be corrected, as if he had been a to France, rather than a king that ought to atched over and prevented that progress they is the greatest of all the mischiefs that could to him or to his people. They that judged the avourably of this thought it was done out of to the Dutch, that with the assistance of so fleet as France could join to his own he might to destroy them. But others put a worse conn on it; and thought that, seeing he could not aster or deceive his subjects by his own strength magement, he was willing to help forward the ss of the French at sea, that by their assistance it more certainly subdue his own people; accordwhat was generally believed to have fallen from lifford, that if the king must be in a dependance, etter to pay it to a great and generous king, than undred of his own insolent subjects.

art of his character looked wickeder as well as than that he, all the while that he was professing f the Church of England, expressing both zeal ction to it, yet secretly reconciled to the Church e; thus mocking God, and deceiving the world gross a prevarication. And his not having the or courage to own it at the last; and not shewing of the least remorse for his ill-led life, or any se either for his subjects in general, or for the had his servants; and his recommending only his and bastards to his brother's care, would have trange conclusion to any other life, but was well suited to all the other parts of his.

ntioned, in the relation of the former year, the oming out of his own country; on which I will large. He came this winter over to England, ed some months among us. I waited often on d was ordered both by the king and the archand bishops to attend upon him, and to offer h informations of our religion and constitution is willing to receive. I had good interpreters, so uch free discourse with him. He is a man of a t temper, soon inflamed, and very brutal in his

He raises his natural heat by drinking much which he rectifies himself with great application; ibject to convulsive motions all over his body, head seems to be affected with these; he wants acity, and has a larger measure of knowledge ght be expected from his education, which was ifferent; a want of judgment, with an instability er, appear in him too often and too evidently; chanically turned, and seems designed by nature be a ship-carpenter than a great prince. This chief study and exercise while he stayed here; aght much with his own hands, and made all im work at the models of ships. He told me he i a great fleet at Azuph, and with it to attack kish empire; but he did not seem capable of ing so great a design, though his conduct in his nce this has discovered a greater genius in him peared at that time. He was desirous to underur doctrine, but he did not seem disposed to latters in Moscovy. He was indeed resolved to ge learning, and to polish his people by sending some of them to travel in other countries, and to draw strangers to come and live among them. He seemed apprehensive still of his sister's intrigues. There was a mixture both of passion and severity in his temper. He is resolute, but understands little of war, and seemed not at all inquisitive that way. After I had seen him often, and had conversed much with him, I could not but adore the depth of the providence of God, that had raised up such a furious man to so absolute an authority over so great a part of the world.

David, considering the great things God had made for the use of man, broke out into the meditation: 'What is man that thou art so mindful of him?' But here there is an occasion for reversing these words, since man seems a very contemptible thing in the sight of God, while such a person as the Czar has such multitudes put, as it were, under his feet, exposed to his restless jealousy and savage temper. He went from hence to the court of Vienna, where he purposed to have stayed some time; but he was called home sooner than he had intended, upon a discovery or a suspicion of intrigues managed by his sister. The strangers to whom he trusted most were so true to him that those designs were crushed before he came back. But on this occasion he let loose his fury on all whom he suspected. Some hundreds of them were hanged all round Moscow; and it was said that he cut off many heads with his own hand, and so far was he from relenting or shewing any sort of tenderness that he seemed delighted with it. How long he is to be the scourge of that nation or of his neighbours God only knows. So extraordinary an incident will, I hope, justify such a digression.

Character of William III.

Thus lived and died William the Third, King of Great Britain, and Prince of Orange. He had a thin and weak body, was brown-haired, and of a clear and delicate constitution. He had a Roman eagle nose, bright and sparkling eyes, a large front, and a countenance composed to gravity and authority. All his senses were critical and exquisite. He was always asthmatical; and the dregs of the small-pox falling on his lungs, he had a constant deep cough. His behaviour was solemn and serious, seldom cheerful, and but with a few. He spoke little and very slowly, and most commonly with a disgusting dryness, which was his character at all times, except in a day of battle; for then he was all fire, though without passion; he was then everywhere, and looked to everything. He had no great advantage from his education. De Witt's discourses were of great use to him; and he, being apprehensive of the observation of those who were looking narrowly into everything he said or did, had brought himself under a habitual caution that he could never shake off; though in another scene it proved as hurtful as it was then necessary to his affairs. He spoke Dutch, French, English, and German equally well; and he understood the Latin, Spanish, and Italian, so that he was well fitted to command armies composed of several nations. He had a memory that amazed all about him, for it never failed him; he was an exact observer of man and things; his strength lay rather in a true discerning and a sound judgment, than in imagination or invention; his designs were always great and good. But it was thought he trusted too much to that, and that he did not descend enough to the humours of his people to make himself and his notions more acceptable to them. This in a government that has so much of freedom in it as ours was more necessary than he was inclined to believe. His reservedness grew on him, so that it disgusted most of those who served him; but he had observed the errors of too much talking, more than those of too cold a silence. He did not like contradiction nor to have his actions censured; but he loved to employ and favour those who had the arts of complacence, yet he did not love flatterers. His genius lay chiefly to war, in which his courage was more admired than his conduct. Great errors were often committed by him; but his heroical courage set things right, as it inflamed those who were about him. He was too lavish of money on some occasions, both in his buildings and to his favourites, but too sparing in rewarding services, or in encouraging those who brought intelligence. He was apt to take ill impressions of people, and these stuck long with him; but he never carried them to indecent revenges. He gave too much way to his own humour almost in everything, not excepting that which related to his own health. He knew all foreign affairs well, and understood the state of every court in Europe very particularly. He instructed his own ministers himself, but he did not apply enough to affairs at home. He tried how he could govern us by balancing the two parties one against another; but he came at last to be persuaded that the Tories were irreconcilable to him, and he was resolved to try and trust them no more. He believed the truth of the Christian religion very firmly, and he expressed a horror at atheism and blasphemy; and though there was much of both in his court, yet it was always denied to him and kept out of sight. He was most exemplarily decent and devout in the public exercises of the worship of God; only on week-days he came too seldom to them. He was an attentive hearer of sermons, and was constant in his private prayers and in reading the Scriptures; and when he spoke of religious matters, which he did not often, it was with a becoming gravity. He was much possessed with the belief of absolute decrees. He said to me he adhered to these because he did not see how the belief of Providence could be maintained upon any other supposition. His indifference as to the forms of church-government and his being zealous for toleration, together with his cold behaviour towards the clergy, gave them generally very ill impressions of him. In his deportment towards all about him he seemed to make little distinction between the good and the bad, and those who served well or those who served him ill. He loved the Dutch, and was much beloved among them; but the ill returns he met from the English nation, their jealousies of him, and their perverseness towards him, had too much soured his mind, and had in a great measure alienated him from them; which he did not take care enough to conceal, though he saw the ill effects this had upon his business. He grew in his last years too remiss and careless as to all affairs, till the treacheries of France awakened him, and the dreadful conjunction of the monarchies gave so loud an alarm to all Europe: for a watching over that court, and a bestirring himself against their practices, was the prevailing passion of his whole life. Few men had the art of concealing and governing passion more than he had; yet few men had stronger passions, which were seldom felt but by inferior servants, to whom he usually made such recompenses for any sudden or indecent vents he might give his anger, that they were glad at ever time that it broke upon them. He was too easy to th faults of those about him when they did not lie in h: own way, or cross any of his designs; and he was so ar to think that his ministers might grow insolent if the should find that they had much credit with him, that h seemed to have made it a maxim to let them often fee how little power they had even in small matters. H favourites had a more entire power, but he accustome them only to inform him of things, but to be sparing i offering advice except when it was asked. It was no easy to account for the reasons of the favour that h shewed in the highest instances to two persons beyon all others, the Earls of Portland and Albemarle, the being in all respects men not only of different, by of opposite characters; secrecy and fidelity were th only qualities in which it could be said that they di in any sort agree. I have now run through the chi branches of his character. I had occasion to know his well, having observed him very carefully in a course of sixteen years. I had a large measure of his favour, ar a free access to him all the while, though not at a times to the same degree. The freedom that I use with him was not always acceptable; but he saw that served him faithfully; so after some intervals of cole ness, he always returned to a good measure of confidence in me. I was in many great instances much obliged t him; but that was not my chief bias to him; I cos sidered him as a person raised up by God to resi the power of France and the progress of tyranny ar persecution. The series of the five Princes of Orang that was now ended in him was the noblest successic of heroes that we find in any history. And the thirt years from the year 1672 to his death, in which 1 acted so great a part, carry in them so many amazin steps of a glorious and distinguishing Providence the in the words of David he may be called 'The man o God's right hand, whom he made strong for himself After all the abatements that may be allowed for hi errors and faults, he ought still to be reckoned among the greatest princes that our history or indeed that any other can afford. He died in a critical time for his own glory, since he had formed a great alliance and had projected the whole scheme of the war; so that if it succeeds, a great part of the honour of it will be ascribed to him; and if otherwise, it will be said he was the soul of the alliance that did both animate and knit it together, and that it was natural for that body to die and fall asunder when he who gave it life was with drawn. Upon his death, some moved for a magnificen funeral; but it seemed not decent to run into un necessary expense when we were entering on a wa that must be maintained at a vast charge; so a privat funeral was resolved on. But for the honour of hi memory, a noble monument and an equestrian statu were ordered. Some years must shew whether the things were really intended, or if they were only spok of to excuse the privacy of his funeral, which was scare decent, so far was it from being magnificent.

The candid Dr Routh's Clarendon Press edition (1823 and 183; in which the suppressed passages were restored, was long the standard of My Oun Time; on it was based that by Mr Osmun Airy's edition (vols. i. and ii. 1897-1900). A revised edition of the History of the Reformation was published in 1865. The Dictional of National Biography specifies, out of his very numerous public tions theological or political, twenty-eight as his principal world Of sermons he printed over fifty.

Jekn Tilletson (1630-94), Archbishop of Canterbury, was the son of a clothier at Sowerby pear Halifax, and was brought up in the Calvinistic fath of the Puritans. At Clare Hall, Cambridge, hsearly opinions were modified by Chillingworth's Religion of the Protestants; and though at the Savoy Conference (1661) he still ranked with the Presbyterians, on the Act of Uniformity in 1662 be submitted without hesitation and accepted a curacy. He very quickly became noted as a preacher, and began to rise in the Church. In 1663 he became rector of Keddington in Suffolk: it was when (1664) he became preacher at Lincoln's Im that his sermons attracted attention, though his mild and evangelical, but undoctrinal, theology provoked criticism. In 1670 he became Prebenday, m 1672 Dean, of Canterbury. He used his influence in favour of the Nonconformists, whom he was anxious to bring within the pale of the Establishment: but his efforts led to nothing but disappointment. Meanwhile he had married a piece of Oliver Cromwell. His moderate principles commended him to William III., who made him Clerk of the Closet in 1689, and Dean of St Paul's. In 1691 he was raised to the see of Canterbury, vacant by the death of the Nonjuror Sancroft. He accepted the elevation with the greatest reluctance, and the insults of the Nonjurors to the end of his life, three years after, extorted neither complaint nor retaliation. As Archbishop he exerted himself to remove the abuses in the Church, such as nonresidence among the clergy; and these efforts and his latitudinarianism excited much enmity. His Semons, his widow's sole endowment, were purchased by a bookseller for no less than two thouand five hundred guineas, and for long were the most popular of English sermons. Tillotson's style is frequently careless and languid, and he lacks the power and humour of Barrow and South: yet there is in him such manifest sincerity, earnestness, kindliness, simplicity, and freedom from affectation that the Sermons well deserved the popularity they copyed in an unenthusiastic age. Whitefield, the spostle of a more fervid faith, saw in him the conspicuous representative of the lukewarmness of eighteenth-century religion, and called him 'that traitor who sold his Lord'-a judgment he afterwards repented as unjust. Contemporary judgment was summed up by Burnet: 'He was not only the best preacher of the age, but seemed to have brought preaching to perfection; his sermons were so well heard and liked, and so much read, that all the nation proposed him as a pattern, and studied to copy after him.' Voltaire reported him the wisest and most eloquent of English preachers: and Addison said he was 'the most eminent and useful author of the age we live in.' Dryden, born the year after him, used with undue modesty to say that what talent he had for English prose was due to his familiarity with Tillotson. Locke recommended him as a model of perspicuity and propriety; his most notable difference from great Truth and reality have all the advantages of appearance, and many more. If the show of anything be good for anything, I am sure sincerity is better: for why does any man dissemble or seem to be that which he is not but because he thinks it good to have such a quality as he pretends to? for to counterfeit and dissemble is to put on the appearance of some real excellency. Now the best way in the world for a man to seem to be anything is really to be what he would seem to be. Besides that it is many times as troublesome to make good the pretence of a good quality as to have it; and if a man have it not, it is ten to one but he is discovered to want it, and then all his pains and labour to seem to have it is lost. There is something unnatural in paining, which a skilful eye will easily discern from native beauty and complexion.

It is hard to personate and act a part long; for where truth is not at the bottom, nature will always be endeavouring to return, and will peep out and betray herself one time or other. Therefore if any man think it convenient to seem good, let him be so indeed, and then his goodness will appear to everybody's satisfaction; for truth is convincing, and carries its own light and evidence along with it; and will not only commend us to every man's conscience, but, which is much more, to God, who searcheth and seeth our hearts. So that upon all accounts sincerity is true wisdom. Particularly as to the affairs of this world, integrity bath many advantages over all the fine and artificial ways of dissimulation and deceit; it is much the plainer and easier, much the safer and more secure way of dealing in the world; it has less of trouble and difficulty, of entanglement and perplexity, of danger and hazard in it; it is the shortest and nearest way to our end, carrying us thither in a straight line, and will hold out and last longest. The arts of deceit and cunning do continually grow weaker, and less effectual and serviceable to them that use them; whereas integrity gains strength by use; and the more and longer any man practiseth it, the greater service it does him, by confirming his reputation, and encouraging those with whom he hath to do to repose the greater trust and confidence in him, which is an unspeakable advantage in the business and affairs of life. . . .

Truth is always consistent with itself, and needs nothing to help it out; it is always near at hand, and sits upon our lips, and is ready to drop out before we are aware: whereas a lie is troublesome, and sets a man's invention upon the rack, and one trick needs a great many more to make it good. It is like building upon a false foundation, which continually stands in need of props to shore it up, and proves at last more chargeable than to have raised a substantial building at first upon a true and solid foundation; for sincerity is firm and substantial, and there is nothing hollow or unsound in it, and because it is plain and open, fears no discovery; of which the crafty man is always in danger; and when he thinks he walks in the dark, all his pretences are so transparent, that he that runs may read them. He is the last man that finds himself to be found out; and whilst he takes it for granted that he makes fools of others, he renders himself ridiculous.

Add to all this, that sincerity is the most compendious wisdom, and an excellent instrument for the speedy despatch of business; it creates confidence in those we have to deal with, saves the labour of many inquiries, and brings things to an issue in few words; it is like travelling in a plain, beaten road, which commonly brings a man sooner to his journey's end than byways, in which men often lose themselves. In a word, whatsoever convenience may be thought to be in falsehood and dissimulation, it is soon over; but the inconvenience of it is perpetual, because it brings a man under an everlasting jealousy and suspicion, so that he is not believed when he speaks truth, nor trusted perhaps when he means honestly. When a man has once forfeited the reputation of his integrity, he is set fast, and nothing will then serve his turn, neither truth nor falsehood. And I have often thought that God hath, in his great wisdom, hid from men of false and dishonest minds the wonderful advantages of truth and integrity to the prosperity even of our worldly affairs. These men are so blinded by their covetousness and ambition, that they cannot look beyond a present advantage, nor forbear to seize upon it, though by ways never so indirect; they cannot see so far as to the remote consequences of a steady integrity, and the vast benefit and advantages which it will bring a man at last. Were but this sort of men wise and clear-sighted enough to discern this, they would be honest out of very knavery, not out of any love to honesty and virtue, but with a crafty design to promote and advance more effectually their own interests; and therefore the justice of the divine providence hath hid this truest point of wisdom from their eyes, that bad men might not be upon equal terms with the just and upright, and serve their own wicked designs by honest and lawful means.

Indeed, if a man were only to deal in the world for a day, and should never have occasion to converse more with mankind, never more need their good opinion or good word, it were then no great matter—speaking as to the concernments of this world—if a man spent his reputation all at once, and ventured it at one throw: but if he be to continue in the world, and would have the advantage of conversation whilst he is in it, let him make use of truth and sincerity in all his words and actions; for nothing but this will last and hold out to the end: all other arts will fail, but truth and integrity will carry a man through and bear him out to the last.

Louis XIV. and William III.: a Contrast.

You have heard two sorts of persons described in the text by very different characters; the one that glory in their wisdom, and might, and riches; the other, that glory in this, that they understand and know God to be the Lord, which exerciseth loving-kindness, and judgment, and righteousness in the earth. And we have seen these two characters exemplified, or rather drawn to the life, in this present age. We who live in this western part of Christendom have seen a mighty prince by the just permission of God raised up to be a terror and scourge to all his neighbours; a prince who had in perfection all the advantages mentioned in the former part of the text; and who, in the opinion of many who had been long dazzled with his splendor and greatness, hath passed for many years for the most politic, and powerful, and richest monarch that hath appeared in these parts of the world for many ages. \ governed his affairs by the deepest and counsels, and the most refined wisdom of th A prince mighty and powerful in his pr for war; formidable for his vast and well c armies, and for his great naval force; and brought the art of war almost to that perfect be able to conquer and do his business without a mystery hardly known to former ages and ge and all this skill and strength united under one will, not hampered or bound up by any restrain or conscience. Let us now turn our view to the other part of and behold a greater than he is here; a prince different character, who does understand and l to be the Lord, which does exercise loving judgment, and righteousness in the earth; and made it the great study and endeavour of h imitate these divine perfections, as far as the im of human nature in this mortal state will admit greater than he is here; who never said or did lent thing, but instead of despising his enemies, all occasions encountered them with an undaur This is the man whom (and resolution. honoured to give a check to this mighty ma earth, and to put a hook into the nostrils of leviathan, who has so long had his pastime ir But we will not insult, as he once did in a princely manner over a man much better than when he believed him to have been slain at th And indeed death came then as near to hir possible without killing him. True Wisdom.

That is the truest wisdom of a man which doth most conduce to the happiness of life. For wisdom as it refers to action lies in the proposal of a right end, and the choice of the most proper means to attain it. Which end doth not refer to any one part of a man's life, but to the whole as taken together. He therefore only deserves the name of a wise man, not that considers how to be rich and great when he is poor and mean, nor how to be well when he is sick, nor how to escape a present danger, nor how to compass a particular design; but he that considers the whole course of his life together, and what is fit for him to make the end of it, and by what means he may best enjoy the happiness of it. I confess it is one great part of a wise man never to propose too much happiness to himself here: for whoever doth so is sure to find himself deceived, and consequently is so much more miserable as he fails in his greatest expectations. But since God did not make men on purpose to be miserable, since there is a great difference as to men's conditions, since that difference depends very much on their own choice, there is a great deal of reason to place true wisdom in the choice of those things which tend most to the comfort and happiness of life.

That which gives a man the greatest satisfaction in what he doth, and either prevents or lessens or makes him more easily bear the troubles of life, doth the most conduce to the happiness of it. It was a bold saying of Epicurus, That it is more desirable to be miserable by acting according to reason than to be happy in going against it; and I cannot tell how it can well agree with his notion of felicity: but it is a certain truth that in the consideration of happiness the satisfaction of a man's own mind doth weigh down all the external accidents of life. For suppose a man to have riches and honours as great as Ahashuerus bestowed on his highest favourite Haman; yet by his sad instance we find that a small discontent when the mind suffers it to encrease and to spread its venom, doth so weaken the power of reason, disorder the passions, make a man's life so uneasy to him as to precipitate him from the height of his fortune into the depth of ruin. But on the other side, if we suppose a man to be always pleased with his condition, to enjoy an even and quiet mind in every state, being neither lifted up with prosperity, nor cast down with adversity, he is really happy in comparison with the other. It is a mere speculation to discourse of any complete happiness in this world; but that which doth either lessen the number, or abate the weight, or take off the malignity of the troubles of life, doth contribute very much to that degree of happiness which may be expected

The integrity and simplicity of a man's mind doth all this. Firstly, it gives the greatest satisfaction to a man's own mind. For although it be impossible for a man not to be liable to error and mistake, yet if he doth mistake with an innocent mind, he hath the comfort of his innocency when he thinks himself bound to correct his error. But if a man prevaricates with himself and acts against the sense of his own mind, tho' his conscience did not judge aright at that time, yet the goodness of the bare act with respect to the rule will not prevent the sting that follows the want of inward integrity in doing it. The back-shder in heart, saith Solomon, shall be filled with his own ways, but a good man shall be satisfied from himself. The doing just and worthy and generous things without any sinister ends and designs leaves a most agreeable pleasure to the mind, like that of a constant health which is better felt than expressed. When a man applies his mind to the knowledge of his duty, and when he doth understand it (as it is not hard for an honest mind to do, for as the oracle answered the servant who desired to know how he might please his master, If you will seek it, you will be sure to find it), sets himself with a firm resolution to pursue it, though the rain falls, and the floods arise, and the winds blow on every side of him, yet he enjoys peace and quiet within, notwithstanding all the noise and blustring abroad; and is sure to hold out after all, because he is founded upon a rock. But take one that endeavours to blind, or corrupt, or master his conscience, to make it serve some mean end or design; what uneasy reflections hath he upon himself; what perplexing thoughts, what tormenting fears, what suspicions and jealousies do disturb his imagination and rack his mind! What art and pains doth such a one take to be believed honest and sincere! and so much the more, because he doth not believe himself: he fears still he hath not given satisfaction enough, and by overdoing it, is the more suspected. . . . Secondly, because integrity doth more become a man, and doth really promote his interest in the world. It is the saying of Dio Chrysostom, an heathen orator, that simplicity and truth is a great and wise thing; but cunning and deceit is foolish and mean; for, saith he, observe the beasts: the more courage and spirit they have, the less art and subtilty they use; but the more timorous and ignoble they are, the more false and deceitful. True wisdom and greatness of mind raises a man above the need of using little tricks and devices. Sincerity and honesty carries one through many difficulties which all the arts he can invent would never help him through. For nothing doth a man more real mischief in the world than to be suspected for too much craft; because every one stands upon his guard against him, and suspects plots and designs where there are none intended; insomuch that though he speaks with all the sincerity that is possible, yet nothing he saith can be believed. . . .

The path of the just, saith the wise man, is as the shining light which shineth more and more unto the perfect day. As the day begins with obscurity and a great mixture of darkness, till by quick and silent motions the light overcomes the mists and vapours of the night, and not only spreads its beams upon the tops of the mountains, but darts them into the deepest and most shady valleys: thus simplicity and integrity may at first appearing look dark and suspicious, till by degrees it breaks through the clouds of envy and detraction, and then shines with a greater glory.

Our Life Long Enough.

Such a long life [as that of the antediluv reconcilable with the present state of the wo the state of the world was before the Flor manner they lived, and how they employed we cannot tell, for Moses has given no accountaking the world as it is and as we find it, I take to convince those men who are most apt . of the shortness of life, that it would not be for happiness of mankind to have it much longe The world is at present very unequally div have a large share and portion of it, others h but what they can earn by very hard labou from other men's charity by their restless im or gain by more ungodly arts. Now thou and prosperous, who have the world at cor live in ease and pleasure, would be very wel to spend some hundred years in this world, ye think fifty or threescore years abundantly slaves and beggars; enough to spend in hunge in a gaol and a prison. And those who are so not to think this enough owe a great deal to and goodness of God that he does. So that t part of mankind have great reason to be con the shortness of life, because they have no ter wish it longer.

adly, The present state of this world required quick succession. The world is pretty well pois divided amongst its present inhabitants; at few in comparison, as I observed before, has siderable share in the division. Now, let us that all our ancestors who lived a hundred of dred years ago were alive still and possesse estates and honours, what had become of the generation of men who have now taken their make as great a show and bustle in the world as they did? And if you look back three or four or five hundred years the case is still so much the worse; the world would be over-peopled; and where there is one poor miserable man now, there must have been five hundred; or the world must have been common, and all men reduced to the same level; which, I believe, the rich and happy people, who are so fond of long life, would not like very well. This would utterly undo our young prodigal heirs, were their hopes of succession three or four hundred years off, who, as short as life is now, think their fathers make very little haste to their graves. would spoil their trade of spending their estates before they have them, and make them live a dull sober life, whether they would or no; and such a life, I know, they don't think worth having. And therefore I hope at least they will not make the shortness of their fathers' lives an argument against providence; and yet such kind of sparks as these are commonly the wits that set up for atheism, and when it is put into their heads, quarrel with everything which they fondly conceive will weaken the belief of a God and a providence, and, among other things, with the shortness of life; which they have little reason to do, when they so often outlive their estates.

34ly, The world is very bad as it is; so bad that good men scarce know how to spend fifty or threescore years in it; but consider how bad it would probably be were the life of man extended to six, seven, or eight hundred years. If so near a prospect of the other world as forty or fifty years cannot restrain men from the greatest villainies, what would they do if they could as reasonably suppose death to be three or four hundred years off? If men make such improvements in wickedness in twenty or thirty years, what would they do in hundreds? And what a blessed place then would this world be to live in! We see in the old world, when the life of men was drawn out to so great a length, the wickedness of mankind grew so insufferable that it repented God he had made man; and he resolved to destroy that whole generation, excepting Noah and his family. And the most probable account that can be given how they came to grow so universally wicked, is the long and prosperous lives of such wicked men, who by degrees compted others, and they others, till there was but one righteous family left, and no other remedy left but to destroy them all; leaving only that righteous family as the seed and future hopes of the new world.

And when God had determined in himself and promised to Noah never to destroy the world again by such a universal destruction till the last and final judgment, it was necessary by degrees to shorten the lives of men, which was the most effectual means to make them more governable, and to remove bad examples out of the world, which would hinder the spreading of the infection, and people and reform the world again by new examples of piety and virtue. For when there are such quick successions of men, there are few ages but have some great and brave examples, which give a new and better spirit to the world.

Advantages of our being kept in Ignorance of the Time of our Death.

For a conclusion of this argument, I shall briefly vindicate the wisdom and goodness of God in concealing from us the time of our death. This we are very apt to complain of, that our lives are so very uncertain, that we know not to-day but that we may die to-morrow; and we would be mighty glad to meet with any one who would certainly inform us in this matter how long we are to live. But if we think a little better of it, we shall be of another mind.

For, 1st, Though I presume many of you would be glad to know that you shall certainly live twenty, or thirty, or forty years longer, yet would it be any comfort to know that you must die to-morrow, or some few months, or a year or two hence? which may be your case for aught you know; and this, I believe, you are not very desirous to know; for how would this chill your blood and spirits! How would it overcast all the pleasures and comforts of life! You would spend your days like men under the sentence of death, while the execution is suspended.

Did all men who must die young certainly know it, it would destroy the industry and improvements of half mankind, which would half destroy the world, or be an insupportable mischief to human societies; for what man who knows that he must die at twenty, or five-andtwenty, a little sooner or later, would trouble himself with ingenious or gainful arts, or concern himself any more with this world than just to live so long in it? And yet, how necessary is the service of such men in the world! What great things do they many times do, and what great improvements do they make! How pleasant and diverting is their conversation, while it is innocent. How do they enjoy themselves, and give life and spirit to the graver age. How thin would our schools, our shops, our universities, and all places of education be, did they know how little time many of them were to live in the world. For would such men concern themselves to learn the arts of living, who must die as soon as they have learnt them? Would any father be at a great expense in educating his child, only that he might die with a little Latin and Greek, logick and philosophy? No; half the world must be divided into cloisters and nunneries, and nurseries for the grave.

Well, you'll say, suppose that; and is not this an advantage above all the inconveniences you can think of, to secure the salvation of so many thousands who are now eternally ruined by youthful lusts and vanities, but would spend their days in piety and devotion, and make the next world their only care, if they knew how little while they were to live here?

Right: I grant this might be a good way to correct the heat and extravagances of youth, and so it would be to shew them heaven and hell; but God does not think fit to do either, because it offers too much force and violence to men's minds; it is no trial of their virtue, of their reverence for God, of their conquests and victory over this world by the power of faith, but makes religion a matter of necessity, not of choice: now God will force and drive no man to heaven; the gospel dispensation is the trial and discipline of ingenuous spirits; and if the certain hopes and fears of another world, and the uncertainty of our living here, will not conquer these flattering temptations and make men seriously religious, as those who must certainly die and go into another world, and they know not how soon, God will not try whether the certain knowledge of the time of their death will make them religious. That they may die young, and that thousands do so, is reason enough to engage young men to expect death and prepare for it; if they will venture, they must take their chance, and not say they had no warning of dying young, if they eternally miscarry by their wilful delays.

And besides this, God expects our youthful service and obedience, though we were to live on till old age; that we may die young is not the proper, much less the only reason why we should 'remember our Creator in the days of our youth,' but because God has a right to our youthful strength and vigour; and if this will not oblige us to an early piety, we must not expect that God will set death in our view, to fright and terrify us: as if the only design God had in requiring our obedience was, not that we might live like reasonable creatures to the glory of their Maker and Redeemer, but that we might repent of our sins time enough to escape hell. God is so merciful as to accept of returning prodigals, but does not think fit to encourage us in sin by giving us notice when we shall die, and when it is time to think of repentance.

2dly, Tho' I doubt not but that it would be a great pleasure to you to know that you should live till old age, yet consider a little with yourselves, and then tell me whether you yourselves can judge it wise and fitting for God to let you know this. I observed to you before what danger there is in flattering ourselves with the hopes of long life; that it is apt to make us too fond of this world, when we expect to live so long in it; that it weakens the hopes and fears of the next world, by removing it at too great a distance from us; that it encourages men to live in sin, because they have time enough before them to indulge their lusts, and to repent of their sins, and make their peace with God before they die; and if the uncertain hopes of this undoes so many men, what would the certain knowledge of it do? Those who are too wise and considerate to be imposed on by such uncertain hopes, might be conquered by the certain knowledge of a long life.

Thomas Sherlock (1678-1761), son of the Dean of St Paul's, was also an eminent preacher and a controversialist theologian. Educated at Eton and St Catharine's Hall, Cambridge, he succeeded his father as Master of the Temple in 1704. In 1715 he became Dean of Chichester, in 1728 Bishop of Bangor, in 1734 of Salisbury, and in 1748 of London. He was a strong Tory, and as such an opponent of his fellow-student Hoadly; he took a very active and conspicuous share in the notorious 'Bangorian controversy' as a spokesman of the High Church view. He was equally zealous against the Deists, writing against them on The Use of Prophecy (1725) and the famous Trial of the Witnesses of the Resurrection of Jesus (1729). latter was mainly in answer to the freethinker Thomas Woolston, a Cambridge Fellow who in a series of publications (1722-25) had carried the allegorising of Scripture so far as to deny the historicity of Christ's resurrection, and in 1729 had been condemned to a fine and the imprisonment from which he never emerged for those discourses on The Miracles of our Saviour which in some measure anticipated the mythical theory of Strauss. The Temple Sermons fill four volumes. was a good bishop and a kindly man; and some of his works, translated into French, were as much esteemed by Catholics as Protestants. By som his literary gift was thought superior to his father's and if his father's style was modern, the son's was more modern still.

We were not long since, some gentlemen of the inma of court, together, each to other so well known that ne man's presence was a confinement to any other from speaking his mind on any subject that happened to arise in conversation. The meeting was without design, and the discourse, as in like cases, various. Among other things we fell on the subject of Woolston's trial and conviction, which had happened some few days before: that led to a debate how the law stands in such cases, what punishment it inflicts; and, in general, whether the law ought at all to interpose in controversies of this kind. We were not agreed in these points. One, who maintained the favorable side to Woolston, discovered a great liking and approbation of his discourses against the miracles of Christ, and seemed to think his arguments To which another replied, I wonder unanswerable. that one of your abilities, and bred to the profession of the law, which teaches us to consider the nature of evidence and its proper weight, can be of that opinion; I am sure you would be unwilling to determine a property of five shillings on such evidence as you now think material enough to overthrow the miracles of

It may easily be imagined that this opened a door to much dispute, and determined the conversation for the remainder of the evening to this subject. The dispute ran through almost all the particulars mentioned in Woolston's pieces; but the thread of it was broken by several digressions, and the pursuit of things which were brought accidentally into the discourse. At length one of the company said, pleasantly, Gentlemen, you do not argue like lawyers; if I were judge in this cause, I would hold you better to the point. The company took the hint, and cried they should be glad to have the cause re-heard, and him to be the judge. The gentlemen who had engaged with mettle and spirit in a dispute which arose accidentally, seemed very unwilling to be drawn into a formal controversy; and especially the gentleman who argued against Woolston thought the matter grew too serious for him, and excused himself from undertaking a controversy in religion, of all others the most momentous; but he was told that the argument should be confined merely to the nature of the evidence, and that might be considered without entering into any such controversy as he would avoid; and to bring the matter within bounds and under one view, the evidence of Christ's resurrection, and the exceptions taken to it, should be the only subject of the conference. With much persuasion he suffered himself to be persuaded, and promised to give the company and their new-made judge a meeting that day fortnight. The judge and the rest of the company were for bringing on the cause a week sooner; but the counsel for Woolston took the matter up, and said, Consider, sir, the gentleman is not to argue out of Littleton, Plowden, or Coke, authors to him well known; but he must have his authorities from Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John; and a fortnight is time little enough of all conscience to gain a familiarity with a new acquaintance; and turning to the gentleman, he said, I will call on you before the fortnight is out, to see how reverend an appearance you make behind Hammond on the New Testament, a Concordance on one hand and a folio Bible with references on the other. You shall be welcome, sir, replied the gentleman, and perhaps you may find some company more to your own taste; he is but a poor counsel who studies one side of the question only, and therefore I will have your friend Woolston, T—I [Tindal], and C——s [Collins] to entertain you when you do me the favor of the visit. On this we parted in good humor, and all pleased with the appointment made, except the two gentlemen who were to provide the entertainment.

Saund Day.—The company met at the time appointed; but it happened in this, as in like cases it often does, that some friends to some of the company, who were not of the party the first day, had got notice of the meeting; and the gentlemen who were to debate the question found they had a more numerous audience than they expected or desired. He especially who was to maintain the evidence of the resurrection began to excuse the necessity he was under of disappointing their expectation, alleging that he was not prepared; and he had persisted in excusing himself but that the strangers who perceived what the case was offered to withdraw, which the gentleman would by no means consent to: they insisting to go, he said he would much rather submit himself to their candor, unprepared as he was, than be guilty of so much rudeness as to force them to leave the company. On which one of the company smiling said, It happens luckily that our number is increased; when we were last together we appointed a judge, but we quite forgot a jury, and now I think we are good men and true, sufficient to make one. This thought was pursued in several allusions to legal proceedings, which created some mirth and had this good effect that it dispersed the solemn air which the mutual compliments on the difficulty before-mentioned had introduced, and restored the ease and good humour natural to the conversation

The judge perceiving the disposition of the company, thought it a proper time to begin, and called out, Gentlemen of the jury, take your places; and immediately seated himself at the upper end of the table. The company sat round him, and the judge called on the counsel for Woolston to begin.

Mr A., counsel for Woolston, addressing himself to the judge, said, May it please your lordship, I conceive the gentleman on the other side ought to begin, and lay his evidence which he intends to maintain before the court; till that is done it is to no purpose for me to object. I may perhaps object to something which he will not admit to be any part of his evidence, and therefore, I apprehend, the evidence ought in the first place to be distinctly stated.

Judge.-Mr B., what say you to that?

Mr B., counsel on the other side.—My Lord, if the evidence I am to maintain were to support any new claim, if I were to gain any thing which I am not already possessed of, the gentleman would be in the right; but the evidence is old, and is matter of record, and I have been long in possession of all that I claim ander it. If the gentleman has any thing to say to dispossess me, let him produce it, otherwise I have no reason to bring my own title into question. And this I take to be the known method of proceeding in such cases; no man is obliged to produce his title to his possession; it is sufficient if he maintains it when it is called in question.

Mr A.—Surely, my lord, the gentleman mistakes the case. I can never admit myself to be out of possession of my understanding and reason; and since he would put me out of this possession, and compel me to admit things incredible in virtue of the evidence he maintains, he ought to set forth his claim or leave the world to be directed by common sense.

Judge.—Sir, you say right; on supposition that the truth of the Christian religion were the point in judgment. In that case it would be necessary to produce the evidence for the Christian religion; but the matter now before the court is whether the objections produced by Mr Woolston are of weight to overthrow the evidence of Christ's resurrection. You see then the evidence of the resurrection is supposed to be what it is on both sides, and the thing immediately in judgment is the value of the objections, and therefore they must be set forth. The court will be bound to take notice of the evidence, which is admitted as a fact on both parts. Go on, Mr A.

Simon Patrick (1626-1707), born at Gainsborough, was educated at Queen's College, Cambridge. There he came under the influence of John Smith, the Cambridge Platonist, then a youthful Fellow, whom he revered till the end of his life. Successively rector of St Paul's, Covent Garden (1662), and Dean of Peterborough (1678), he became Bishop of Chichester (1689) and of Ely (1691). He was a devout and erudite theologian, and a sagacious and catholic Churchman, equally anti-puritan and anti-papal. His sermons, commentaries, and devotional works were long famous; though now they seem prolix enough; amongst them A Brief Exposition of the Ten Commandments and the Lord's Prayer, The Parable of the Pilgrims, The Heart's Ease, The Christian Sacrifice, and The Devout Christian Instructed. He translated some Latin hymns, and wrote a number of religious poems. An autobiography is included in his works (9 vols. Clar. Press, 1858). In it he tells us that his grandfather was a gentleman of good quality and fair estate, as well as a competent scholar, who had fifteen children, for the younger of whom he could accordingly make but slender provision.

He gave his sons a taste of learning, keeping a schoolmaster in his house to instruct them. My father kept such a tincture of it, that though he was bound apprentice to a mercer, yet he was a great lover of books, and read very much to his dying day. He had a great desire to breed me a scholar, and put me early to a master of great fame, but of no great skill in teaching, as I myself found when I came under the tuition of that worthy man Mr Merryweather, who was an excellent Latinist, as he showed by his translation of Religio Medici. But I ought to acknowledge, what my former master wanted in learning he made up in piety. For he touched my heart betimes by his affectionate discourses upon some part of the Church Catechism, which he was wont to explain on Saturday in the afternoon; which I cannot think of without thankfulness to God for those discourses. Before which time my mind was prepared to receive those good instructions, by the care of my godly parents in my very childhood; wherein they endeavoured to instil good principles into me: and I can remember many exhortations which my mother upon all occasions made me to be good, and to avoid the sin of lying and such like; which made such an impression upon me, that I cannot remember I ever disobeyed her in the smallest injunction she laid upon me. She was the daughter of an holy minister in Nottinghamshire, and had been bred up by the rules of the Practice of Piety, a book of great note in those days. To those she laboured to conform me, causing me, for instance, to read to her three chapters in the Bible every day; whereby (reading six psalms when I came there) it was read over every year.

My father constantly prayed with his family morning and evening when he was at home, and when he was abroad my mother thought herself obliged to it; and I can never forget with what warmth she commended us all to God. Especially on the Lord's day they were very strict, and ordered things so that every one went to church; and we having no sermon in the afternoon, my father after prayers was wont to read a sermon at home, and sing psalms both after dinner and after we came from church. Sometimes indeed he would go to hear a sermon in the afternoon in a neighbouring town; for which reason he got the name of a Puritan, but very undeservedly, for I remember very well that the sermons he read at home were some of the famous Dr Sanderson's, which he read over and over with high admiration: and he constantly went to the church where the Common Prayer was read (as it was where we lived), a long time after the beginning of our civil wars without any scruple; and at the return of the king immediately attended them again to the end of his days. This I have often reflected upon as an argument of great judgment in my father, that he should make choice of such a volume of sermons to read constantly, and none else but those he heard in the church, which he wrote and would repeat in his family.

Being thus educated, I had an early sense of religion (blessed be God) imprinted on my mind; which was much increased by my attending to sermons: for having, when I was a school boy, learnt to write in characters, my father required me to take the sermons I heard in that manner, and read them over when I came at home. This, no doubt, fixed my thoughts upon what was delivered, and made me remember it. Insomuch that hearing a rigid sermon about reprobation of the greatest part of mankind, I remember well that when I was a little boy, I resolved if that were true, I would never marry; because most, if not all my children, might be damned.

When I was about twelve years old, I had a most dangerous fever, and there was little hope of my life, when I was extremely troubled that I had neglected often to say my prayers; and I resolved, if God would spare me, to be more careful in time to come, as I think I was. Many other deliverances I had in my very young years, which I shall not here set down, but only mention one which was very remarkable. When I was about thirteen fourteen years old, it was thought I might ve safely ride alone with my father and mother a smi journey. And being set upon a little horse, we we through a gate entering into a large common; the gate being let fall to, gave a great clap, and masuch a noise as frightened my horse and made his run away with me. I sat a good while, but at last threw me, and I fell into a sawpit, which my fath and mother feared might prove my grave. But also blessed be God, I was laid there all at length, at taken up without the least hurt. This I have oft thought of as a singular providence of God over my which I now acknowledge with thankfulness to him.

Not long after it was thought I might be fit ! the university. But the war between king and parl ment breaking out, put by all those thoughts; r father falling into great straits and difficulties. F the town of Gainsborough thought it would be me for their security, if they cast up some works rou the town, and got fire arms, and formed themselv into a company of six score men. But they declar neither for king or parliament, intending only stand upon their guard against rovers. But in short time the garrison of Newark (which was t seventeen miles from it) sent out a strong party w surrounded the town very early in the morning, a demanded it should be instantly surrendered to t king; which was immediately done without the les resistance or dispute. Whereupon our schoolmast fled, and left all his scholars to play; till at last neighbouring minister undertook the charge, who found did not understand so much as ourselves; a besides, sometimes never came among us for thr days together. This made the school break up, an which was worse, there was a great breach in t town by a new oath that was tendered to them. do not remember what it was, but only that r father was one that refused to take it: whereup he was ordered by some furious persons in the cor mittee to leave the town, and not permitted to st and dispose of his wife and children and good He obeyed; but from a neighbouring place sent petition to be delivered by my mother to the Ea of Kingston, who was the governor of the town. H received her with much humanity, and asked he among other things, what made her so cheerful i such a distress; for she did not appear before hi in tears, but with an humble modest confidence. I which she replying that she always had a good hoj in God, and now expected to find favour with h lordship, he immediately revoked the order of the committee, and gave my father leave to return, as to dispose of his family and affairs before he departe When he came back, he found a gentleman in to of singular goodness, and a great friend of his, 5 William Pelham of Brocklesby, who very much piti his condition, and prayed him to leave what mon he had with him, and go with his wife and childr to his house at Brocklesby, where they should kindly entertained. This extraordinary kindness most thankfully embraced, and carried my moth my younger brother and sister, with his goods, Sir William's house; but thought fit to go hims with me to Boston, where he had a cousin w received us into his house.

Here I did but lose my time, and therefore my father, who still in his low condition was desirous to make me a scholar, sent me to Hull, where he had a good friend, Mr Foxley, who, with his wife, were as kind to me as to their own children. There I went to school every day with a master who preserved what learning I had, if he did not add unto it. Mr Foxley, who was an wholesale grocer, had . such an affection to me, as his wife had also, that be offered to take me his apprentice for nothing, if I would be of his trade. This was a great temptaton, he being a great dealer, and a very rich man. But my father was so kind as to leave me to my own choice, and I persisted in my desire to be a scholar, in which Mr Foxley mightily encouraged me, and both he and his wife gave me some pieces of gold, when I went from them to the university: for I had given some proofs of my being religiously incined, which made them, being pious persons, have a more than ordinary love to me. For instance, when Mr Foxley was gone a journey (who always and to pray with his family before he went to bed) I composed a prayer, about the sixteenth year of my age, and said it in the family without book, during his absence. This was highly acceptable to them, as I hope it was well pleasing to God, who thus early duposed me to his service.

But many things hindered my going to the university; for my father was brought still lower, and disabled to muntain me there as he desired. For the parliament soldiers plundering Sir William Pelham's house, took away my father's goods, which were there with my mother, as well as his. Several other losses befell him, and all the country was so infested with soldiers that it was dangerous to travel. Notwithstanding which, my father adventured to carry me round from Boston to Lyna, and so to Cambridge; whereby we passed without any impediment.

It was in the year 1644, when I was between seventeen and eighteen years old, and had some discretion to govern myself. My father had recommendations to Dr Whichcote and Dr Cudworth, of Emanuel College, who, it was hoped, might take me to be their sizer. For my father was so mean then, he could not otherwise maintain me. They were both very kind, and being full themselves, recommended to Queen's College, which was newly filled with fellows from thence. Thither we went, and I was kliows from thence. Minited there June 25th of that year, under Mr Wells, who loved me very well, insomuch that he left me the key of his chamber, and of his study, when he was out of town. Here I found myself in a solitary place at first; for though Mr Fuller, in his Church History, was mistaken in saying this college was like a landwrack (as I think his words are), in which there was [not] one left to keep possession, yet there were about a dozen scholars, and almost half of the old fellows: the visitors at first doing no more than putting in a majority of new to govern the college. The others, rarely appearing, were all turned out for refusing the covenant; which was then so sealously pressed, that all scholars were summoned to take it at Trinity College. Thither I went, and had it tendered to me. But God so directed me, that I, telling them my age, was dismissed, and never heard more of it-blessed be God.

I had not been long in the college before the master, Mr Herbert Palmer, took some notice of me, and sent for me to transcribe some things he intended for the press; and soon after made me the college scribe, which brought me in a great deal of money, many leases being to be renewed. It was not long before I had one of the best scholarships in the college bestowed upon me; so that I was advanced to a higher rank, being made a pensioner. But before I was bachelor of arts this good man died, who was of an excellent spirit, and was unwearied in doing good. Though he was a little crooked man, yet he had such an authority, that the fellows reverenced him as much as we did them, going bare when he passed through the court, which after his death was disused.

I remember very well that, being a member of the assembly of divines, he went off to London, and sometimes stayed there a quarter of a year. But before he went, he was wont to cause the bell to be tolled, to summon us all to meet in the hall. There he made a pathetical speech to us, stirring us up to pious diligence in our studies, and told us, with such seriousness as made us believe, he should have as true an account from those he could trust, of the behaviour of every one of us in his absence, as if he were here present with us to observe us himself. This he said we should certainly find true at his return. And truly he was as good as his word; for those youths whom he heard well of, when he came back to college, he sent for to his lodgings, and commended them; giving books to those that were well maintained, and money to the poorer sort. He was succeeded by a good man (Dr Horton), but not such a governor: under whom I was chosen fellow of the college, when I was one year bachelor of arts; before which time I had been so studious as to fill whole books with observations out of various ancient authors, with some of my own which I made upon them. For I find one book begun in the year 1646, wherein I have noted many useful things, and another more large in the year 1647, having the word Æternitas at the top of many pages, by the thought of which I perceive I was quickened to spend my time well. For I have set down what I did every day, and when I took the liberty to recreate myself.

It is a great comfort now in my old age to find that I was so diligent in my youth; for in those books I have noted how I spent my time. What progress I made in 1648 I cannot tell; for I cannot find any book which gives an account of that year; but I have two which relate my improvements in 1649; and the next year, March 21st, 1650, I was admitted master of arts.

Thomas Ken (1637-1711), the saintly Nonjuring bishop, was a native of Little Berkhampstead in Hertfordshire, and was educated at Winchester and at Hart Hall and New College, Oxford. He held in succession, between 1663 and 1672, livings in Essex, the Isle of Wight, and Hants; but having been elected a Fellow of Winchester College, resided in Winchester till 1679. In 1667 he obtained from Morley, Bishop of Winchester, the living of Brixton, where he wrote his famous morning, evening, and midnight hymns, which he sang daily to his own accompaniment on the lute. The first two of these hymns or part of them are in every collection of sacred poetry and in the memory of almost every English child. There must be few who do not know by heart at least one verse:

> Awake, my soul, and with the sun, Thy daily stage of duty run; Shake off dull sloth, and joyful rise To pay thy morning sacrifice.

In 1674 Ken published a Manual of Prayers for the use of the Scholars of Winchester College. It was in this work the three famous hymns, subsequently altered in wording, were first published. In 1679 he was appointed chaplain to the Princess Mary, but was 'horribly dissatisfied' with the Prince of Orange's behaviour to her, and returning to England next year, was made chaplain to Charles II. He refused the use of his house to Nell Gwynne when the court visited Winchester, where he was a prebendary. In 1683 he went to Tangiers as army chaplain, and in 1684 was made Bishop of Bath and Wells. Having refused to publish the Declaration of Indulgence issued by James II., Ken was one of the seven bishops sent to the Tower. He nevertheless found himself unable with a good conscience to take the oath of allegiance to William III., and was deprived. He had then saved a sum of £700, and in lieu of this his friend Lord Weymouth guaranteed him £80 a year and residence at his mansion of Longleat, where Ken lived till his death. In his later years he interested himself in collec subscriptions for relief of the poor Nonjur He was esteemed a great preacher in his day, but is remembered now only for his thymns and his saintly character. His chief p work is his Practice of Divine Love, an exposi of the Church Catechism (1685), the others be mainly sermons.

From the following specimens of his of poetical works it will be easily understood only the three hymns are remembered. This the beginning of the hymn for Good Friday:

A song of Jesus I design,
But stumble at the leading line;
Of Jesus' passion I would sing,
And for this day's oblation bring;
But cannot the dispute decide
"Twixt grief and love, which me divide.

When Jesus' sufferings I review, And know myself to be the Jew, Whose sins created all the woe God-flesh assumed to undergo; I dread my guilt, and in my eyes Of tears I feel two fountains rise,

But when sweet Jesus to my sight Appears in a salvific light, Where on the cross He suffers pain, That I may bliss eternal gain, O then my heart with love runs o'er, And is inclined to grieve no more.

The Easter Day hymn commences:

Say, blessed angels, say,
How could you silent be to-day?
Your hymn the shepherds waked that morn,
When great God-man was born,
But when He rose again,
They heard no eucharistic strain.

You saw God-man expire,

Doil you His rising not admire?

How when His soul at parting breath

Enter'd the realm of death,

He conquering forced His way,

And re-inspired His burted clay.

Had you His rise admired, Hymn is by admiration fired; But you profoundly were amazed When you upon Him gazed, And while amazement reigns, It all poetic force restrains.

And this is the first verse of the hymn! Christmas:

Celestial harps prepare
To sound your loftiest air;
You choral angels at the throne,
Your customary hymns postpone;
Of glorious spirits, all ye orders nine,
To sute a hymn, to study chords combine.

Ken's epic style may be illustrated by a fr ment from Edmund, in which Prince Edmi thus confers with Saint Hubert about marriage: O father, you can unperplex my mind,
My realm are for my marriage all inclined;
I love, but know not who she is, or where,
And to discover either, I despair;
Despairing, I in celibate would live,
Since I my heart can to no other give;
I feel too great a load in cares of state,
Cares conjugal may much increase the weight;
More hours I fain would in my closet spend,
Pure virgins best the affairs of Heaven attend.

Son, said the saint, if you both lives compare, Both different ways may in God's favour share; Prayers, meditations, and intentions pure, A heart which no temptations can allure; Self-abnegation and a conscience clear Enduring no one lust to domineer; All graces which incarnate God enjoin'd, The married equally with virgins bind.

Contemplatives have easy loads to bear,
Freer from trouble and distracting care,
Loose from the world, and disembroil'd from sense,
Their prayers may longer be, and more intense:
To no relations virgins have a tie
To pluck them back, but unmolested die;
A virgin priest the altar best attends,
Our Lord that state commands not, but commends.

Hawkins published the prose works, with a Life, in 1713, as did Round in 1838, and Benham in 1889. Several works attributed to Ken are by most authorities regarded as spurious. Ken's poetical works included hymns; poems on gospel subjects and the attributes 1600; two epics, Edmund and Hymnothes or the Penitent, each in hirteen books; Anodynes; Preparations for Death; and Damonet and Dorilla, or Chaste Love, a pastoral. They were collected by lawkins in 4 vols. (1721), and are mostly awkward and tedious. selection of his 'Hymns and Poems for the Holy Days and selection of his 'Hymns and Poems for the Holy Days and stivals of the Church' was published in 1868 as Bishop Ken's iristian Year. It is known that these hymns were highly prized Keble, who apparently took thence the idea of his own Christian ear. See Lives by Bowles (1831), Anderdon (1851-54), Plumptre vols, 1888), and Clarke (1896).

Jeremy Collier (1650-1726) is less remem-=red as the conscientious and persecuted Nonring bishop than as the trenchant and unsparing LStigator of the corrupt stage of his time. as born at Stow-cum-Quy, Cambridgeshire, son f a clerical schoolmaster at Ipswich; and here nd at Caius College, Cambridge, he was eduated, afterwards becoming rector of Ampton lear Bury St Edmunds, and lecturer at Gray's Inn. His reply to Burnet's Inquiry into the State of Affairs (1688) cost him some months in Newgate. He next waged warfare on the crown with incisive pamphlets, and was arrested in 1692 on suspicion of being involved in a Jacobite plot. In 1696 he gave absolution to the would-be assassins friend and Parkyns on the scaffold, for which sfence he was outlawed. In 1698 he published is Short View of the Immorality of the English tage, which fell like a thunderbolt among the its. 'It is inspiriting,' says Macaulay, 'to see ow gallantly the solitary outlaw advances to ttack enemies, formidable separately, and, it light have been thought, irresistible when comined, distributes his swashing blows right and ft among Wycherley, Congreve, and Vanbrugh, treads the wretched D'Urfey down in the dirt beneath his feet, and strikes with all his strength full at the towering crest of Dryden.' Collier's argument carried the country with it, and helped to bring back the English drama to good morals and good sense. That excessive stage-profligacy which was partly a reaction against the rigidity of Puritanism, and had far outrun the parallel laxity of contemporary social morals, was immediately to some extent checked. But it was not without a struggle that the wits consented to be worsted. Congreve and Vanbrugh, with many of the smaller fry, answered angrily but weakly, and were crushed anew by the redoubtable Nonjuror, who was 'complete master of the rhetoric of honest indignation.' 'Contest,' says Dr Johnson, 'was his delight; he was not to be frighted from his purpose or his prey.' There were not merely replies but defences, second defences, and vindications of the Short View by the irrepressible Censor Morum. Even Congreve and Vanbrugh condescended to omit 'several expressions' from the Double Dealer and the Provoked Wife. The great Dryden stood apart at first, but at length in the preface to his Fables (1700) acknowledged he had been justly reproved. 'I shall say the less of Mr Collier,' he says, 'because in many things he has taxed me justly; and I have pleaded guilty to all thoughts and expressions of mine which can be truly argued of obscenity, profaneness, or immorality, and retract them. If he be my enemy, let him triumph; if he be my friend, as I have given him no personal occasion to be otherwise, he will be glad of my repentance. It becomes me not to draw my pen in the defence of a bad cause, when I have so often drawn it for a good one.'

But Dryden complained, and fairly, that his antagonist had often perverted his meaning, that he was 'too much given to horse-play in his raillery, and came to battle like a dictator from the plough;' and that 'if zeal for God's house had not eaten him up, it had at least devoured some part of his good manners and civility.' doubt Collier erred by pedantry and want of discrimination. He treats with as fierce indignation whatever appears to him 'profanity' as he does the grossest offences against decency. And amongst sins of profaneness he reckons not merely all light allusions to religious words, phrases, and subjects, but any disrespectful comments on Churchmen or ecclesiastical affairs. He does not merely protest against speaking of the clergy at large as hypocrites and impostors; even to assume that some of the clergy were unworthy of their cloth was with him a sin, and the usual ejaculations of impatience were treated as heinous examples of blasphemy. It must have been trying to him, a partisan of the Stewart cause, to have to attack an institution so intimately bound up as was the theatre with the principles of the Restoration; and painful to the High Churchman to be spokesman of an argument usually associated with censorious Presbyterians or narrow-minded Puritans. To a 'well-conducted and moral stage,' recommending virtue and discountenancing vice, he was in no ways hostile; though it may be doubted whether any theatre could successfully be conducted precisely in accordance with his canons of virtue and propriety. He is indignant at making fun of Mohammed or the heathen gods; to speak of a hackney-coachman as Jehu is 'a heavy piece of profaneness;' to say playfully that if 'marriage makes man and wife one flesh, it leaves them two fools,' is unpardonable. Swearing in any case is 'playing with edge tools. To go to Heaven in jest is the way to go to Hell in earnest.' Unquestionably he at times sees offences where none were intended and none committed. But he had very ample justification for his main charges; and in spite of pedantry, overstatement, and lack of proportion, the Short View was a noble protest against evil, and was only less effective than it deserved to be. It should be remembered that Collier was not the first to make such a protest from amongst the ranks of those who were not Puritans. Thirty-four years earlier Flecknoe, bred a Jesuit and himself a dramatist, had earned the hatred and contempt of Dryden by a severe impeachment in prose and in verse of the immorality of the contemporary stage (see Vol. I. page 784). And Blackmore had in 1695 commented on the same subject in the preface to his Prince Arthur.

But Collier ransacked Plautus and Terence, Sophocles and Euripides, to prove that the classical tragedy—nay, classical comedy—was more pure and reverent than that of professed Christians of the Reformed Church; that Seneca and even Aristophanes were less blameworthy than the playwrights of his own time. Plautus 'where he is most a poet is generally least a buffoon;' even Terence's 'strumpets are better behaved than our women of quality of the English stage.' 'A very indifferent Religion well believed will go a great way.' Shakespeare 'is too guilty to make an evidence' on modesty; 'the English stage has been always out of order,' but Ben Jonson and Beaumont and Fletcher were careful and considerate compared with their successors. Corneille and Molière might teach their English compeers de-Collier does not explicitly cency and decorum. attack all theatrical entertainments as such; he admits that a play may have a moral purpose. But with evident satisfaction and full approval he cites a long catena of denunciations of the stage in every shape and form from the earliest Christian councils, by way of the Fathers Clemens Alexandrinus, Tertullian, Cyprian, Augustine, and Jerome, down to the contemporary Catholic Church in Spain and France; and gives in full, in French and in English, a mandate of the Bishop of Arras in 1695 saying that the Church has always abominated stage plays, and disapproved the scandalous profession of actors, who, though not formally expelled by formal excommunication, are and ought to be refused admission to the sacraments.

Hence it seems clear that Collier's arg hardly goes as far as his dislike to the stage he regards no stage as fit for Christians; ar plays approved by him would hardly have strong chance of popularity either in Engl the seventeenth century, or anywhere else date. This dramatic critic with a mission times writes with admirable point, and occas ventures on quite non-ethical criticisms; t one place, ridiculing the piling up of tauto words and phrases, he says, 'This Litter of E makes the Poem look like a Bitch over: with Puppies, and sucks the Sence almost t and Bone.' When it is convenient for his ment, he insists on the unities of time, plac action. Thus Vanbrugh's Relapse appears 'a of Irregularities. There is neither Propriety Name nor Contrivance in the Plot, nor De in the Characters. 'Tis a thorough Contra to Nature, and impossible in Time and Place

Collier continued to preach to a congre of Nonjurors, and was consecrated bish 1713. He upheld the 'usages,' and laid I open to a charge of holding Romish view his forty-two books and pamphlets, those stage alone are still remembered. His works were the Great Historical, Geogra Genealogical, and Poetical Dictionary (4 vols 1701-21, based on the encyclopædic we Moreri, and not improved), and An Eccles History of Great Britain (a work of really learning, 2 vols. folio, 1708-14; new ed. by bury, with Life, 1852).

From the 'Short View.'

The business of plays is to recommend virtue a countenance vice; to shew the uncertainty of 1 greatness, the suddain turns of fate, and the u conclusions of violence and injustice: 'tis to exp singularities of pride and fancy, to make folly an hood contemptible, and to bring every thing the under infamy and neglect. This design has been pursued by the English stage. Our poets write different view, and are gone into an other interest true, were their intentions fair, they might be sen to this purpose. They have in a great measu springs of thought and inclination in their power. musick, action, and rhetorick are moving en ments; and rightly employ'd would be very sigr But force and motion are things indifferent, and lies chiefly in the application. These advanta; now in the enemies hand and under a very day management. Like cannon seized they are poin wrong way, and by the strength of the defer mischief is made the greater. That this complain unreasonable I shall endeavour to prove by shew misbehaviour of the stage with respect to moral religion. Their liberties in the following particul intolerable, viz. their smuttiness of expression swearing, prophaneness, and lewd application of ture; their abuse of the clergy; their making th characters libertines, and giving them success i debauchery. This charge, with some other irregul I shall make good against the stage, and shew b nd scandal of the practice. And first, I shall the rankness and indecency of their language, ting of this head, I hope the reader does not at I should set down chapter and page, and the citations at length. To do this would be acceptable and foreign employment. Indeed ges, many of them, are in no condition to be he that is desirous to see these flowers let him ier own soil: 'tis my business rather to kill the transplant it. But that the poets may not of injustice, I shall point to the infection at a and refer in general to play and person.

The rt of the mob have no true relish of decency ur, and want education and thought to furnish title conversation. Barrenness of fancy makes n take up with those scandalous liberties. A agination may blot a great deal of paper at this ease enough: and 'tis possible convenience may s invite to the expedient. The modern poets se smut as the old ones did machines, to relieve; invention. When Pegasus is jaded and would l, he is apt like other tits to run into every ity in any company is a rustick uncreditable ut among women 'tis particularly rude. Such d be very affrontive in conversation, and not y any lady of reputation. Whence then comes that those liberties which disoblige so much in ion should entertain upon the stage? Do the women leave all the regards to decency and conscience behind them when they come to the play-house? does the place transform their inclinations, and turn their former aversions into pleasure? Or were their pretences to sobriety elsewhere nothing but hypocrisy and grimace? Such suppositions as these are all satyr and invective: they are rude imputations upon the whole sex. To treat the ladies with such stuff is no better than taking their money to abuse them. It supposes their imagination vitious, and their memories ill furnish'd: that they are practised in the language of the stews, and pleas'd with the scenes of brutishness. When at the same time the customs of education and the laws of decency are so very cautious and reserv'd in regard to women: I say so very reserv'd, that 'tis almost a fault for them to understand they are ill used. They can't discover their disgust without disadvantage, nor blush without disservice to their modesty. To appear with any skill in such cant looks as if they had fallen upon ill conversation, or managed their curiosity amiss. In a word, he that treats the ladies with such discourse must conclude either that they like it, or they do not. To suppose the first is a gross reflection upon their virtue. And as for the latter case, it entertains them with their own aversion; which is ill nature, and ill manners enough in all conscience. And in this particular custom and conscience, the forms of breeding and the maxims of religion are on the same side. In other instances vice is often too fashionable; but here a man can't be a sinner without being a clown.

In this respect the stage is faulty to a scandalous degree of nauseousness and aggravation. For

1st. The poets make women speak smuttily. Of this the places before mention'd are sufficient evidence: and if there was occasion they might be multiplyed to a much greater number: indeed the comedies are seldom clear of these blemishes: and sometimes you have them in tragedy. For instance. The Orphans Monimia makes a very improper description; and the royal Leonora in the Spanish Friar runs a strange length in the history of love. And do princesses use to make their reports with such fulsom freedoms? Certainly this Leonora was the first queen of her family. Such raptures are too lascivious for Joan of Naples. Are these the tender things Mr Dryden says the ladies call on him for? I suppose he means the ladies that are too modest to show their faces in the pit. This entertainment can be fairly design'd for none but such. Indeed it hits their palate exactly. It regales their lewdness, graces their character, and keeps up their spirits for their vocation: now to bring women under such misbehaviour is violence to their native modesty, and a mispresentation of their sex. For modesty, as Mr Rapin observes, is the character of women. To represent them without this quality is to make monsters of them and throw them out of their Euripides, who was no negligent observer of humane nature, is always careful of this decorum. Thus Phædra when possess'd with an infamous passion, takes all imaginable pains to conceal it. She is as regular and reserv'd in her language as the most virtuous matron. 'Tis true, the force of shame and desire, the scandal of satisfying and the difficulty of parting with her inclinations, disorder her to distraction. However, her frensy is not lewd; she keeps her modesty even after she has lost her wits. Had Shakespear secur'd this point for his young virgin Ophelia, the play had been better contriv'd. Since he was resolv'd to drown the lady like a kitten, he should have set her a swimming a little sooner. To keep her alive only to sully her reputation and discover the rankness of her breath was very cruel. But it may be said the freedoms of distraction go for nothing, a feaver has no faults, and a man non compos may kill without murther. It may be so: but then such people ought to be kept in dark rooms and without company. To show them or let them loose is somewhat unreasonable. But after all, the modern stage seems to depend upon this expedient. Women are sometimes represented tilly and sometimes mad, to enlarge their liberty and screen their impudence from censure: this politick contrivance we have in Marcella, Hoyden, and Miss Prue. However, it amounts to this confession; that women when they have their understandings about them ought to converse otherwise. In fine, modesty is the distinguishing vertue of that sex, and serves both for ornament and defence: modesty was design'd by Providence as a guard to virtue; and that it might be always at hand, 'tis wrought into the mechanism of the body. 'Tis likewise proportion'd to the occasions of life, and strongest in youth when passion is so too. 'Tis a quality as true to innocence, as the sences are to health; whatever is ungrateful to the first, is prejudicial to the latter. The enemy no sooner approaches, but the blood rises in opposition, and looks defyance to an indecency. It supplys the room of reasoning and collection: infuitive knowledge can scarcely make a quicker impression; and what then can be a surer guide to the unexperienced? It teaches by suddain instinct and aversion; this is both a ready and a powerful method of instruction. The tumult of the blood and spirits and the uneasiness of the sensation are of singular use. They serve to awaken reason and prevent surprize. Thus the distinctions of good and evil are refresh'd, and the temptation kept at proper distance.

21y. They represent their angle ladies, and persons of condition, under these disorders of liberty. This makes the irregularity still more monstrous and a greater contradiction to nature and probability: but rather than not be vitious, they will venture to spoil a character. This mismanagement we have partly seen already. Jacinta and Belinda are farther proof. And the Double Dealer is particularly remarkable. There are but four ladies in this play, and three of the biggest of them are whores. A great compliment to quality to tell them there is not above a quarter of them honest! This was not the Roman breeding, Terence and Plautus his strumpets were little people; but of this more hereafter.

3/y. They have oftentimes not so much as the poor refuge of a double meaning to fly to. So that you are under a necessity either of taking ribaldry or nonsence. And when the sentence has two handles, the worst is generally turn'd to the audience. The matter is so contrived that the smut and scum of the thought now rises uppermost, and like a picture drawn to sight, looks always upon the company.

4/y. And which is still more extraordinary; the prologues and epilogues are sometimes scandalous to the last degree. . . .

What is more frequent then their wishes of Hell, and confusion, devils and diseases, all the plagues of this world, and the next, to each other? And as for swearing; its used by all persons, and upon all occasions: by heroes and paltroons; by gentlemen and clowns: love and quarrels, success and disappointment, temper and passion, must be varnish'd, and set off with o some times, and with some poets, swearing is at relief. It stands up in the room of sense, gives a flat expression, and makes a period musical a In short, 'tis almost all the rhetorick and res people are masters of: the manner of perfor different. Some times they mince the matter the letter, and keep the sense, as if they had steal a swearing, and break the commandmen sin. At another time the oaths are clipt, by much within the ring, but that the image a scription are visible. These expedients, I conmore for variety than conscience: for when the on them, they make no difficulty of swearing : Instances of all these kinds may be met with i Batchelour, Double Dealer, and Love for Love.

The poets are of all people most to blam want even the plea of builties and sharpers, no rencounters, no starts of passion, no sudd dents to discompose them. They swear in sol cool blood, under thought and deliberation, ness, and for exercise: this is a terrible circuit makes all malice prepence, and enflames the the reckoning. . . .

A woman will start at a soldiers oath, almost as at the report of his pistol: and therefore a man will no more swear than fight in the of ladies.

The governor, having constituted his council or legislative assembly, laid out his capital city of Philadelphia, and governed the colony wisely for two years, with full tolerance for all that was not by Puritanism regarded as wicked (card-playing, play-going, &c. being of course strictly forbidden as 'evil sports and games'). Murder alone was treated as a capital offence. The colonial dictator returned to England in 1684.

WILLIAM PENN, After F. Place,

For the next four years and a half, till the abdication of James II., Penn appears in the novel character of a court favourite. He attended Whitehall almost daily, his house was crowded with visitors, and in consequence of his supposed influence with the king he might, as he himself says, have amassed great riches. He procured the release of about twelve hundred Quaker brethren imprisoned for refusing to take the oath of allegiance or to attend church. So he was accused of being a Jesuit in disguise, and of holding correspondence with the court of Rome. Even Tillotson was led to believe this calumny, but was convinced by Penn of the entire falsehood of the charge. Lord Macaulay revived some of the accusations against Penn, and represented him as conniving at the intolerance and corruption of the court. The specific cases adduced rest on doubtful evidence; but evidently Penn, misled by a little selfimportance, and childishly hopeful of the great things to be expected from James, had mixed himself up too much with the proceedings of the court, yet could not prevent all acts of cruelty and extortion. Mr W. E. Forster was held to have proved that certain doubtful communications had nothing to do with the Quaker leader, but perhaps with another Mr Pen or Penne; and the most peaceful Friends. like Whittier, could not quite forgive Macaulay for adhering to what they regarded as his calumnious opinions. The uniform tenor of Penn's life was generous, self-sacrificing, and beneficent. After the Revolution Penn's formal intimacy with James caused him to be regarded as a disaffected person, and led to various troubles; but he still continued to preach and write in support of his favourite doctrines. Having once more gone out to America. in 1699, where his 'Great Law' or constitution had proved unworkable and had to be much altered. be did something to mitigate the evils of slavery, but held negro slaves himself; and he did his best for the improvement of his colony till 1701, when be finally returned to England. His latter days were embittered by personal griefs and losses, he was thrown for nine months into the Fleet through financial embarrassment, and his mental vigour was prostrated by disease. He died in 1718.

Besides the works already mentioned, and many other doctrinal tracts, controversial pamphlets, and political arguments, Penn wrote Some Fruits of Solitude in Reflections and Maxims relating to the Conduct of Human Life, and Fruits of a Father's Love, being his Advice to his Children (posthumously published). Of the Fruits of Solitude R. L. Stevenson wrote, in forwarding a copy to a friend: If ever in all my human conduct I have done a better thing to any fellow-creature than handing on to you this sweet and wholesome work, I know I shall hear of it on the last day.' To George Fox's Journal, which was published in 1694, Penn prefixed A Brief Account of the Rise and Progress of the People called Quakers. The style of Penn's works is often rugged, but his command of thought and language is copious, and his enthusiasm renders him forcible and impressive. The first of the subjoined specimens, against 'the racket made about blood and families, is from his No Cross, no Crown.

Against Pride of Birth.

That people are generally proud of their persons is too visible and troublesome, especially if they have any pretence either to blood or beauty; the one has raised many quarrels among men, and the other among women, and men too often for their sakes and at their excitements. But to the first: what a pother has this noble blood made in the world, antiquity of name or family, whose father or mother, great-grandfather or great-grandmother, was best descended or allied? what stock or what clan they came of? what coat of arms they gave? which had of right the precedence? But methinks nothing of man's folly has less show of reason to palliate it.

For first, what matter is it of whom any one is descended that is not of ill-fame? since 'tis his own virtue that must raise, or vice depress him. An ancestor's character is no excuse to a man's ill actions, but an aggravation of his degeneracy; and since virtue comes not by generation, I neither am the better nor the worse for my forefather: to be sure, not in God's account; nor should it be in man's. No body would endure ir easier, or reject favours the more, for comir hand of a man well or ill descended. I conf greater honour to have had no blots, and with tary estate to have had a lineal descent of w that was never found; no, not in the moof families upon earth; I mean Abraham's. scended of wealth and titles fills no man's brains, or heart with truth; those qualities comhigher cause. 'Tis vanity then, and most cor pride, for a man of bulk and character to despiof less size in the world and of meaner alliance of them; because the latter may have the me the former has only the effects of it in an ance though the one be great by means of a fore! other is so too, but 'tis by his own; then, pray the bravest man of the two?

'Oh,' says the person proud of blood, 'it w good world since we have had so many upst. men!' But what should others have said of t ancestor, when he started first up into the knc the world? For he and all men and families, states and kingdoms too, have had their upstar their beginnings. This is like being the Tri because old, not because good; for families to by being old and not by being virtuous. matter: it must be age in virtue, or else vir age; for otherwise a man should be noble by his predecessor, and yet the predecessor less t he, because he was the acquirer; which is a pa will puzzle all their heraldry to explain. Stre they should be more noble than their ancesto their nobility for them ! But if this be absure then the upstart is the noble man; the man (by his virtue; and those only are intitled to 1 that are imitators of his virtue; the rest may name from his blood, but that is all. If virtue nobility, which heathens themselves agree, the are no longer truly noble than they are virtuous virtue go not by blood, but by the qualificatidescendants, it follows, blood is excluded: . would bar virtue, and no man that wanted the c be allowed the benefit of the other: which we and bound nobility for want of antiquity, : virtue useless. No, let blood and name go toge pray, let nobility and virtue keep company, fo nearest of kin. . . .

But methinks it should suffice to say, our see that men of blood, out of their gear and without their feathers and finery, have no more honour by nature stamped upon them than the neighbours. Nay, themselves being judges, frankly tell us they feel all those passions in that make them like other men, if not further virtue that truly dignifies. The lamentable and debauchery that now rages among too migreater sort of folks, is too clear and casting an in the point: and pray tell me, of what blood come?

Howbeit, when I have said all this, I interdebasing one false quality to make insolent arriss not true. I would not be thought to set upon the present gentleman's shoulder: by n his rudeness will not mend the matter. But w' writ is to give aim to all where true nobilit that every one may arrive at it by the ways dness. But for all this, I must allow a great ge to the gentleman; and therefore prefer his just as the apostle Paul, who after he had the Jews, that insulted upon the Christians with v and rites, gave them the advantage upon all tions in statutes and judgments. I must grant condition of our great men is much to be prethe ranks of inferior people. For first, they ore power to do good; and if their hearts be their ability, they are blessings to the people of Secondly, the eyes of the people are lirected to them; and if they will be kind, just, oful, they shall have their affections and services. they are not under equal straits with the inferior nd consequently they have more help, leisure, asion to polish their passions and tempers with ad conversation. Fourthly, they have more time rve the actions of other nations; to travel and : laws, customs, and interests of other countries; ig home whatsoever is worthy or imitable. And isier way is open for great men to get honour; h as love true reputation will embrace the best oit. But because it too often happens that great little mind to give God the glory of their ty, and to live answerable to his mercies, but on rary live without God in the world, fulfilling the reof, his hand is often seen either in impoverishextinguishing them, and raising up men of more nd humility to their estates and dignity. Howmust allow that among people of this rank there en some of them of more than ordinary virtue, xamples have given light to their families. And een something natural for some of their descenendeavour to keep up the credit of their houses rtion to the merit of their founder. And to say there be any advantage in such descent, 'tis not od but education; for blood has no intelligence d is often spurious and uncertain; but education ighty influence and strong bias upon the affeclactions of men. In this the ancient nobles and f this kingdom did excel; and it were much to that our great people would set about to recover ent œconomy of their houses, the strict and viriscipline of their ancestors, when men were I for their atchievements, and when nothing osed a man to shame than his being born to a hat he had not a virtue to support.

Penn wrote in all over forty works and pamphlets, and his collected works (1726) fill three volumes. There are Lives by Clarkson (1813), Barker (1852), Janney (1852), Hepworth Dixon (new ed. 1856), Burdette (1882), Stoughton (new ed. 1883), Sparks, Draper, Bridges, and others. And see Mr Gosse's edition of Some Fruits of Solitude (1900).

Robert Barclay (1648-90), the apologist of the Quakers, was born at Gordonstown in Morayshire, the son of Colonel David Barclay, who had served under Gustavus Adolphus, and lost but recovered his estate under Charles II. Robert was educated at the Scots College at Paris, of which his uncle was rector, but withstood, not without difficulty, the temptation to become a Catholic, and returned to his native country in 1664. Two years afterwards his father made open profession of the principles of Quakerism; and in 1667, when only nineteen years of age, Robert Barclay became 'fully convinced,' as his friend William Penn has expressed it, 'and publicly owned the testimony of the true light.' His first defence of the new doctrines, Truth cleared of Calumnies (1670), was a reply to a book published in Aberdeen. In 1672 Barclay walked through the streets of Aberdeenunseasonably-clothed in sackcloth and ashes, and published a Seasonable Warning and Serious Exhortation to and Expostulation with the Inhabitants of Aberdeen. Other controversial treatises followed: A Catechism and Confession of Faith (1673), and The Anarchy of the Ranters (1676). His great work, originally written and published in 1676 in Latin, appeared in English in 1678, and is entitled An Apology for the true Christian Divinity, as the same is held forth and preached by the People called in scorn Quakers, &-c. His appeal in it to the king had no effect in stopping persecution; for after Barclay's return from Holland and Germany, which he visited now and later in company with Fox and Penn, he was in 1677 imprisoned along with many other Quakers at Aberdeen, through the procurement of Archbishop Sharp. In prison he wrote a treatise on Universal Love. He was soon liberated, and subsequently gained favour at court. Both Penn and he were on terms of intimacy with James II.; and just before the sailing of the Prince of Orange for England in 1688, Barclay in a private conference with His Majesty urged James to make some concessions to the people. He was one of twelve Quakers who in 1682 acquired East New Jersey, and was thereafter appointed nominal governor, with power to appoint a deputy.

He lived latterly at his seat of Urie in Kincardineshire; and there too he died. The Apology is a learned and methodical treatise, and it was read with avidity both in Britain and on the Continent. Dignified and impressive in style, it was a serious contribution to theology, though, as its name imports, it was designed specifically as an apologia, and not as a compendium of all the doctrines of the Friends. Its most characteristic theological feature is the proof that there is an internal light in man, which is better fitted to guide him aright in religious matters than even the Scriptures themselves; the genuine doctrines of which he asserts to be rendered uncertain by various readings in different manuscripts, and the fallibility of translators and interpreters:

I say, all these and much more which might be alleged, put the minds even of the learned into infinite doubts, scruples, and inextricable difficulties; whence we may very safely conclude that Jesus Christ, who promised to be always with his children, to lead them into all truth, to guard them against the devices of the enemy, and to establish their faith upon an unmovable rock, left them not to be principally ruled by that which was subject in tisself to many uncertainties; and therefore he gave them his Spirit as their principal guide, which neither moths nor time can wear out, nor transcribers nor translators corrupt; which none are so young, none so illiterate, none in so remote a place, but they may come to be reached and rightly informed by it.

The dedication of the Apology to King Charles II. has always been admired for its respectful yet manly freedom of style, and for the frankness and kindliness of its allusions to His Majesty's own early troubles, as a reason for his extending mercy and favour to the persecuted Quakers:

Thou hast tasted of prosperity and adversity; thou knowest what it is to be banished thy native country, to be over-ruled as well as to rule and sit upon the throne; and being oppressed, thou hast reason to know how hateful the oppressor is to both God and man: if after all these warnings and advertisements, thou dost not turn unto the Lord with all thy heart, but forget him who remembered thee in thy distress, and give thyself up to follow lust and vanity, surely great will be thy condemnation.

Against Titles of Honour.

As for the first, we affirm positively that it is not lawful for Christians either to give or receive these titles of honour, as Your Holiness, Your Majesty, Your Excellency, Your Eminence, &c. First, because these titles are no part of that obedience which is due to magistrates or superiors; neither doth the giving them add to or diminish from that subjection we owe to them, which consists in obeying their just and lawful commands, not in titles and designations. Secondly, we find not that in the Scripture any such titles are used, either under the law or the gospel; but that, in speaking to kings, princes, or nobles they used only a simple compellation, as, O King! and that without any further designation, save perhaps the name of the person, as, O King Agrippa, &c. Thirdly, it lays a necessity upon Christians most frequently to lie; because the persons obtaining these titles, either by election or hereditarily, may frequently be found to have nothing really in them deserving them or answering to them: as some to whom it is said, Your Excellency, having nothing of excellency in them; and he who is called Your Grace appears to be an enemy to grace; and he who is called Your Honour is known to be base and ignoble. I wonder what law of man or what patent ought to oblige me to make a lie, in calling good evil, and evil good. I wonder what law of man can secure me in so doing from the just judgment of God, that will make me account for every idle word. And to lie is something more. Surely Christians should be ashamed that such laws, manifestly crossing the law of God, should be among them. . .

Fourthly, as to those titles of Holiness, Eminency, and Excellency, used among the Papists to the pope and cardinals, &c.; and Grace, Lordship, and Worship, used to the clergy among the Protestants, it is a most blasphemous usurpation. For if they use Holiness and Grace because these things ought to be in a pope or in a bishop, how came they to usurp that peculiarly to themselves? Ought not holiness and grace to be in every Christian? And so every Christian should say Your Holiness and Your Grace one to another. Next, how can they in reason claim any more titles than were practised and received by the apostles and primitive Christians, whose successors they pretend they are; and as whose successors (and no otherwise) themselves, I judge, will confess any honour they seek is due to them? Now if they neither sought, received, nor admitted such honour nor titles, how came these by them? If they say they did, let them prove it if they can: we find no such thing in the Scripture. The Christians speak to the apostles without any such denomination, neither saying, If it please your Grace, Your Holiness, nor Your Worship; they are neither called My Lord Peter, nor My Lord. Paul; nor yet Master Peter, nor Master Paul; nor Doctor Peter, nor Doctor Paul; but singly Peter and Paul; and that not only in the Scripture, but for some hundreds of years after: so that this appears to be a manifest fruit of the apostacy. For if these titles arise either from the office or worth of the persons, it will not be denied but the apostles deserved them better than any now that call for them. But the case is plain; the apostles had the holiness, the excellency, the grace; and because they were holy, excellent, and gracious, they neither used nor admitted such titles; but these having neither holiness, excellency, nor grace, will needs be so called to satisfy their ambitious and ostentatious mind, which is a manifest token of their hypocrisy.

Fifthly, as to that title of Majesty usually ascribed to princes, we do not find it given to any such in the Holy Scripture; but that it is specially and peculiarly ascribed unto God. . . . We find in the Scripture the proud king Nebuchadnezzar assuming this title to himself, who at that time received a sufficient reproof by a sudden judgment which came upon him. Therefore in all the compellations used to princes in the Old Testament it is not to be found, nor yet in the New. Paul was very civil to Agrippa, yet he gives him no such title. Neither was this title used among Christians in the primitive times. Hence the Ecclesiastical History of the Reformation of France, relating the speech of the Lord Rochefort at the assembly of the estates of France held under Charles the Ninth in the year 1560, saith, 'That this harangue was tked in that he used not the word Majesty, y flatterers of late years.' And yet this author nded not how his master Calvin used this alle to Francis the First, King of France; and o, but calls him Most Christian King in the his Institutions; though by his daily persecut-Reformers it was apparent he was far from in Calvin's own esteem. Surely the complying vain titles, imposed and introduced by Antially tended to stain the Reformation and to refective in many things.

Apology and Caleckins have been often reprinted; his collected in 1692 (1 vol. folio), and republished in 1718.

His later life was ent in controversy and in suffering permainly for refusing to take the oath of . The History of the Life of Thomas written by his own hand, but completed id, was first published in 1714; and often ed (5th ed. 1855; ed. by Henry Morley, C. G. Crump in 1900). Ellwood fureresting facts about the London prisons, he and many of his brother Ouakers ined, and the manner in which they were treated both there and out of doors. It is melancholy to note how very few of all the miseries of their lives would have befallen them, or how swiftly they could have been got over, had the Quakers been able to make the merely formal concession required of them-on the hat question and the thou question at home, and about taking of the oath of allegiance when brought before the magistrates. Though as a Quaker faithful unto the utmost extremity, Ellwood evidently found the 'old man' in him asserting itself pretty often in the way of righteous indignation and the impulse to strenuous self-defence; and unlike the stricter Friends, he had no scruples about providing for the defence of himself and comrades before the law-courts by help of professional lawyers. Besides his own Life, Ellwood wrote a score of controversial treatises, including A Seasonable Dissuasive from Persecution, A Fair Examination of a Foul Paper, Truth Defended, Sacred Histories of the Old and New Testaments, and more than one volume of poems, including a Daviders in five books. He edited the Journal of his friend George Fox.

In his Life he describes his intercourse with Milton, whose literary standing he defines in a sufficiently surprising manner, and expounds the poet's insistence on a quite un-English and a specifically Italian pronunciation of Latin:

Milton as Latin Tutor.

I mentioned before that when I was a boy I had made some good progress in learning, and lost it all again before I came to be a man; nor was I rightly sensible of my loss therein till I came among the Quakers. But then I both saw my loss and lamented it; and applied myself with utmost diligence at all leisure times to recover it: so false I found that charge to be which in these times was cast as a reproach upon the Quakers, that they despised and decried all human learning, because they denied it to be necessary to a gospel ministry, which was one of the controversies of those times. But though I toiled hard and spared no pains to regain what once I had been master of, yet I found it a matter of so great difficulty that I was ready to say as the noble cunuch to Philip in another case, 'How can I, unless I had some man to guide me?' This I had formerly complained of to my especial friend Isaac Pennington, but now more earnestly, which put him upon considering and contriving a means for my assistance.

He had an intimate acquaintance with Dr Paget, a physician of note in London, and he with John Milton, a gentleman of great note throughout the learned world for the accurate pieces he had written on various subjects and occasions. This person, having filled a public station in the former times, lived now a private and retired life in London, and having wholly lost his sight kept always a man to read to him, which usually was the son of some gentleman of his acquaintance, whom in kindness he took to improve in his learning. Thus by the mediation of my friend Isnac Pennington with Dr Paget, and of Dr Paget with John Milton, was I admitted to come to him, not as a servant (which at that time he needed not), nor to be in the house with him, but only to have the liberty of coming to his house at certain hours when I would, and to read to him what books he should appoint me, which was all the favour I desired. . . .

He received me courteously, as well for the sake of Dr Paget, who introduced me, as of Isaac Pennington, who recommended me, to both of whom he bore a good respect; and having inquired divers things of me, with respect to my former progressions in learning, he dismissed me, to provide myself of such accommodations as might be most suitable to my future studies. I went, therefore, and took myself a lodging as near to his house (which was then in Jewyn Street) as conveniently I could; and from thenceforward went every day in the afternoon, except on the first days of the week; and sitting by him in his dining-room, read to him such books, in the Latin tongue, as he pleased to hear me read.

At my first sitting to read to him, observing that I used the English pronunciation, he told me if I would have the benefit of the Latin tongue, not only to read and understand Latin authors, but to converse with foreigners, either abroad or at home, I must learn the foreign pronunciation. To this I consenting, he instructed me how to sound the vowels, so different from the common pronunciation used by the English (who speak Anglice their Latin) that, with some few other variations in sounding some consonants, in particular cases—as C before E or I, like Ch; Sc before I, like Sh, &c. the Latin thus spoken seemed as different from that which was delivered as the English generally speak it, as if it was another language. I had before, during my retired life at my father's, by unwearied diligence and industry so far recovered the rules of grammar, in which I had once been very ready, that I could both read a Latin author, and after a sort hammer out his meaning. But this change of pronunciation proved a new difficulty to me. It was now harder to me to read than it was before to understand when read. But Labor omnia vincit improbus-Incessant pains the end obtains.' And so did I, which made my reading the more acceptable to my master. He on the other hand perceiving with what earnest desire I pursued learning, gave me not only all the encouragement but all the help he could; for having a curious ear, he understood by my tone when I understood what I read, and when I did not; and accordingly would stop me, examine me, and open the most difficult passages to me. . . .

Some little time before I went to Aylesbury prison, I was desired by my quondam master, Milton, to take a house for him in the neighbourhood where I dwelt, that he might get out of the city for the safety of himself and his family, the pestilence then growing hot in London (1665). I took a pretty box for him in Giles Chalfont a mile from me, of which I gave him notice, and intended to have waited on him and seen him well settled in it, but was prevented by that imprisonment. But now being released and returned home, I soon made a visit to him to welcome him into the country. After some common discourses had passed between us, he called for a manuscript of his, which being brought he delivered to me, bidding me to take it home with me and read it at my leisure, and when I had so done, return it to him, with my judgment thereupon. When I came home and had set myself to read it, I found it was that excellent poem which he entituled Paradise Lost. After I had with the best attention read it through, I made him another visit and returned him his book, with due acknowledgment for the favour he had done me municating it to me. He asked me how I like what I thought of it, which I modestly but fi him; and after some further discourse abspleasantly said to him: 'Thou hast said mucl Paradise lost; but what hast thou to say of found?' He made me no answer, but sat som a muse; then brake off that discourse, and another subject.

After the sickness was over, and the city well and become safely habitable again, he returned And when afterwards I went to wait on him the I seldom failed of doing whenever my occasione to London, he shewed me his second poe Paradisa Regained, and in a pleasant tone said 'This is owing to you, for you put it into m Chalfont; which before I had not thought of.'

Dr Thomas Sprat, Bishop of Rocheste 1713), was praised by Dr Johnson as 'ar whose pregnancy of imagination and eloq language have deservedly set him high in t. of literature.' Lord Macaulay also eulogi as 'a very great master of our langua possessed at once of the eloquence of the the controversialist, and the historian.' revealed in Experimental Philosophy.

e guilty of false interpretations of providences lers, when we either make those to be miracles none, or when we put a false sense on those real; when we make general events to have a spect, or particular accidents to have some signification. Though both these may seem have the strictest appearance of religion, yet the greatest usurpations on the secrets of the, and unpardonable presumptions on his high res of punishment and reward.

w, if a moderating of these extravagances must ed profaneness, I profess I cannot absolve the tal philosopher. It must be granted that he ery scrupulous in believing all manner of comon prophetical visions, in giving liberty to new is, and in assigning the causes and marking out of God's judgments amongst his creatures. not suddenly conclude all extraordinary events immediate finger of God; because he famiolds the inward workings of things, and thence that many effects, which use to affright the are brought forth by the common instruments . He cannot be suddenly inclined to pass n men's eternal condition from any temporal that may befall them; because his long vith all matters, times, and places has taught uth of what the Scripture says, that 'all things ike to all.' He cannot blindly consent to all ns of devout men about future contingencies, is so rigid in examining all particular matters He cannot be forward to assent to spiritual nd revelations; because he is truly acquainted empers of men's bodies, the composition of I, and the power of fancy, and so better underdifference between diseases and inspirations.

ill this he commits nothing that is irreligious. to deny that God has heretofore warned the what was to come, is to contradict the very tself; but to reject the sense which any prishall fasten to it, is not to disdain the Word ut the opinions of men like ourselves. To ainst the possibility that new prophets may rom heaven, is to insinuate that the same isdom which once shewed itself that way is end. But to slight all pretenders that come ie help of miracles, is not a contempt of but a just circumspection that the reason of ot overreached. To deny that God directs of human things is stupidity; but to hearken rodigy that men frame against their enemies, iselves, is not to reverence the power of God, te that serve the passions, the interests, and men.

langerous mistake into which many good men e neglect the dominion of God over the world tot discover in every turn of human actions rnatural providences and miraculous events. is enough for the honour of his government des the whole creation in its wonted course of effects: as it makes as much for the reputa-prince's wisdom, that he can rule his subjects by his known and standing laws, as that he is often forced to make use of extraordinary justice to punish or reward.

Let us then imagine our philosopher to have all slowness of belief and rigour of trial, which by some is miscalled a blindness of mind and hardness of heart. Let us suppose that he is most unwilling to grant that anything exceeds the force of nature but where a full evidence convinces him. Let it be allowed that he is always alarmed, and ready on his guard, at the noise of any miraculous event, lest his judgment should be surprised by the disguises of faith. But does he by this diminish the authority of ancient miracles? or does he not rather confirm them the more, by confining their number, and taking care that every falsehood should not mingle with them? Can he by this undermine Christianity, which does not now stand in need of such extraordinary testimonies from heaven? or do not they rather endanger it who still venture its truths on so hazardous a chance, who require a continuance of signs and wonders, as if the works of our Saviour and his apostles had not been sufficient? Who ought to be esteemed the most carnally minded—the enthusiast that pollutes religion with his own passions, or the experimenter that will not use it to flatter and obey his own desires, but to subdue them? Who is to be thought the greatest enemy of the gospel—he that loads men's faiths by so many improbable things as will go near to make the reality itself suspected, or he that only admits a few arguments to confirm the evangelical doctrines, but then chooses those that are unquestionable?

By this I hope it appears that this inquiring, this scrupulous, this incredulous temper, is not the disgrace but the honour of experiments. And therefore I will declare them to be the most seasonable study for the present temper of our nation. This wild amusing men's minds with prodigies and conceits of providence has been one of the most considerable causes of those spiritual distractions of which our country has long been the theatre. This is a vanity to which the English seem to have been always subject above others. There is scarce any modern historian that relates our foreign wars but he has this objection against the disposition of our countrymen, they used to order their affairs of the greatest importance according to some obscure omens or predictions that passed amongst them on little or no foundations. And at this time, especially this last year [1666], this gloomy and ill-boding humour has prevailed. So that it is now the fittest season for experiments to arise, to teach us a wisdom which springs from the depths of knowledge, to shake off the shadows and to scatter the mists which fill the minds of men with a vain consternation. This is a work well becoming the most Christian profession. For the most apparent effect which attended the passion of Christ was the putting of an eternal silence on all the false oracles and dissembled inspirations of ancient times.

Cowley's Love of Retirement.

Upon the king's happy restoration, Mr Cowley was past the fortieth year of his age; of which the greatest part had been spent in a various and tempestuous condition. He now thought he had sacrificed enough of his life to his curiosity and experience. He had enjoyed many excellent occasions of observation. He had been present in many great revolutions, which in that tumultuous time disturbed the peace of all our neighbour states as well as our own. He had nearly beheld all the splendour of the highest part of mankind. He had lived in the presence of princes, and familiarly conversed with greatness in all its degrees, which was necessary for one that would contemn it aright; for to scorn the pomp of the world before a man knows it, does commonly proceed rather from ill-manners than a true magnanimity.

He was now weary of the vexations and formalities of an active condition. He had been perplexed with a long compliance to foreign manners. He was satiated with the arts of court; which sort of life though his virtue had made innocent to him, yet nothing could make it quiet. These were the reasons that moved him to forego all public employments, and to follow the violent inclination of his own mind, which in the greatest throng of his former business had still called upon him and represented to him the true delights of solitary studies, of temperate pleasures, and of a moderate revenue below the malice and flatteries of fortune.

In his last seven or eight years he was concealed in his beloved obscurity, and possessed that solitude which from his very childhood he had always most passionately desired. Though he had frequent invitations to return into business, yet he never gave ear to any persuasions of profit or preferment. His visits to the city and court were very few; his stays in town were only as a passenger, not an inhabitant. The places that he chose for the seats of his declining life were two or three villages on the bank of the Thames. During this recess, his mind was rather exercised on what was to come than what was past; he suffered no more business nor cares of life to come near him than what were enough to keep his soul awake, but not to disturb it. Some few friends and books, a cheerful heart and innocent conscience, were his constant companions.

I acknowledge he chose that state of life not out of any poetical rapture, but upon a steady and sober experience of human things. But, however, I cannot applaud it in him. It is certainly a great disparagement to virtue and learning itself, that those very things which only make men useful in the world should incline them to leave it. This ought never to be allowed to good men, unless the bad had the same moderation, and were willing to follow them into the wilderness. But if the one shall contend to get out of employment, while the other strive to get into it, the affairs of mankind are like to be in so ill a posture, that even the good men themselves will hardly be able to enjoy their very retreats in security.

Lady Rachel Russell by her letters secured a place in literature, though less lofty than the niche in history she won by heroism and wifely love. Rachel Wriothesley (1636-1723) was the second daughter and co-heiress of the Earl of Southampton. In 1669, when widow of Lord Vaughan, she married Lord William Russell, the third son of the first Duke of Bedford. She was her second husband's senior by three years, yet her amiable and prudent character was said to have reclaimed him from the youthful follies into which he had plunged at the time of the Restoration. His later political career is known to every reader of English history. If ever a man opposed the course of a government in a pure and unselfish spirit, that man was Lord William Russell. The suspicious correspondence with Barillon (see the section on ALGERNON SIDNEY, Vol. I. page 715) leaves him unsullied, for the ambassador distinctly mentions Russell and Lord Holles as two who would not accept bribes When brought to trial (July 1683), under the same circumstances as those which have been related in Sidney's case-with a packed jury and a brutal judge-and refused a counsel to coaduct his defence, the only grace that was allowed him was to have an amanuensis. When Lord Russell asked, 'May I have somebody to write, to assist my memory?' the Attorney-General answered, 'Yes, a servant;' and the Lord Chief-Justice added, 'Any of your servants shall assist you in writing anything you please for you.' But Lord Russell proudly replied, 'My wife is here, my lord, to do it.' And when the spectators turned their eyes and beheld the devoted lady rising to aid her lord in his uttermost distress, a thrill of sympathy ran through the assembly. Lady Russell, after the condemnation of her husband, personally pled for his pardon, but in vain. He loved her as such a wife deserved to be loved; and on taking his final farewell of her, said, 'The bitterness of death is now past! Fifty years after Lady Russell's death appeared that collection of her Letters which entitled her to a place in our literary history. Dr Fitzwilliam, her father's chaplain, became Canon of Windsor. Lord William Cavendish, afterwards second Duke of Devonshire, married Lady Russell's daughter. Henri Massue de Ruvigny, Lady Russell's cousin, was a Huguenot noble (son of a French ambassador) who settled in England on the Revocation of the Edict or Nantes, took service under William III., and was made Viscount (1692) and Earl (1697) of Galway.

To Dr Fitzwilliam.

As you profess, good Doctor, to take pleasure in you writings to me, from the testimony of a conscience to forward my spiritual welfare, so do I to receive them = one to me of your friendship in both worldly and spiritusconcernments; doing so, I need not waste my time not yours to tell you they are very valuable to me. That you are so contented to read mine, I make the just allowance for; not for the worthiness of them, I know it cannot be; but however, it enables me to keep up an advantageous conversation without scruple of being to troublesome. You say something sometimes, by which I should think you seasoned or rather tainted with being so much where compliment or praising is best learned but I conclude that often what one heartily wishes to be in a friend, one is apt to believe is so. The effect is no nought towards me, whom it animates to have a true not false title to the least virtue you are disposed to attribute to me. Yet I am far from such a vigour o mind as surmounts the secret discontent so hard a destin as mine has fixt in my breast; but there are times th mind can hardly feel displeasure as while such friendl conversation entertaineth it, then a grateful sense move one to express the courtesie.

If I could contemplate the conducts of Providence with the uses you do, it would give ease indeed, and no disastrous events should much affect us. The new scenes of each day make me often conclude myself very void of temper and reason, that I still shed tears of sorrow and not of joy, that so good a man is landed safe on the happy shore of a blessed eternity; doubtless he is at rest, the' I find none without him, so true a partner he was in all my joys and griefs; I trust the Almighty will pass by this my infirmity; I speak it in respect to the world, from whose enticing delights I can now be better weaned. I was too rich in possessions whilst I possest him: all relish is now gone, I bless God for it, and pray, and ask of all good people (do it for me from such you know are so) also to pray that I may more and more turn the stream of my affections upwards, and set my heart upon the ever-satisfying perfections of God; not starting at his darkest providences, but remembering continually either his glory, justice, or power is advanced by every one of them, and that mercy is over all his works, as we shall one day with ravishing delight see: in the mean time, I endeavour to suppress all wild imaginations a melancholy fancy is apt to let in, and say with the man in the gospel: 'I believe; help thou my unbelief.' . . .

WOBORNE ABBY, 27th Noor. 1685.

To Lord Cavendish.

Tho' I know my letters do Lord Cavendish no service, yet as a respect I love to pay him, and to thank him also for his last from Limbeck, I had not been so long silent, if the death of two persons both very near and dear to me had not made me so uncomfortable to myself, that I knew I was utterly unfit to converse where I would never be ill company. The separation of friends is grievous. My sister Mountague was one I loved tenderly; my Lord Gainsborough was the only son of a sister I loved with too much passion: they both deserved to be remembered kindly by all that knew them. both began their race long after me, and I hoped should have ended it so too; but the great and wise Disposer of all things, and who knows where 'tis best to place his creatures, either in this or in the other world, has ordered it otherwise. The best improvement we can make in these cases, and you, my dear Lord, rather than I, whose glass runs low, while you are young, and I hope have many happy years to come, is, I say, that we should all reflect there is no passing thro' this to a better world without some crosses; and the scene sometimes shifts so last, our course of life may be ended before we think we have gone half-way; and that a happy eternity depends on our spending well or ill that time allotted us here for Probation.

Live virtuously, my lord, and you can't dye too soon, sor live too long. I hope the last shall be your lot, with many blessings attending it.

29th October 1690.

To the Earl of Galway.

I have before me, my good lord, two of your letters, both partially and tenderly kind, and coming from a sincere heart and honest mind (the last a plain word, but, if I mistake not, very significant) are very comfortable to me, who, I hope, have no proud thoughts of myself as to any sort. The opinion of an esteemed friend, that one is not very wrong, assists to strengthen a weak and willing mind to do her duty towards that

Almighty Being who has from infinite bounty and goodness so checkered my days on this earth, as I can thankfully reflect I felt many, I may say as many years of pure and (I trust) innocent, pleasant content, and happy enjoyments as this world can afford, particularly that biggest blessing of loving and being loved by those I loved and respected; on earth no enjoyment certainly to be put in the ballance with it. All other are like wine, which intoxicates for a time, but the end is bitterness, at least not profitable. Mr Waller, whose picture you look upon, has, I long remember, these words:

Is that they sing and that they love.'

The best news I have heard is, you have two good companions with you, which I trust will contribute to divert you this sharp season, when, after so sore a fit as I apprehend you have felt, the air even of your improving pleasant garden can't be enjoyed without hazard.

[1712.]

Richard Cumberland (1631-1718), born at London, and educated at St Paul's and at Cambridge, held various cures from 1658, and was raised by King William to the see of Peterborough in 1691. He had published, in 1672, a Latin work, De Legibus Natura Disquisitio Philosophica, 'A Philosophical Inquiry into the Laws of Nature; in which their form, order, promulgation, and obligation are investigated from the nature of things; and in which also the philosophical principles of Hobbes, moral as well as civil, are considered and refuted.' This erudite but verbose treatise expounds some novel views, and lays down a distinctly utilitarian criterion in ethics. The laws of nature he deduces from the results of human conduct, regarding that to be commanded by God which conduces to the happiness of man. The public good is the summum bonum, and 'universal benevolence' the fountain of all virtue. He wrote also a learned essay on Jewish Weights and Measures (1686), dedicatedoddly enough-to his friend Samuel Pepys, then President of the Royal Society; and a translation of Sanchoniatho's Phænician History (translated from Eusebius, with disquisitions; not published till 1720). He was a really learned man and an acute thinker, but at best a poor writer: his sentences are involved; he lacks humour and vivacity, grace and point; and his works are hopelessly tedious even where most suggestive. In the performance of his Episcopal duties he displayed rare activity, moderation, and benevolence. When expostulated with by friends about his too great labours, he replied with the now proverbial maxim, 'I will do my duty as long as I can; a man had better wear out than rust out.' Yet he lived to the age of eighty-six, in the enjoyment of such mental vigour that he successfully studied Coptic only three years before his death. The dramatist who bore the bishop's name was his great-grandson.

There is a Life by Payne prefixed to the Sanchoniathon (1720). The De Legibus was twice translated (by Meacock in 1727, by Towers in 1750).

Tate and Brady, if they resemble Beaumont and Fletcher in nothing else, are in the mouths and memories of Englishmen as inseparably associated; it is impossible to say Tate without thinking Brady. The rather uninspired pair in whose 'New Version' the English Church and people sang the Psalms of David for more than a hundred years were both Irish-born; one was wholly, the other partly, educated in Ireland.

Nahum Tate (1652-1715), son of a Dublin clergyman, was educated at Trinity College. He succeeded Shadwell as poet-laureate in 1690, in 1702 became also historiographer-royal, and is described by Oldys as 'a free, good-natured, His writings include ten fuddling companion.' dramatic pieces-one named from the mythical Brutus of Alba; adaptations of Shakespeare's Richard II. and Lear, and of plays by Chapman, Fletcher, and Marston. Addison denounced Tate's perversion of Lear, Johnson defended it, and it kept the stage till well into the nineteenth century. Other publications were Poems on Several Occasions (1677) and Panacea or a Poem on Tea. He wrote a second part of Absalom and Achitophel, with a very successful imitation of Dryden's manner; and two hundred lines of the continuation and many passages here and there seem to have been actually added by Dryden himself. Tate did much work in collaboration with others, and executed some translations for the booksellers. His poetical taste may be judged by his translation, with high commendation, of the extraordinary poem of Fracastoro, Syphilidis sive Morbi Gallici Libri Tres, which enriched medical science with a new term. Early poems contain verses on subjects as unscriptural as a beldame song, a bawd who sat for her picture, skating (Sliding on Skates in Hard Frost), Lesbia's sparrow from Catullus, and drunken-amorous adventures from Propertius; and some of his verses are far from contemptible. But his name survives solely by the metrical version of the Psalms (1696), executed in conjunction with Nicholas Brady, which gradually supplanted the older version of Sternhold and Hopkins (see Vol. I. p. 150). The work as a whole was poor, but portions are not without poetic quality. The Supplement to the New Version (1703) was possibly the work of Tate alone; one thing in it, 'While shepherds watched,' has travelled over the Christian world. 'As pants the hart' is a rendering far above the usual level. Southey ranks Tate as poorest of the laureates after Shadwell; Ralph and Austin thought Eusden and Pye had a prior claim to come next Shadwell. Tate died in hiding from his creditors.

The following is in quite a different rhythm and tone from the Psalms:

On a Diseased Old Man who Wept at the Thought of Leaving the World.

Shame on thy Beard! that thou canst Bug-bears dread, Fear Death whom thou so oft hast seen, So oft his Guest at Funerals hast been; Thy self, I mean thy Better Half, already Dead!
The Tears were just which at thy Birth did flow,
For then, alass! thou cams't t'engage
The Miseries of Life, but now
Thou art allowed to quit the Tragick Stage;
Now to be careful to prolong the scene,
And act thy Troubles o'er agen,
Is Folly not to be forgiv'n even in thy doating Age.

Can Cramps, Catarrhs, and Palsies be Such charming Company?
What Pleasures can the grave deprive Thy Senses of? what Inconvenience give,
From which thou art exempted while alive?
At worst thou canst but have Cold lodging in the grave,
Nor ly'st thou warmer now, tho' cover'd o'er
In Furr, till thy faint limbs can bear no more.

Thou sleeps't each night in so much Sear-cloth bourd.

Thou 'dst need no more to lodge thee underground.

Nicholas Brady (1659-1726), born at Bando was educated at Westminster, Christ Churc (Oxford), and Dublin, and held from 1696 to h death the living of Richmond, along with Stratforn on-Avon and Clapham in succession. He alk kept a school at Richmond. The metrical versic of the Psalms by him and Tate was authorise in 1696. His tragedy, The Rape, on a plot from the history of the Goths and Vandals, his bland verse Eneid, his Ode for St Cecilia's Day, ar his sermons have long since sunk into deserve oblivion.

Thomas Tenison (1636-1715), Archbishs of Canterbury, born at Cottenham in Cambridg shire, studied at Corpus Christi, Cambridge, as was made Bishop of Lincoln by William III. 1691, and primate of all England in 1694. It was a favourite at court, crowned Queen An and George I., and strongly supported t Hanoverian succession. His works comprianti-papal tracts, sermons, and a criticism Hobbes; but though Swift was unfair when said he was a very dull man, the Archbishs was not a power in literature, and his books a not read.

Matthew Henry (1662-1714) was born : Broad Oak farmhouse, Malpas, Flintshire, th son of Philip Henry, a pious and learned ministe just ousted by the Act of Uniformity. He entere as a student of law in Gray's Inn; but, yielding t a strong desire for the office of the ministry, I soon abandoned the pursuit of the law, and turne his attention to theology, which he studied wi great diligence and zeal. In 1687 he was chose pastor of a Nonconformist congregation at Cheste whence he removed in 1712 to Hackney. variety of theological works published by him, tl largest and best known is his Exposition of the O and New Testaments (1710), which he did not li to complete, the Commentary on the Epistles beil added by various divines. The work has lit exegetical value, and is far from being a safe gui ctual meaning of the sacred text; but as a of practical religion and manual of hints it use, it soon secured a place in the very is of expository works. Robert Hall for two years of his life read daily two chapters thew Henry's Commentary, increasingly d with the copiousness, variety, and pious y of the thoughts; the simplicity, strength, gnancy of the expressions. Chalmers was admirer of Henry; and for nearly two s the Commentary was the constant study ion and vade-mecum of a very large proof evangelical preachers of all denomina-English-speaking countries and colonies. lowing extract from the exposition of v vi. 24 may be taken as a specimen of ous and pointed remarks with which the ounds:

le cannot serve God and Mammon.'

God saith: 'My e me thine heart; Mammon saith: 'No, me.' God saith: 'Be content with such ; ye have;' Mammon saith: 'Grasp at all thou canst-"Rem, rem, quocunque modo God saith: 'Defraud not; never tell a lye; be nd just in all thy dealings;' Mammon saith: hy own father if thou canst get by it.' Thus inconsistent are the com-God and Mammon, so that we cannot serve et us not, then, halt between God and Baal, but ou this day whom ye will serve,' and abide by y Aldrich (1647-1710), born at Westpassed in 1662 from Westminster School it Church, Oxford, of which he became in 1682, and dean in 1689. He it was sed Charles Boyle to edit the Epistles iris (see Vol. I. p. 754), and so started orable controversy. He designed the er Quadrangle, wrote the well-known catch, 'Hark, the bonny Christ Church Bells,' and a 'smoking catch' for four smokers, set English words to Italian anthems and songs, and indited Latin verses and epigrams; but he is less remembered as architect, verse-writer, composer, or inveterate smoker than as the author of the Artis Logica Compendium (1691), which was long a standard text-book, and of which, though it is a by no means brilliant performance, a new edition appeared in 1862.

Humphrey Prideaux (1648-1724), born at Padstow, from Westminster passed to Christ Church, Oxford. His Marmora Oxoniensia (1676), an account of the Arundel Marbles, procured for him patronage through which he was in 1679 appointed rector of St Clement's, Oxford, and erelong a canon of Norwich. 1688 he became Archdeacon of Suffolk, and in 1702 Dean of Norwich. His nine works include a Life of Mahomet (1697), Directions to Churchwardens (1701; 15th ed. 1886), and The Old and New Testament connected in the History of the Jews and Neighbouring Nations (1715-17; 27th ed. 1876). See Prideaux's Letters to John Ellis (Camden Soc. 1875). In virtue of the first and last named books he long ranked as a historian. The Life of Mahomet is wholly polemical, levelled as much against the English deists as against the Arabian impostor. But Prideaux's Connection, as the more important work was generally called, was a solid contribution to the knowledge of the subject, though in nowise profound or original; and was only superseded in general use by more scholarly works a century and a half after its appearance.

Sir George Etherege, the Restoration dramatist who in England founded the comedy of intrigue, was born probably in 1634. He lived much in his early life at Paris, studied law, had an intrigue with the actress Mrs Barry (on whose daughter he afterwards settled £6000), was knighted and married a wealthy widow, and in 1686 was Resident at the Imperial court at Ratisbon. He varied the monotony of what he regarded as banishment with coursing, drinking, play, flirtation with actresses, and correspondence with Middleton, Dryden, Betterton, and others. He seems to have died in Paris in 1691, and not, as used to be said, by falling downstairs after a banquet at Ratisbon. He sought his inspiration in Molière, and out of his comedy of intrigue grew the legitimate comedy of manners that culminated in Congreve and rendered possible the dramatic triumphs of Goldsmith and Sheridan. The Jonsonian types and 'humours' made way for real characters, sketched from the life even when the portraiture is but superficial; his fops are unsurpassed. He is less brutal and more sprightly and frivolous than Wycherley, but not so eminent a master of theatrical effect; several of his characters are more perfectly individualised, more human, concrete, and living than either Wycherley's or Congreve's, though Congreve's work shows more power. Rochester lamented that Etherege's indolence checked the productiveness of a man 'who had as much sense, fancy, judgment, and wit as any writer of the day.' His three plays are The Comical Revenge; or, Love in a Tub (1664); She Would if She Could (1668); and The Man of Mode; or, Sir Fopling Flutter (1676)-all highly popular in their day. The first is mainly a farce; the second has serious scenes and a good deal of buffoonery; the third is the best and most readable. Dorimant, accepted as a sketch of Rochester, and Sir Fopling a study of the then famous Beau Hewitt, with points taken from Etherege himself, passed into literature as striking characterisations. Medley was Sir Charles Sedley. With all his grossness, 'gentle George' shows both restraint and a certain distinction.

From 'The Man of Mode.'

Medley. Is it not great indiscretion for a man of credit, who may have money enough on his word, to go and deal with Jews, who for little sums make men enter into bonds, and give judgment?

Bellair. Preach no more on this text; I am determin'd, and there is no hope of my conversion.

Dorimant. Leave your unnecessary fiddling; a wasp that's buzzing about a man's nose at dinner, is not more troublesome than thou art.

[70 HANDY.]

Handy. You love to have your cloaths hang just, sir.

Dor. I love to be well dress'd, sir; and think it no scandal to my understanding.

Handy. Will you use the essence, or orange-flower

Dor. I will smell as I do to day, no offence to the ladies' noses.

Handy. Your pleasure, sir.

Dor. That a man's excellency shou'd lye in neatly tying of a ribbond, or a cravat! How careful's nature in furnishing the world with necessary coxcombs!

Bell. That's a mighty pretty suit of yours, Dorimant.

Dor. I am glad 't has your approbation.

Bell. No man in town has a better fancy in his cloaths than you have.

Dor. You will make me have an opinion of my genius.

Med. There is a great critick, I hear, in these matters lately arriv'd piping hot from Paris.

Bell. Sir Fopling Flutter, you mean.

Med. The same.

Bell. He thinks himself the pattern of modern gallantry.

Dor. He is indeed the pattern of modern foppery.

Med. He was yesterday at the play, with a pair of gloves up to his elbows, and a perriwig more exactly curl'd than a lady's head newly dress'd for a ball.

Bell. What a pretty lisp he has!

Dor. Ho! that he affects in imitation of the people of quality in France.

Med. His head stands for the most part on one side, and his looks are more languishing than a lady's when she lolls at stretch in her coach, or leans her head carelessly against the side of a box i' the play-house.

Dor. He is a person indeed of great acquir'd follies.

Med. He is like many others, beholden to his education for making him so eminent a coxcomb; many a fool had been lost to the world, had their indulgent parents wisely bestow'd neither learning nor good breeding on 'em.

Bell. He has been, as the sparkish word is, brisk upon the ladies already; he was yesterday at my aunt Townley's, and gave Mrs Loveit a catalogue of his good qualities, under the character of a complete gentleman, who, according to Sir Fopling, ought to dress well, dance well, fence well, have a genius for love-letters, an agreable voice for a chamber, be very amorous, something discreet, but not over constant.

Med. Pretty ingredients to make an accomplish'd person.

Dor. I am glad he pitch'd upon Loveit.

Bell. How so?

Dor. I wanted a fop to lay to her charge, and this is as pat may be.

Bell. I am confident she loves no man but you.

Dor. The good fortune were enough to make me vain, but that I am in my nature modest.

Bell. Hark you, Dorimant, with your leave, Mr. Medley, 'tis only a secret concerning a fair lady.

Med. Your good breeding, sir, gives you too much trouble; you might have whisper'd without all this ceremony.

Bell. How stand your affairs with Bellinda of late?

Dor. She's a little jilting baggage.

Bell. Nay, I believe her false enough, but she's ne'er the worse for your purpose; she was with you yesterday in a disguise at the play.

Dor. There we fell out, and resolv'd never to speak toone another more.

Bell. The occasion?

Dor. Want of courage to meet me at the place appointed. These young women apprehend loving, so much as the young men do fighting at first; but once enter'd, like them too, they all turn bullies straight.

Handy. Sir, your man without desires to speak withyou. [To Bellale.

ou. [To Bellair— Bell. Gentlemen, I'll return immediately. [Exil—

Med. A very pretty fellow this.

Dor. He's handsom, well bred, and by much the most tolerable of all the young men that do not abound in wit.

Med. Ever well dress'd, always complaisant, and seldom impertinent; you and he are grown very intimate.

Dor. It is our mutual interest to be so; it makes the women think the better of his understanding, and judge more favourably of my reputation; it makes him pass upon some for a man of very good sense, and me upon others for a very civil person.

Med. What was that whisper?

Dor. A thing which he wou'd fain have known, but 1 did not think it fit to tell him; it might have frighted him from his honourable intentions of marrying.

Med. Emilia, give her her due, has the best reputation of any young woman about the town, who has beauty enough to provoke detraction; her carriage is unaffected, her discourse modest, not at all censorious, nor pretending like the counterfeits of the age.

See Gosse's Seventeenth Century Studies (1883), and the edition of Etherege's works by A. W. Verity (1888).

Thomas Shadwell, a dramatic writer of some note in his day, though now hardly remembered save as the 'MacFlecknoe' of Dryden's satire, was born in 1640 or 1642 at Broomhill House, near Brandon in Norfolk, the son of a gentleman of He passed from Cambridge without a degree to the Middle Temple; but not finding law to his liking, he deserted it, and after an interval of foreign travel, betook himself seriously His first comedy of The Sullen to literature. Lovers (1668), based on Molière, had great success, and he continued from year to year to entertain the town with a succession of pieces, of which nearly a score are extant and fill a complete edition in four volumes (1720). condemned The Royal Shepherdess (1668) for its silliness; The Humourists is not open to the same criticism. Epsom Wells (1720) is coarse but clever. The Miser is Molière's Avare with new characters and incidents. The Enchanted Island is a rifacimento of Shakespeare's Tempest; and in his preface to Timon of Athens, while professing respect for 'the inimitable hand of Shakespear,' Shadwell 'can truly say, I have made it into a play,' by dislocating the action, introducing new and superfluous characters (especially women) and new scenes and passages, omitting much of the best, abridging, paraphrasing, and expanding Shakespeare's words, and transmogrifying the whole into a caricature. The Libertine has Don Juan for hero. The True Widow, The Lancashire Witches, The Squire of Alsatia, Bury Fair, The Amorous Bigot, and The Volunteers (not published till 1693) are others of the plays. Shadwell made Ben Jonson his model, and sought to amuse by the humours or eccentricities of his typical characters; but most of his plays belong rather to the comedy of manners as illustrated by Wycherley. Shadwell also wrote numerous odes and occasional poems. The immortality which the plays must have failed to achieve for him he was fated to attain in another way. With Dryden he was at first on terms of friendly intimacy, and indeed the great poet contributed the prologue to his True Widow; but when Dryden flung his Absalom and Achitophel and The Medal into the cause of the court, Shadwell was rash enough to make a gross attack upon him in the Medal of John Bayes, with such mocomplimentary terms as 'half-wit, half-fool,' 'abandoned rascal,' 'knavery,' and the like. Dryden heaped deathless ridicule upon his antagonist in the stinging satire of MacFlecknoe and as 'Og' in the second part of Absalom and Achitophel. MacFlecknoe is called on the titleage 'a Satire on the True Blue Protestant r. S.,' described further as the literary heir and representative of Flecknoe, whom Dryden hought proper to treat as a despicable rhymester see Vol. I. p. 784).

Though Shadwell's works, hasty and careless s they are, exhibit lively talent and comic force, all that the reading world now knows of Shadwell is that 'Shadwell never deviates into But this is obviously a preposterous exaggeration. He was not a poet, but his plays are clever and skilfully put together. That they were gross and indecent could be no reason for Dryden's denunciation; and no doubt personal, professional, and religious hostility made Dryden uncritical in the extravagance of his abuse, as he was unreasonable in the vituperative terms he used of his habits and personal appearance. Rochester, who was no fool, credited Shadwell with exceptional wit and humour in conversation, if not in his plays. Addison praised his humour. Scott recognised him as an acute observer of human nature, and Mr G. A. Aitken has recently spoken of his 'excellent but coarse' comedies, giving interesting pictures of the times. It must have been some consolation to Shadwell to succeed his enemy in the laureateship, which in 1688 Dryden had to resign. He did not survive long to enjoy it, however, as in 1692 he died-of an overdose of laudanum, it is said. 'The times' by Shadwell's representation seem to have been as unvirtuous and anti-virtuous as it is possible to conceive. Of the seven ladies or maids who appear in Epsom Wells, four are expressly described amongst the dramatis personæ as 'an imperious strumpet,' 'very whorish,' or worse; and the other three might have been described in terms not much more complimentary. The main business and amusement alike of men and women was the unholiest self-indulgence. Spite of the obtrusive loyalty to Church and State professed by most of the characters, the clergy who appear are degraded, servile vulgarians, whom the fine old English gentlemen treat with the utmost contempt and insolence (the passages in the Lancashire Witches which give the most disrespectful pictures of a domestic chaplain were expunged at first playing by the Master of the Revels, but printed in italic; the grossest passages seem to have passed muster from the beginning). The fine old English gentleman who hates London ways and French habits equally gives an account of the London magistrates singularly like the revelations in the Tammany trials-the magistrates live off blackmail exacted from footpads, pickpockets, and improper persons of various sex and condition. In the Lancashire Witches the Lancashire dialect is freely used, and with good effect; and the representation of witch-proceedings are justified by long notes from the Malleus Maleficarum, from Remigius, Bodinus, and many other authors.

In the Squire of Alsatia, Belfond, the foolish son of a country squire, comes to London in the absence of his father, and falls among a set of bullies and sharpers—Cheatly, Shamwell, and Captain Hackum—who frequent the Whitefriars or Alsatia, a place behind the Temple, which still preserved the old privileges of sanctuary, and had thus become a notorious haunt of the worst characters in the town. Its privileges were abolished in 1697, nine years after Shadwell's play appeared.

From 'The Squire of Alsatia,' Belfond. Cousin Shamwell, well met; good-morrow to you.

Shamwell. Cousin Belfond, your humble servant: what makes you abroad so early? 'tis not much past seven.

Belf. You know we were bowsy last night: I am a little hot-headed this morning, and come to take the fresh air here in the Temple-Walks.

Sham. Well, and what do you think of our way of living here? Is not rich generous wine better than your poor hedge wine stum'd?

Belf. O yes, a world adad! Ne'er stir, I could never have thought there had been such a gallant place as London: here I can be drunk over night, and well next morning; can ride in a coach for a shilling, as good as a deputy lieutenant;—then for the women! Mercy upon us, so civil and well-bred!... And I am in that fear of my father besides, adad, he'd knock me i'th' head, if he should hear of such a thing. Lord! what will he say when he comes to know I am at London, which he in all his life-time would never suffer me to see, for fear I should be debauch'd, forsooth; and allows me little or no money at home, neither.

Sham. What matter what he says? Is not every foot of the estate entail'd upon you?

Belf. Well, I'll endure't no longer! If I can but raise money I'll teach him to use his son like a dog, I'll warrant him.

Sham. You can ne'er want that: take up on the reversion, 'tis a lusty one; and Cheatly will help you to the ready; and thou shalt shine, and be as gay as any spruce prig that ever walk'd the street.—This morning your cloaths and liveries will come home, and thou shalt appear rich and splendid like thyself, and the mobile shall worship thee.

Belf. The mobile! that's pretty. [CHEATLY enters.] Sweet Mr Cheatly, my best friend, let me embrace thee.

Cheatly. My sprightly son of timber and of acres, my noble heir, I salute thee: the cole is coming, and shall be brought in this morning.

Belf. Cole! Why 'tis summer, I need no firing now. Besides, I intend to burn billets.

Cheat. My lusty rustic, learn and be instructed. Cole is, in the language of the witty, money. The ready, the rhino; thou shalt be rhinocerical, my lad, thou shalt.

Belf. Admirable, I swear! Cole! ready! rhino! rhinocerical! Lord, how long may a man live in ignorance in the country.—And how much cole, ready, and rhino, shall I have?

Cheat. Enough to set thee up to spark it in thy brother's face: and ere thou shalt want the ready, the darby, thou shalt make thy fruitful acres in reversion to fly, and all thy sturdy oaks to bend like switches! But thou must squeeze, my lad, squeeze hard, and seal, my bully. Shamwell and I are to be bound with thee. [HACKUM enters.]

Belf. I am mightily beholden to you both. . . . O, noble Captain Hackum, your servant; servant, Captain.

Hackum. Your humble trout, good noble squire; you were brave and bowzy last night, i' faith you were.

Belf. Yes, really I was clear; for I do not remember what I did, or where I was: clear, clear, is not that right?

Sham. Ay, ay! Why you broke windows; scor/d, broke open a house in Dorset-Court, and took a pretty wench, a gentleman's natural, away by force.

Belf. Now you put me in mind, I recollect somewhat of this matter; my shoulders are plaguy sore, and my arms black and blue; but where 's the wench, the na unal, ha, Captain?

Hack. Ah, Squire, I led her off. I have her safe for you.

Belf. But does not the gallant thunder and roar for her?

Hack. The scoundrel dares not; he knows me, who never knew fear in my life: for my part, I love magnimity and honour, and those things; and fighting is one of my recreations.

Belf. O brave Captain.

Hack. But, Squire, I had damn'd ill luck afterwards; I went up to the Gaming Ordinary, and lost all my ready: they left me not a rag or sock: pox o' the tatts for me; I believe they put the doctor upon me.

Belf. Tatts and doctor! What's that?

Sham. The tools of sharpers, false dice.

Hack. Hark you, pr'ythee, noble Squire, equip me with a couple of meggs, or two couple of smelts.

Belf. Smelts! What, shall we bespeak another dish of Belf. Smelts! What, shall we bespeak another dish of fish for our dinner?

Sham. No, no, meggs are guineas, smelts are half guineas; he would borrow a couple of guineas.

Belf. Meggs! smelts! Ha, ha, ha, very pretty by my troth: and so thou shalt, dear Captain; there are two meggs; and I vow and swear I am glad I have 'em to pleasure you, adad I am.

Hack. You are so honest a gentleman, quarrel every day and I'll be your second; once a day at least: and I'll say this for you, there's not a finer gentleman this day walks the Fryars, no dispraise to any man, let him be what he will.

Belf. Adad you make me proud, sir. [Lolpoop enters.] O Lolpoop, where have you been all this morning, sirth?

tm Wycherley (1640?-1716), born at ir Shrewsbury, where his father possessed me property, was, next to Congreve, chief tool of the comedy of manners. Though the law, Wycherley did not practise his n, but lived gaily 'upon town.' Pope says a true nobleman look,' and he was one of nites of the Duchess of Cleveland. He ir comedies-Love in a Wood (1672), The n Dancing-master (1673), The Country 75), and The Plain Dealer (1677). The received with applause; the second, a omedy of intrigue, was not so popular; the Wife, greatly cleverer, is much coarser in details than Molière's École des Femmes, it is largely based; the Plain Dealer, erpiece, is founded on Le Misanthrope. was written when the author was only ; the last was acted in 1674. In spite of tiness, the Country Wife was praised by a 'very pleasant and instructive satire;' calls Wycherley 'my dear friend' and ent poet, speaks of 'the satire, wit, and of manly Wycherley,' and commends the ealer as 'one of the most bold, most and most useful satires which has ever sented in the English theatre.' The nanly Wycherley' must surely have had in it something of the nature of a complimentary pun, and an allusion to the chief character in the Plain Dealer. Voltaire says: 'All Wycherley's strokes are stronger and bolder than those of our Misanthrope, but then they are less delicate, and the rules of decorum are not so well observed.' Pope was proud to receive the notice of the author of the Country Wife. Their published correspondence is well known, and is interesting from the superiority maintained in their intercourse by the boy-poet of sixteen over his mentor of sixty-four. The pupil grew too great for his master, and the unnatural friendship was dissolved, renewed, and broken again. Wycherley represents the comedy of manners, not the comedy of human nature; wit, humour, sprightly conversation, mirthful situations talk, are aimed at rather than strength of plot or credibility. The whole is utterly artificial, and therefore the nastiness is perhaps less offensive. Congreve is vastly more brilliant in Wycherley's own line. Macaulay has vehemently impeached Wycherley's profligacy and the indecency and artificiality of his plays, and has justly said that his verse, of which a volume was published late in his life, was beneath criticism. Leigh Hunt thought some of the detached Maxims and Reflections written by Wycherley in his old age not unworthy of his reputation, and quoted as specially good, 'The silence of a wise man is more wrong to mankind than the slanderer's speech.' Wycherley married the young widow the Countess of Drogheda, lived unhappily with her, and after her death was constantly in debt or money troubles. He spent some years in the Fleet; but James II., having seen the Plain Dealer, paid his debts and gave him a pension. At the age of seventy-five Wycherley married a young girl in order to defeat the expectations of his nephew, and died eleven days afterwards. The extracts that follow are both from the Plain Dealer.

Mr Manly and Lord Plausible.

Manly. Tell not me, my good Lord Plausible, of your decorums, supercilious forms, and slavish ceremonies! your little tricks, which you, the spaniels of the world, do daily over and over, for and to one another; not out of love or duty, but your servile fear.

Plausible. Nay, i' faith, i' faith, you are too passionate; and I must humbly beg your pardon and leave to tell you they are the arts and rules the prudent of the world walk by.

Man. Let 'em. But I'll have no leading-strings; I can walk alone. I hate a harness, and will not tug on in a faction, kissing my leader behind, that another slave may do the like to me.

Plaus. What, will you be singular then? like nobody? follow, love, and esteem nobody?

Man. Rather than be general, like you, follow everybody; court and kiss everybody; though perhaps at the same time you hate everybody.

Plaus. Why, seriously, with your pardon, my dear friend-

Man. With your pardon, my no friend, I will not, as you do, whisper my hatred or my scorn, call a man fool or knave by signs or mouths over his shoulder, whilst you have him in your arms. For such as you, like common whores and pickpockets, are only dangerous to those you embrace.

Plaus. Such as I! Heavens defend me! upon my

Man. Upon your title, my lord, if you'd have me believe you.

Plaus. Well, then, as I am a person of honour, I never attempted to abuse or lessen any person in my life.

Man. What, you were afraid?

Plaus. No, but seriously, I hate to do a rude thing; no, faith, I speak well of all mankind.

Man. I thought so: but know, that speaking well of all mankind is the worst kind of detraction; for it takes away the reputation of the few good men in the world, by making all alike. Now, I speak ill of most men, because they deserve it; I that can do a rude thing, rather than an unjust thing.

Plaus. Well, tell not me, my dear friend, what people deserve; I ne'er mind that. I, like an author in a dedication, never speak well of a man for his sake, but my own. I will not disparage any man to disparage myself: for to speak ill of people behind their backs is not like a person of honour, and truly to speak ill of 'em to their faces is not like a complaisant person. But if I did say or do an ill thing to anybody, it should be sure to be behind their backs, out of pure good manners.

Man. Very well, but I that am an unmannerly seafellow, if I ever speak well of people (which is very seldom indeed) it should be sure to be behind their backs; and if I would say or do ill to any, it should be to their faces. I would jostle a proud, strutting, overlooking coxcomb, at the head of his sycophants, rather than put out my tongue at him when he were past me; would frown in the arrogant, big, dull face of an overgrown knave of business, rather than vent n against him when his back were turned; we fawning slaves the lie whilst they embrace mend me; cowards, whilst they brag; call by no other title, though his father had led duke's; laugh at fools aloud before their m and must desire people to leave me, when the grow at last as troublesome as they were impertinent.

Wid. Why to the other?

Old. Because he is my bookseller, lady.

Wid. What, to sell you lozenges for your catarrh? or medicines for your corns? What else can a major deal with a bookseller for?

Old. Lady, he prints for me.

Wid. Why, are you an author?

Old. Of some few essays; deign you, lady, to peruse 'em.—[Aside.] She is a woman of parts; and I must win her by showing mine.

Bookseller's Boy. Will you see Culpepper, mistress? 'Aristotle's Problems?' 'The Complete Midwife?'

Wid. No; let's see Dalton, Hughs, Shepherd, Wingate.

B. Boy. We have no law books.

Wid. No! you are a pretty bookseller then.

Old. Come, have you e'er a one of my essays left?

B. Boy. Yes, sir, we have enough, and shall always have 'em.

Old. How so?

B. Boy. Why, they are good, steady, lasting ware.
Old. Nay, I hope they will live; let's see.—Be pleased, madam, to peruse the poor endeavours of my

Jer. Pray let me see 'St George for Christendom,' or 'The Seven Champions of England.'

Wid. No, no; give him 'The Young Clerk's Guide.'

and wearing red breeches.

Old. Nay, if you talk of military discipline, show him my 'Treatise of the Art Military.'

Wid. Hold; I would as willingly he should read a play.

Jer. O, pray forsooth, mother, let me have a play.

Wid. No, sirrah; there are young students of the law enough spoiled already by plays. They would make you in love with your laundress, or, what's worse, some queen of the stage that was a laundress. . . . But stay, Jerry, is not that Mr What d'ye-call-him, that goes there, he that offered to sell me a suit in chancery for five hundred pounds, for a hundred down, and only paying the clerk's fees?

Jer. Ay, forsooth, 'tis he.

Wid. Then stay here, and have a care of the bags, whilst I follow him.—Have a care of the bags, I say.

Jer. And do you have a care, forsooth, of the statute against champarty, I say. [Exit Widow BLACKACRE.

Song from 'Abdelazer.'

Love in fantastic triumph sat,
Whilst bleeding hearts around him flowed,
For whom fresh pains he did create,
And strange tyrannic power he shewed.
From thy bright eyes he took his fires,
Which round about in sport he hurled:
But 'twas from mine he took desires
Enough to undo the amorous world.

From me he took his sighs and tears,
From thee his pride and cruelty;
From me his languishment and fears,
And every killing dart from thee:
Thus thou and I the god have armed,
And set him up a deity:
But my poor heart alone is harmed,
While thine the victor is, and free.

The Dream.

The grove was gloomy all around, Murmuring the stream did pass, Where fond Astræa laid her down Upon a bed of grass; I slept and saw a piteous sight, Cupid a-weeping lay, Till both his little stars of light Had wept themselves away. Methought I asked him why he cried; My pity led me on,-All sighing the sad boy replied, 'Alas! I am undone! As I beneath you myrtles lay, Down by Diana's springs, Amyntas stole my bow away, And pinioned both my wings.' "Alas!" I cried, "twas then thy darts Wherewith he wounded me? Thou mighty deity of hearts, He stole his power from thee? Revenge thee, if a god thou be, Upon the amorous swain, I'll set thy wings at liberty, And thou shalt fly again;

And, for this service on my part,
All I demand of thee
Is, wound Amyntas' cruel heart,
And make him die for me.'
His silken fetters I untied,
And those gay wings displayed,
Which gently fanned, he mounting cried,
'Farewell, fond easy maid!'
At this I blushed, and angry grew
I should a god believe,
And waking found my dream too true,
For I was still a slave.

Oroonoko, the hero of the romance, was a young and gallant African prince, grandson of the reigning king; eminently accomplished and distinguished for his military prowess, he was thus shamefully betrayed into slavery by Englishmen:

Oroonoko was no sooner return'd from this last conquest, and receiv'd at court with all the joy and magnificence that could be express'd to a young victor, who was not only return'd triumphant, but belov'd like a deity, than there arriv'd in port an English ship. The master of it had often before been in these countries, and was very well known to Oroonoko, with whom he had traffick'd for slaves, and had us'd to do the same with his predecessors.

This commander was a man of a finer sort of address and conversation, better bred, and more engaging than most of that sort of men are; so that he seem'd rather never to have been bred out of a court, than almost all his life at sea. This captain therefore was always better receiv'd at court than most of the traders to those countries were; and especially by Oroonoko, who was more civiliz'd, according to the European mode, than any other had been, and took more delight in the white nations; and, above all, men of parts and wit. To this captain he sold abundance of his slaves; and for the favour and esteem he had for him, made him many presents, and oblig'd him to stay at court as long as possibly he could. Which the captain seem'd to take as a very great honour done him, entertaining the prince every day with globes and maps, and mathematical discourses and instruments; eating, drinking, hunting, and living with him with so much familiarity, that it was not to be doubted but he had gain'd very greatly upon the heart of this gallant young man. And the captain, in return of all these mighty favours, besought the prince to honour his vessel with his presence some day or other at dinner, before he should set sail; which he condescended to accept, and appointed his day. The captain, on his part, fail'd not to have all things in a readiness, in the most magnificent order he could possibly: and the day being come, the captain, in his boat richly adorn'd with carpets and velvet cushions, rowed to the shore to receive the prince; with another longboat, where was plac'd all his musick and trumpets, with which Oroonoko was extremely delighted; who met him on the shore, attended by his French governor, Jamoan, Aboan, and about an hundred of the noblest of the youths of the court: and after they had first carried the prince on board, the boats fetch'd the rest off, where they found a very splendid treat, with all sorts of fine wines, and were as well entertain'd as 'twas possible in such a place to be.

The prince having drank hard of punch and several sorts of wine, as did all the rest (for great care was taken they should want nothing of that part of the entertainment), was very merry, and in great admiration of the ship, for he had never been in one before; so that he was curious of beholding every place where he decently might descend. The rest, no less curious, who were not quite overcome with drinking, rambled at their pleasure fore and aft, as their fancies guided 'em: so that the captain, who had well laid his design before, gave the word, and seiz'd on all his guests; they clapping great irons suddenly on the prince, when he was leap'd down into the hold, to view that part of the vessel; and locking him fast down, secur'd him. The same treachery was us'd to all the rest; and all in one instant, in several places of the ship, were lash'd fast in irons, and betray'd to slavery. That great design over, they set all hands at work to hoist sail; and with as treacherous as fair a wind they made from the shore with this innocent and glorious prize, who thought of nothing less than such an entertainment.

Some have commended this act, as brave in the captain; but I will spare my sense of it, and leave it to my reader to judge as he pleases. It may be easily guess'd in what manner the prince resented this indignity, who may be best resembled to a lion taken in a toil; so he raged, so he struggled for liberty, but all in vain: and they had so wisely managed his fetters, that he could not use a hand in his defence, to quit himself of a life that would by no means endure slavery; nor could he move from the place where he was ty'd, to any solid part of the ship, against which he might have beat his head, and have finish'd his disgrace that way. So that being deprived of all other means, he resolv'd to perish for want of food; and pleas'd at last with that thought, and toil'd and tir'd by rage and indignation, he laid himself down and sullenly resolv'd upon dying, and refused all things that were brought him.

This did not a little vex the captain, and the more so because he found almost all of 'em of the same humour; so that the loss of so many brave slaves, so tall and goodly to behold, would have been very considerable: he therefore order'd one to go from him (for he would not be seen himself) to Oroonoko, and to assure him he was afflicted for having rashly done so unhospitable a deed, and which could not be now remedied, since they were far from shore; but since he resented it in so high a nature, he assur'd him he would revoke his resolution, and set both him and his friends ashore on the next land they should touch at; and of this the messenger gave him his oath, provided he would resolve to live. And Oroonoko. whose honour was such, as he never had violated a word in his life himself, much less a solemn asseveration, believ'd in an instant what this man said; but reply'd he expected for a confirmation of this to have his shameful fetters dismiss'd. This demand was carried to the captain, who return'd him answer that the offence had been so great which he had put upon the prince, that he durst not trust him with liberty while he remain'd in the ship, for fear lest by a valour natural to him, and a revenge that would animate that valour, he might commit some outrage fatal to himself and the king his master, to whom the vessel did belong. To this Oroonoko reply'd, he would engage his honour to behave himself in all friendly order and manner, and obey the command of the captain, as he was lord of the king's vessel, and general of those men under his command.

This was deliver'd to the still doubting captain, who could not resolve to trust a heathen, he said, upon his parole, a man that had no sense or notion of the god that he worshipp'd. Oroonoko then reply'd, he was very sorry to hear that the captain pretended to the knowledge and worship of any gods, who had taught him no better principles than not to credit as he would be credited, but they told him the difference of their faith occasion! that distrust: for the captain had protested to him upon the word of a Christian, and sworn in the name of a great God; which if he should violate, he must expect etend torments in the world to come. 'Is that all the obligations he has to be just to his oath? (reply'd Oroonola) Let him know, I swear by my honour; which to violate would not only render me contemptible and despised by all brave and honest men, and so give my self perpend pain, but it would be eternally offending and displesing all mankind; harming, betraying, circumventing, outraging all men. But punishments hereafter are sie fer'd by one's self; and the world takes no cognizant whether this God has reveng'd 'em or not, 'tis done s secretly, and deferr'd so long; while the man of w honour suffers every moment the scorn and contempt of the honester world, and dies every day ignominiously it his fame, which is more valuable than life. I speak at this to move belief, but to shew you how you mistake when you imagine that he who will violate his home will keep his word with his gods.' So, turning from his with a disdainful smile, he refused to answer him, when he urged him to know what answer he should carry back to his captain; so that he departed without saying my more.

The captain pondering and consulting what to do, was concluded that nothing but Oroonoko's liberty would encourage any of the rest to eat, except the Frenchman, whom the captain could not pretend to keep prisoner, but only told him he was secur'd because he might something in favour of the prince; but that he should be freed as soon as they came to land. So that they called it wholly necessary to free the prince from is might have an eye upon him, and that they could not feet a single man.

This being resolved, to make the obligation the greates, the captain himself went to Oroonoko, where, after many compliments and assurances of what he had already promis'd, he, receiving from the prince his parole and his hand for his good behaviour, dismiss'd his irons, and brought him to his own cabin, where, after having treated and repos'd him a while (for he had neither est nor slept in four days before), he besought him to visit those obstinate people in chains, who refused all manner of sustenance; and intreated him to oblige 'em to eat, and assure 'em of their liberty the first opportunity.

Oroonoko, who was too generous not to give credit to his words, shew'd himself to his people, who were transported with excess of joy at the sight of their darling prince; falling at his feet, and kissing and embracing 'em; believing, as some divine oracle, all he assur'd 'em. But he besought 'em to bear their chains with that bravery that became those whom he had seen act so nobly in arms; and that they could not give him greater proofs of their love and friendship, since 'twas all the revenge, he said, they might possibly justly take for the injuries sustained by him. And they all with one accord assur'd him that they could not suffer enough, when it was for his repose and safety.

his they no longer refused to eat, but took what ght 'em, and were pleased with their captivity, t they hoped to redeem the prince, who all the e voyage was treated with all the respect due th, tho' nothing could divert his melancholy; ould often sigh for Imoinda, and think this a nt due to his misfortune in having left that id behind him that fatal night in the Otan, fied to the camp.

'd with a thousand thoughts of past joys with young person, and a thousand griefs for her oss, he endur'd a tedious voyage, and at last t the mouth of the over of Surinam, a colony to the king of England, and where they were some part of their slaves. There the merchants emen of the country going on board, to demand s of slaves they had already agreed on, and, those, the overseers of those plantations where hanc'd to be, the captain, who had given the ier'd his men to bring up those noble slaves in rbom I have spoken of; and having put 'em one and some in other lots, with women and (which they call Pickaninies), they sold 'em off to several merchants and gentlemen; not putting in one lot, because they would separate em far h other; nor daring to trust 'em together, lest courage should put 'em upou contriving some ion, to the rain of the colony.

oko was first seiz'd on, and sold to our overseer, the first lot, with seventeen more of all sorts and it not one of quality with him. When he saw found what they meant; for, as I said, he undernglish pretty well; and being wholly unarm'd nccless, so as it was in vain to make any resistonly beheld the captain with a look all fierce fainful, upbraiding him with eyes that forc'd on his guilty cheeks, and cry'd in passing over of the ship: 'Farewel, Sir, 'tis worth my sufferain so true a knowledge, both of you and of your whom you swear.' And desiring those that 1 to forbear their pains, and telling 'em he would resistance, he cry'd, 'Come, my fellow-slaves, scend, and see if we can meet with more honour my in the next world we shall touch upon.' So ily leapt into the boat, and shewing no more suffer'd himself to be row'd up the river, with his 1 companions.

intleman that bought him was a young Cornish n, whose name was Trefry; a man of great wit learning, and was carried into those parts by the -, Governor, to manage all his affairs. He reon the last words of Oroonoko to the captain, olding the richness of his vest, no sooner came boat but he fix'd his eyes on him; and finding g so extraordinary in his face, his shape and reatness of look, and haughtmess in his air, and se spoke English, had a great mind to be eninto his quality and fortune; which, though o endeavour'd to hide, by only confessing he was ie rank of common slaves, Trefry soon found ret something greater than he confess'd; and t moment began to conceive so vast an esteem that he ever after lov'd him as his dearest and shew'd him all the civilities due to so great Eikanah Settle (1648-1724), born at Dunstable, went from Oxford University to London to make a living by his pen, and at eighteen (in 1665) made a hit by his tragedy of Cambyses (printed 1671). To annoy Dryden, Rochester got his high-flown Empress of Morocco played at Whitehall by the court lords and ladies (1671). In Absalom and Achstophel Dryden, enraged and jealous, scourged 'Doeg' with his scorn; and Settle replied, not very effectively, in Absalom Senior, or Achitophel Transpros'd, and Reflections on Some of Mr Dryden's Plays. Love and Revenge, The Conquest of China, Ibrahim or the Illustrious Bassa, and Fatal Love were acted before 1680. For a time petted by the court, he had lost favour and took the Whig side, writing in this cause not merely The Female Prelate, a play on Pope Joan, but a series of pamphlets in Shaftesbury's interest and against the succession of the Duke of York. But in 1683 he was writing down Oates, ridiculing the Popish Plot, denouncing Lord William Russell and Algernon Sidney, and making a Panegyrick of Judge Jeffreys, and (in 1685) issuing a Heroic Poem in honour of James 11.'s coronation. Appointed City poet in 1691, in the following years he brought out a series of City pageants. He compiled lives of two impostors and cheats, a pamphlet on the cruelties of the Dutch towards the English in the East Indies, and a 'Pindarick' ode on the propagation of the gospel in foreign parts. The Ladies' Triumph was the last of some eight plays produced between 1694 and 1718; but long ere this their author was writing comicalities for Bartholomew Fair, acting in a booth there, and producing (for a livelihood) elegies and complimentary poems. In 1718 he was admitted to the Charterhouse.

Thomas Otway (1652-85), born twelve years after Wycherley, was one of Dryden's younger contemporaries who succeeded where the master had failed; his plays - brilliant achievements associated with a melancholy history - sound the tones of deepest tragedy with singular power. Born the son of a clergyman at Trotton near Midhurst in Sussex, Otway proceeded from Winchester College to Christ Church, Oxford, but left in 1672 without taking his degree. The same year he made his appearance as an actor on the London stage. It was an absolute breakdown, but here he doubtless acquired a knowledge of dramatic art which stood him in good stead when he began to write for the theatre. He produced three tragedies, a farce, and a comedy

Alcibiades (1675), Don Carlos (1676; based on the same French romance by St Réal as Schiller's), Titus and Berenice (from Racine; 1677), The Cheats of Scapin (adapted from Molière; 1677), and Friendship in Fashion (1678) which were successfully performed; but Otway was always in poverty, mainly owing to drink and other kinds of dissipation. Betterton, Mrs Barry, and Mrs Bracegirdle were amongst the actors who helped to secure popularity for his plays; it was a lifelong heart-break to the dramatist that Mrs Barry flouted his almost abject devotion to her. The Earl of Plymouth procured him an ensignship in a foot regiment, and the poet went for a year or two to Flanders. He was soon cashiered for his irregularities; and returning to England, he resumed writing for the stage. In 1680 he produced The Orphan and Caius Marius, tragedies; in 1681, The Soldier's Fortune, a comedy full of autobiographical detail; and in 1682, Venice Preserved. The Atheist (1684), a continuation of The Soldier's Fortune, was his last play; and Otway's short but eventful life came to a premature end after twenty years of want and extravagance. One biographer says the cause of his death was his hastily swallowing, after long fasting, a piece of bread which charity had supplied. Another story makes him die of fever brought on by fatigue or by drinking water when violently heated. Whatever was the last of his misfortunes, he was at the time in great poverty, and apparently skulking from creditors at a publichouse on Tower Hill.

The fame of Otway now rests on his two tragedies, The Orphan and Venice Preserved; but on these it rests as on the pillars of Hercules. Scott said his talents in scenes of passionate affection 'rival at least and sometimes excel those of Shakespeare: more tears have been shed, probably, for the sorrows of Belvidera and Monimia than for those of Juliet and Desdemona.' This is excessive praise. The inherent indelicacy and unpleasant associations of the plot have driven The Orphan from the theatres; but Venice Preserved was played at Drury Lane so recently as 1829. The plotting character of Pierre is well contraste the irresolute, sensitive, and affectionate nat Jaffier; and the harsh, unnatural cruelty of serves as a dark shade to set off the bright and tenderness of his daughter. Jaf. Yes, all, and then adieu for ever. There's not a wretch that lives on common charity But's happier than me; for I have known The luscious sweets of plenty; every night Have slept with soft content about my head, And never waked but to a joyful morning: Yet now must fall, like a full ear of corn, Whose blossom'scaped, yet's withered in the ripening.

Pri. Home, and be humble; study to retrench; Discharge the lazy vermin of thy hall,
Those pageants of thy folly:
Reduce the glittering trappings of thy wife

Then to some suburb cottage both retire;
Drudge to feed loathsome life; get brats, and starve.
Home, home, I say.

Jaf. Yes, if my heart would let me—
This proud, this swelling heart: home I would go,
But that my doors are hateful to mine eyes,
Filled and dammed up with gaping creditors,
Watchful as fowlers when their game will spring;
I've now not fifty ducats in the world,
Yet still I am in love, and pleased with ruin.
O Belvidera! Oh! she is my wife—
And we will bear our wayward fate together,
But ne'er know comfort more. . . . [BELVIDERA enters.

Jaf. Poor Belvidera!

Belvidera. Lead me, lead me my virgins
To that kind voice. My lord, my love, my refuge!
Happy my eyes when they behold thy face;
My heavy heart will leave its doleful beating
At sight of thee, and bound with sprightful joys.
Oh smile as when our loves were in their spring,
And cheer my fainting soul!

Jaf. As when our loves
Were in their spring! Has, then, my fortune changed
Art thou not, Belvidera, still the same, [thee?
Kind, good, and tender, as my arms first found thee?
If thou art altered, where shall I have harbour?
Where ease my loaded heart? oh, where complain?

Bel. Does this appear like change, or love decaying, When thus I throw myself into thy bosom, With all the resolution of strong truth? Beats not my heart as 'twould alarum thine To a new charge of bliss? I joy more in thee Than did thy mother when she hugged thee first, And blessed the gods for all her travail past.

Jaf. Can there in woman be such glorious faith? Sure all ill stories of thy sex are false.

Oh woman, lovely woman! Nature made thee To temper man: we had been brutes without you; Angels are painted fair, to look like you: There's in you all that we believe of Heaven; Amazing brightness, purity, and truth, Eternal joy, and everlasting love.

Bd. If love be treasure, we'll be wondrous rich:
I have so much my heart will surely break with't:
Vows can't express it: when I would declare
How great's my joy, I'm dumb with the big thought;
I swell and sigh and labour with my longing.
Oh lead me to some desert, wide and wild,

Barren as our misfortunes, where my soul May have its vent; where I may tell aloud To the high heavens and every list'ning planet, With what a boundless stock my bosom's fraught; Where I may throw my eager arms about thee, Give loose to love, with kisses kindling joy, And let off all the fire that's in my heart!

Int. O Belvidera! doubly I'm a beggar:

And let off all the fire that's in my heart!

Jaf. O Belvidera! doubly I'm a beggar:
Undone by fortune and in debt to thee.

Want, worldly want, that hungry meagre fiend,
Is at my heels, and chases me in view.

Canst thou bear cold and hunger? Can these limbs,
Framed for the tender offices of love,
Endure the bitter gripes of smarting poverty?

When banished by our miseries abroad
(As suddenly we shall be) to seek out
In some far climate where our names are strangers
For charitable succour, wilt thou then,
When in a bed of straw we shrink together,
And the bleak winds shall whistle round our heads;
Wilt thou then talk thus to me? Wilt thou then
Hush my cares thus, and shelter me with love?

Bush my cares thus, and shelter me with love?

Bul. Oh I will love thee, even in madness love thee:

Though my distracted senses should forsake me, I'd find some intervals when my poor heart Should 'suage itself, and be let loose to thine. Though the bare earth be all our resting-place, Its roots our food, some clift our habitation, I'll make this arm a pillow for thy head, And as thou sighing liest and swelled with sorrow, Creep to thy bosom, pour the balm of love Into thy soul, and kiss thee to thy rest; Then praise our God, and watch thee till the morning.

Jaf. Hear this, you Heavens, and wonder how you

Parting.

Where am I? Sure I wander midst enchantment, And never more shall find the way to rest. But O Monimia! art thou indeed resolved To punish me with everlasting absence? Why turn'st thou from me? I'm alone already. Methinks I stand upon a naked beach Sighing to winds and to the seas complaining, Whilst afar off the vessel sails away, Where all the treasure of my soul's embarked. Wilt thou not turn? O could those eyes but speak, I should know all, for love is pregnant in them: They swell, they press their beams upon me still. Wilt thou not speak? If we must part for ever, Give me but one kind word to think upon, And please myself withal, whilst my heart's breaking.

Otway translated one or two things from Ovid and Horace, wrote a number of prologues and epilogues, some epistles and occasional verses, and a few songs. Windsor Castle, published posthumously, is a panegyric of Charles II. The Poets Complaint of his Muse, or a Satire against Libels (1680), is largely laudation of the Duke of York; the fickle Muse having deserted her true love for Libel, the anti-Catholic agitation which temporarily drove James from England in 1679. The mutual devotion of the poet and the Muse is first described, and in the sixth of the twenty-one stanzas of this nondescript 'Pindaric' ode the breach between them is thus described:

But in this most transporting height, Whence I looked down, and laught at fate, All of a sudden I was altered grown; I round me looked, and found myself alone; My saithless Muse, my faithless Muse, was gone; I tried if I a verse could frame: Oft I in vain invoked my Clio's name. The more I strove, the more I failed, I chased, I bit my pen, curst my dull skull, and railed, Resolved to force m' untoward thought, and at the last A line came forth, but such a one, [prevailed. No travelling matron in her child-birth pains, Full of the joyful hopes to bear a son, Was more astonished at th' unlooked-for shape Of some deformed baboon, or ape, [ham I was at the hideous issue of my brains. I tore my paper, stabbed my pen,

Resolved to be a doating fool no more.

But when my reckoning I began to make,
I found too long I'd slept, and was too late awake;
I found m' ungrateful Muse, for whose false sake
I did myself undo,

Had robbed me of my dearest store, My precious time, my friends, and reputation too; And left me helpless, friendless, very proud, and poor.

The whistling winds blew fiercely o'er his head,
Cold was his lodging, hard his bed;
Aloft his eyes on the wide heavens he cast,
Where we are told peace only's found at last;
And as he did its hopeless distance see,
Sighed deep and cried, How far is peace from me!

This is one of Otway's songs:

The Enchantment.

I did but look and love a-while, 'Twas but for one half hour; Then to resist I had no will, And now I have no power, To sigh and wish is all my ease; Sighs, which do heat impart Enough to melt the coldest ice, Yet cannot warm your heart.

O! would your pity give my heart
One corner of your breast,
'Twould learn of yours the winning art,
And quickly steal the rest.

The best edition of Otway is Thornton's (3 vols. 1813). See Johnson's Lives, Ward's Dramatic Literature, Mr Gosse in Seventeenth Century Studies, and the Hon. Roden Noel's volume on Otway in the 'Mermaid Series' (1888). There are German books on the Don Carlos of Otway and Schiller and their relation to the romance of the Abbé St Réal by Löwenberg (1886) and Ernst Müller (1888).

Thomas Southerne (1660-1746) was born at Oxmantown near Dublin, and studied at Trinity College, but in 1678 came to England and enrolled himself in the Middle Temple as a student of law. He entered the army in 1685, and rose rapidly to the rank of captain; but the Revolution dashed his hopes of further promotion. He was a friend of Dryden, who entrusted him with the completion of his Cleomenes, was praised by Pope, and lived to be spoken of as 'the poets' Nestor.' His later days were spent in retirement and in the possession of a considerable fortune, largely the outcome of his dramatic successes. He wrote ten plays, but only two fully exhibit his characteristic powers-Isabella, or the Fatal Marriage (1694), and Oroonoko (1696). The latter is founded on Aphra Behn's novel (see above, page 57), and that on an actual occurrence; Oroonoko, an African prince, having been stolen from his native kingdom of Angola and carried to one of the West India Islands. The impassioned intensity of Oroonoko's sufferings, his burst of horror and indignation at the slave-trade, and his devotion to the beautiful and virtuous Imoinda are powerfully and pathetically presented. Isabella is more regular than Oroonoko, and the part of the heroine affords scope for a tragic actress scarcely inferior in pathos to Belvidera; but on the whole Southerne is excelled by Otway in depth of passion and vigorous character-drawing. The plot of Isabella is also based on Mrs Behn's romance of The Nun. In abject distress and believing her husband to be dead, Isabella is hurried into a second marriage. Biron returns, and the heroine's agony ends in madness and death. Comic scenes are interspersed throughout Southerne's tragedies, which, though they relieve the sombre colouring of the main action and interest of the piece, are sometimes misplaced and unwelcome. Thus there were comic scenes in Oroonoko, subsequently omitted. And bathos intrudes from time to time, as will be seen in the extracts. Of the comedies, one or two are amusing, though more than gross enough. In the following scene from Oroonoko hero and heroine unexpectedly meet after long separation, both being now slaves on the plantations of Surinam (at this time British), in the presence of the Governor:

Oroonoko. O all you gods
Who govern this great world and bring about Things strange and unexpected, can it be? . . .
My soul steals from my body through my eyes;
All that is left of life I'll gaze away,
And die upon the pleasure.

Governor. This is strange!

Oroo. If you but mock me with your image here:

If she be not Imoinda—

[He runs to her.

Ha! she faints!

Nay, then, it must be she—it is Imoinda:

My heart confesses her, and leaps for joy,

To welcome her to her own empire here. [Kisses her.

I feel her all in every part of me.

O let me press her in my eager arms,

Wake her to life, and with this kindling kiss

Give back that soul she only sent to me. . .

Imoinda! oh, thy Oroonoko calls.

Imoinda (reciving). My Oroonoko! Oh! I can't be-

Imoinda (reviving). My Oroonoko! Oh! I can't believe

What any man can say. But if I am

To be deceived, there's something in that name,
That voice, that face——

Oh! if I know myself, I cannot be mistaken.

Oroo.

Never here: [Embracing her.

You cannot be mistaken: I am yours, Your Oroonoko, all that you would have; Your tender, loving husband.

Imo. All, indeed,
That I would have: my husband! then I am
Alive, and waking to the joys I feel:
They were so great, I could not think 'em true;
But I believe all that you say to me:
For truth itself, and everlasting love,
Grows in this breast, and pleasure in these arms.

Oroo. Take, take me all; inquire into my heart—You know the way to every secret there—My heart, the sacred treasury of love:
And if in absence I have disemployed
A mite from the rich store; if I have spent
A wish, a sigh, but what I sent to you,
May I be cursed to wish and sigh in vain,
And you not pity me.

Imo. Oh! I believe,
And know you by myself. If these sad eyes,
Since last we parted, have beheld the face
Of any comfort, or once wished to see
The light of any other heaven but you,
May I be struck this moment blind, and lose
Your blessed sight, never to find you more.

Oroo. Imoinda! Oh! this separation
Has made you dearer, if it can be so,
Than you were ever to me. You appear
Like a kind star to my benighted steps,
To guide me on my way to happiness:
I cannot miss it now. Governor, friend,
You think me mad; but let me bless you all,
Who anyways have been the instruments
Of finding her again. Imoinda's found!
And everything that I would have in her.

Blandford. Sir, we congratulate your happiness; I do most heartily.

Gov. And all of us.

But how it comes to pass-

Oroo. That would require More precious time than I can spare you now.

I have a thousand things to ask of her,
And she as many more to know of me.
But you have made me happier, I confess,
Acknowledge it, much happier than I
Have words or power to tell you. Captain, you,
Even you, who most have wronged me, I forgive.
I will not say you have betrayed me now:
I'll think you but the minister of fate,
To bring me to my loved Imoinda here.

Imo. How, how shall I receive you? how be word
Of such endearments, all this tenderness?
These are the transports of prosperity,
When fortune smiles upon us.

Oroo.

Let the fools

Who follow fortune live upon her smiles;
All our prosperity is placed in love;
We have enough of that to make us happy.
This little spot of earth you stand upon
Is more to me than the extended plains
Of my great father's kingdom. Here I reign
In full delights, in joys to power unknown;
Your love my empire, and your heart my throne.

Yet I will see him first, Have a last look, to heighten my despair, And then to rest for ever.

Editions of his plays were published in 1713 and 1721 (2 vols.); a better one, in three volumes, with a Life of Southerne, was dedicated to Garrick in 1774. In a prologue he had been called 'great Otway's peer, and greater Dryden's friend.' Garrick revived The Num in 1757, but had to Bowdlerise it; Oroonoko was still being performed about 1830. See Colley Cibber's Apology (ed. Lowe, 1889).

Tom Brown (1663-1704)— 'of facetious memory,' in Addison's phrase—was a native of Shifnal in Salop. He left Christ Church without a degree, but had in his Oxford days become already famous for wit and for irregularities. It was when threatened with expulsion by Dr Fell, the Dean of Christ Church, that the famous epigram is said to have been extemporised:

I do not love thee, Dr Fell, The reason why I cannot tell; But this I know, and know full well, I do not love thee, Dr Fell; less likely as an extempore translation of Martial's 'Non amo te, Sabidi,' than as a paraphrase of Thomas Forde's extant version (1661): 'I love thee not, Nel! but why, I can't tell.' And it should be added that the very same thing is found in good French. Tom was a 'merry fellow' and libertine, who, having after three years' work lost his post as schoolmaster at Kingston-upon-Thames, became a professional author and libeller in the metropolis. His writings, which consist of translations in prose and verse, dialogues, letters, poems, and other miscellanies, display considerable learning as well as shrewdness and humour, but are deformed by obscene and scurrilous buffoonery. He satirised or wrote epigrams on Dryden, Tom Durfey, Blackmore, Sherlock, Sternhold and Hopkins, Scots and Highlanders. And there is a long series of letters from the dead to the living, from the living to the dead, and an imitation of Lucian's Dialogues of the Dead. His most indecent things are by no means always his best, but his very best are generally unquotable. And he was not always facetious—as, for instance, in his verses 'To Mr Dryden on his Conversion':

> Traytor to God and rebel to thy pen, Priest-ridden poet, perjured son of Ben, If ever thou prove honest, then the nation May modestly believe Transubstantiation.

His elegy on Viscount Dundee shows real feeling as well as conviction. His ingenuity in phrases may be seen in the remarks made in a (hypothetical) letter from Dr Blew to the dead Purcell. Blew (who survived Brown some years) is made to comment unfavourably on the flattering inscription to Purcell put on a pillar behind Purcell's organ, and said, 'The fanaticks especially are very highly offended at it, and say it looks as if a man could toot himself to heaven on the whore of Babylon's bag-pipes'—a more disrespectful description of an organ than even the traditional Scottish Presbyterian 'kist of whistles.'

All the conversation of this lower world at present runs upon you; and the devil a word we can hear in any of our coffee-houses but what his Gallic majesty is more or less concerned in. If your friend is in want, don't carry him to the tavern, where you treat yourself as well as him, and entail a thirst and headache upon him next morning. That which passes for current doctrine at one juncture and in one climate won't do so in another. The cavaliers, in the beginning of the troubles, used to trump up the 12th of the Romans upon the parliament; the parliament trumped it upon the army, when they would not disband; the army back again upon the parliament, when they disputed their orders. Never was poor chapter so unmercifully tossed to and fro again.

Not to flatter ourselves, we English are none of the most constant and easy people in the world. When the late war pinched us—Oh! when shall we have a peace and trade again? We had no sooner a peace, but—Huzza, boys, for a new war! and that we shall soon be sick of.

The surest way of governing, both in a private family and a kingdom, is for a husband and a prince sometimes to drop their prerogative.

What a fine thing it is to be well-mannered upon occasion! In the reign of King Charles II. a certain worthy divine at Whitehall thus addressed himself to the auditory at the conclusion of his sermon: In short, if you don't live up to the precepts of the gospel, but abandon yourselves to your irregular appetites, you must expect to receive your reward in a certain place which 'tis not good manners to mention here.

A man in throwing dirt at an adversary does often besoutter himself.

Some books, like the city of London, fare the better for being burnt.

'Twas a merry saying of Rabelais, that a man ought to buy all the bad books that come out, because they will never be printed again.

The style of his satires and epigrams may be gathered from a verse of his address 'To Mr D'Urfey on his uncomparable Ballads,' beginning-

Thou cur, half French half English blood, Thou mongrel of Parnassus;

and containing the verse-

Thou write Pindaries, and be damned!
Write epigrams for cutlers,
None with thy lyrics can be shammed
But chambermaids and butlers.

Sir John Vanbrugh united what Leigh Hunt called for no very obvious reason - the apparently incompatible geniuses' of comic writer and architect. His Blenheim and Castle Howard have outlived The Provoked Wife or The Relapse; yet the latter were for many years highly popular; and even Pope, though he admits his want of grace, says that he never wanted wit. The grandson of a Ghent Protestant refugee (Vanbrug), Vanbrugh was the son of a Cheshire sugar-baker who rose to be an esquire and comptroller of the Treasury Chamber, besides marrying the daughter of Sir Dudley Carlton. Baptised in London 24th January 1664, young Vanbrugh was educated as architect in France, and by his wit, handsome figure, and geniality won a footing in society. In 1685 he obtained a commission in the army. In 1690 he was seized at Calais and imprisoned at Vincennes and in the Bastille; before his release in 1692 he had been planning a comedy. The Relapse (suggested by Colley Cibber's work) was produced with success in 1697, and was recast by Sheridan (as A Trip to Scarborough) in 1777, and by Hollingshead in 1870. Æsop (based on a French original, followed directly; The Provoked Wife (1697) produced a powerful impression. The indecencies of the Relapse and the Provoked Wife were largely utilised by Jeremy Collier in his philippic against the contemporary stage. Later pieces were The False Friend (1702; from Lesage), and The Country House, The Confederacy, The Mistake (from Molière in 1705). Meanwhile as architect he had made his famous design for Castle Howard (built 1702-14), and Lord Carlisle appointed him Clarencieux King-at-Arms. In 1703-5 he built the

Sir John. Sir, like a woman of quality. I wake about two o'clock in the afternoon—I stretch—and make a sign for my chocolate. When I have drank three cups I slide down again upon my back, with my arms over my head, while my two maids put on my stockings. Then, hanging upon their shoulders, I am trailed to my great chair, where I sit—and yawn—for my breakfast. If it don't come presently, I lie down upon my couch to say my prayers, while my maid reads me the play-bills.

Just. Very well, madam.

Sir John. When the tea is brought in, I drink twelve regular dishes, with eight slices of bread and butter. And half an hour after, I send to the cook to know if the dinner is almost ready.

Just. So, madam !

Sir John. By that time my head is half dressed, I hear my busband swearing himself into a state of perdition that the mest's all cold upon the table, to amend which I come down in an hour more, and have it sent back to the kitchen to be all dressed over again.

Just. Poor man!

Sir John. When I have dined, and my idle servants are presumptuously set down at their case, to do so too, I call for my coach, to go visit fifty dear friends, of whom I hope I shall never find one at home while I shall live.

Jast. So, there's the morning and afternoon pretty well disposed of! Pray, madam, how do you pass your evenings?

Sir John. Like a woman of spirit, sir, a great spirit. Give me a box and dice. Seven's the main! Oons! Sir, I set you a hundred pound! Why, do you think women are married now a days to sit at home and mend napkins? Sir, we have nobler ways of passing time.

Just. Mercy upon us, Mr Constable, what will this age come to?

Con. What will it come to, indeed, if such women as these are not set in the stocks?

Sir John. Sir, I have a little urgent business calls upon me; and therefore I desire the favour of you to bring matters to a conclusion.

There are editions of Vanbrugh by W. A. Ward (1893) and A. E. H. Swaen (1896).

William Congreve wrote a series of comedies which, more than any others in the English language, abound in witty dialogue and lively incident, though their licentiousness has banished them from the stage. Born at Bardsey near Leeds, and baptised 10th February 1670, he was of a good family, and his father held a military employment in Ireland, where the poet was educated-first at Kilkenny School, and then at Trinity College, Dublin. He studied law in the Middle Temple, but finding, as Leigh Hunt says, that, having family as well as wit and scholarship, he could make way in life without a profession, he early began to write. His first publication was a novel of cross-purposes and disguises, Incognita, full of ornate Gongorism and silly mock-sentiment, not without resemblances to Shakespeare's fancy plays, and closely akin to the prose comedy invented by Etherege and strengthened by Wycherley. translated the seventh satire of Juvenal (1692), and next appeared as a writer for the stage. His Old Bachelor was produced, under Dryden's auspices, in January 1693, and acted with great applause. Other plays soon appeared: The Double Dealer in 1693; Love for Love in 1695; The Mourning Bride, a tragedy, in 1697; and The Way of the World in 1700. In 1710 he published a collection of miscellaneous poems, of which one little piece, Doris, is worthy of his fame. position was assured as one of the foremost wits. He was eminently popular in society, and good fortune faithfully followed him. He received a succession of lucrative offices—a commissionership of wine licenses (1705-14), the secretaryship for Jamaica (from the first year of George I.'s reign, and worth £700 a year), and an appointment in the Customs. He was flattered and praised, was treated as a literary genius of the first rank, but was singularly free of literary jealousy. in the sunshine of opulence and courtly society, Congreve wished to forget that he was an author;

he maintained the affectation of insisting plays were dashed off quite carelessly for amusement; and when Voltaire waited up he said he would rather be considered a ge than a poet. 'If you had been merely a man,' said the witty Frenchman, 'I she have come to visit you.' He lived a luxur apparently happy life, though latterly afflic gout and an affection of the eyes which nated in total blindness. He died at h in London on 19th January 1730. Congi contracted a close intimacy with the Du Marlborough (daughter of the great Duke her table daily, and assisted in her h management. On his death he left the his fortune, amounting to about £10,000 eccentric lady. The Duchess spent seve ten thousand pounds in the purchase of a necklace. 'How much better would it ha to have given it to Mrs Bracegirdle!' said the poet and clergyman; indeed it was co believed-wrongly-that the famous acti been married to Congreve. Th lay in state under the ancient roof of the Je Chamber, and was interred in Westminste: The pall was borne by the Duke of Brid Lord Cobham, the Earl of Wilmington (been Speaker, and was afterwards first Lor Treasury), and other men of high consid The Duchess of Marlborough, if report believed, further manifested her regard for ceased poet in a manner that spoke more devotion than her taste. It is said that si figure of him in ivory or wax, which m clockwork, and was placed daily at he and that the feet of this doll were 1 blistered and anointed by the doctors, Congreve's feet had been for the gout.

Congreve remains the greatest master English comedy of repartee. Dryden mented him as adorned by every muse an and, extravagant in panegyric, declared of Heaven, that but once was prodigal before, To Shakespeare gave as much, he could not give !

Pope dedicated to him his translation of t What higher honours could have been p writer whose laurels were won by the age of Yet his plays are generally without the hig of poetry or imagination, and his comic ge devoted to illustrating a scheme of life wholly given up to sensuality and intriguout a trace of higher or nobler aims, barest sense of responsibility. He is t perfect master of polished dramatic dial English, and had no equal as a painter temporary life and manners, such as the He is not so grossly indecent as Ethe Wycherley. We admire his brilliant diale repartee, and his wealth of incident and variety of character; but the absence of the higher virtues which ennoble life—the beauty and gracefulness of woman's virtue; the feelings of generosity, truth, honour, affection, modesty, and tenderness-leaves his pages barren and lacking in any permanent interest. His glittering, artificial life palls on the lovers of nature or of poetry. His second comedy, the Double Dealer, was in every way stronger than the Old Bachelor, but either the satire on the heartless sexual morals of the time was too serious to please the people satirised, or even Congreve's complaisant public were shocked by the outrageous immorality of Maskwell and Lady Touchwood. The play was a failure at first, but its merits were soon fully recognised. The Mourning Muse of Alexis, a poetic dialogue on Queen Mary's death, was as full of artificial conceits as Incognita. Love for Love is, no doubt, the finest prose comedy in the English language. So late as 1842 Macready revived it (modified, of course) at Drury Lane, and there have been still later revivals (as in 1871). Mr Watts-Dunton has said of it that, abundant and brilliant as is the wit, the coruscations do not, as in Congreve's other plays, outdazzle the sweeter and softer light of the humour; and the characterisation is true, some of it beautiful. the character of Ben, Congreve gave here the first really humorous and effective presentation of the rollicking English tar, afterwards so frequent and fertile a subject in the hands of Smollett and other novelists and dramatists. The Mourning Bride, Congreve's only tragedy, possesses higher merit than most of the serious plays of that day. As Macaulay said, it is poor compared with Shakespeare and with the best plays of Ford or Massinger, but stands high amongst the tragedies of the age in which it was written. To find anything so good one must go back to Otway's Venice Preserved or forward to Rowe's Fair Penitent. It has the stiffness of the French school, with no small affectation of fine writing, without passion, yet it possesses poetical scenes and admirable passages, nobly worded. The opening lines have often been quoted:

Music has charms to soothe a savage breast,
To soften rocks, or bend a knotted oak.
I've read that things inanimate have moved,
And, as with living souls, have been informed
By magic numbers and persuasive sound.
What then am I? Am I more senseless grown
Than trees or flint? O force of constant woe!

Congreve was next busily occupied in the famous Jeremy Collier controversy, defending the morality of the new stage (see page 35). It would have been wiser had he, like Dryden, remained silent; his answer to Collier's trenchant polemic was voted dull even by his own party. Collier produced a powerful repartee; and the public were mainly on the side of the Nonjuring High Churchman. Congreve's last play, The Way of the World (1700), though quite as full of intellectual brilliance as

Love for Love, and evidently written with more care, not to say labour, lacks the humorous impulse seen in Congreve's masterpiece. The wit of the dialogue is not sufficiently held in hand to work out the characters and the plot. It comes more completely than does any other of Congreve's plays within the scope of the Duke of Buckingham's strictures (see Vol. I. p. 788) upon the comedy of repartee:

Another fault, which often does befal, Is when the wit of some great poet shall So overflow, that is, be none at all, That ev'n his fools speak sense, as if possest, And each by inspiration breaks his jest, If once the justness of each part be lost, Well may we laugh, but at the poet's cost.

The Way of the World was received with comparative coldness, and Congreve wrote no more for the stage; for the next twenty-eight years he did not add to his literary reputation.

Dr Johnson thought the following extract from the Mourning Bride, describing a cathedral, the most poetical paragraph in the whole range of the drama—finer than any in Shakespeare—and by such extravagant eulogy injured the piece. Had he said it was better than anything in the tragedies of Dryden, Lee, Otway, Rowe, Southerne, or Addison, he would not, in Macaulay's judgment and ours, have been far wrong:

Almeria. It was a fancied noise, for all is hushed.

Leonora. It bore the accent of a human voice.

Alm. It was thy fear, or else some transient wind Whistling through hollows of this vaulted aisle.

We'll listen.

Leon. Hark!

Alm. No; all is hushed and still as death. 'Tis dreadful! How reverend is the face of this tall pile, Whose ancient pillars rear their marble heads To bear aloft its arched and ponderous roof, By its own weight made steadfast and immovable, Looking tranquillity. It strikes an awe And terror on my aching sight; the tombs And monumental caves of death look cold, And shoot a chillness to my trembling heart. Give me thy hand, and let me hear thy voice; Nay, quickly speak to me, and let me hear Thy voice—my own affrights me with its echoes.

Leon. Let us return; the horror of this place

And silence will increase your melancholy.

Alm. It may my fears, but cannot add to that.

No, I will on; shew me Anselmo's tomb,
Lead me o'er bones and skulls and mouldering earth
Of human bodies; for I'll mix with them;
Or wind me in the shroud of some pale corpse
Yet green in earth, rather than be the bride
Of Garcia's more detested bed: that thought
Exerts my spirits, and my present fears
Are lost in dread of greater ill. Then shew me, Lead me, for I am bolder grown: lead on Where I may kneel and pay my vows again
To him, to Heaven and my Alphonso's soul.

In Congreve's comedies there is a constant stream of wit and liveliness, and quick interchange of dialogue and incident. He was a master of dramatic rules and art, but was often careless and sometimes too complicated in his plots. From the sparkling, highly wrought love-scenes of Congreve it would be perilous to quote. 'I have read two or three of Congreve's plays over before speaking of him,' said Thackeray in one of his famous lectures; 'and my feelings were rather like those which I dare say most of us here have had at Pompeii, looking at Sallust's house and the relics of an orgya dried wine-jar or two, a charred supper-table, the breast of a dancing-girl pressed against the ashes, the laughing skull of a jester, a perfect stillness round about, as the cicerone twangs his moral, and the blue sky shines calmly over the ruin. The Congreve muse is dead, and her song choked in Time's ashes. We gaze at the skeleton, and wonder at the life which once revelled in its mad veins. We take the skull up, and muse over the frolic and daring, the wit, scorn, passion, hope, desire, with which that empty bowl once fermented. We think of the glances that allured, the tears that melted; of the bright eyes that shone in those vacant sockets, and of lips whispering love and cheeks dimpling with smiles that once covered you ghastly framework. They used to call those teeth pearls once. See! there's the cup she drank from, the gold chain she wore on her neck, the vase which held the rouge for her cheeks, her looking-glass, and the harp she used to dance to. Instead of a feast we find a grave-stone, and in place of a mistress a few bones!'

Bluffe. I'll recommend myself. Sir, I honour you; I understand you love fighting. I reverence a man that loves fighting, sir, I kiss your hilts.

Captain Sharper. Sir, your servant, but you are misinformed; for unless it be to serve my particular friend, as Sir Joseph here, my country, or my religion, or in some very justifiable cause, I'm not for it.

Bluffe. O Lord, I beg your pardon, sir! I find you are not of my palate; you can't relish a dish of fighting without sweet sauce. Now, I think—

Fighting for fighting's sake 's sufficient cause. Fighting to me's religion and the laws!

Sir Jos. Ah, well said, my hero! Was not that great, sir? By the Lord Harry, he says true; fighting is meat, drink, and cloth to him. But, back, this gentleman is one of the best friends I have in the world, and saved my life last night. You know I told you.

Blufe. Ay, then I honour him again.—Sir, may I crave

Sharper. Ay, sir, my name's Sharper.

Sir Jos. Pray, Mr Sharper, embrace my back—very well. By the Lord Harry, Mr Sharper, he is as brave a fellow as Cannibal; are you not, bully-back?

Sharper. Hannibal, I believe you mean, Sir Joseph? Bluffe. Undoubtedly he did, sir. Faith, Hannibal was a very pretty fellow; but, Sir Joseph, comparisons are odious. Hannibal was a very pretty fellow in those days, it must be granted; but alas, sir, were he alive now, he would be nothing, nothing in the earth.

Sharper. How, sir? I make a doubt if there be at this day a greater general breathing.

Binfe. Oh, excuse me, sir; have you served abroad, sir?

Sharper. Not I, really, sir.

Blife. Oh, I thought so.—Why, then, you can know nothing, sir. I am afraid you scarce know the history of the late war in Flanders with all its particulars.

Sharper. Not I, sir; no more than public papers or gazettes tell us.

Blufe. Gazette! Why, there again now—why, sir, there are not three words of truth, the year round, put into the Gazette.—I'll tell you a strange thing now as to that. You must know, sir, I was resident in Flanders the last campaign, had a small post there; but no matter for that. Perhaps, sir, there was scarce anything of moment done but a humble servant of yours that shall be nameless was an eye-witness of—I won't say had the greatest share in 't; though I might say that too, since I name nobody, you know. Well, Mr Sharper, would you think it? In all this time, as I hope for a truncheom, that rascally gazette-writer never so much as once mentioned me—not once, by the wars! Took no more notice than as if Nol Bluffe had not been in the land of the living.

Sharper. Strange!

Sir Jos. Yet, by the Lord Harry, 'tis true, Mr Sharper, for I went every day to coffee-houses to read the Gazette myself.

Blufe. Ay, ay; no matter. You see, Mr Sharper, after all, I am content to retire—live a private person. Scipio and others have done it.

Sharper. Impudent rogue! [Aside.

Sir Jos. Ay. this damned modesty of yours—egad, if he would put in for 't, he might be made general himself yet.

Bluffe. Oh, fy, no, Sir Joseph; you know I hate this.

Sir Jos. Let me but tell Mr Sharper a little, how you ate fire once out of the mouth of a cannon; egad, he did; those impenetrable whiskers of his have confronted flames.

Bluffe. Death! What do you mean, Sir Joseph? Sir Jos. Look you now, I tell you he's so modest, he'll own nothing.

Bluffe. Pish; you have put me out; I have forgot what I was about. Pray, hold your tongue, and give me leave—— [Angrily.

Sir Jos. I am dumb.

Bluffe. This sword I think I was telling you of, Mr Sharper,—this sword I'll maintain to be the best divine, anatomist, lawyer, or casuist in Europe; it shall decide a controversy, or split a cause.

Sir Jos. Nay, now, I must speak; it will split a hair; by the Lord Harry, I have seen it.

Bluffe. Zounds, sir, it's a lie! you have not seen it, nor shan't see it: sir, I say you can't see. What d'ye say to that, now?

Sir Jos. I am blind.

Sharper. Captain, Sir Joseph's penitent.

Bluffe. Oh, I am calm, sir, calm as a discharged culverin—but 'twas indiscreet, when you know what will provoke me. Nay, come, Sir Joseph; you know my heat's soon over.

Sir Jos. Well, I am a fool sometimes, but I'm sorry. Bluffe. Enough.

Sir Jos. Come, we'll go take a glass to drown animosities.—Mr Sharper, will you partake?

Sharper. I wait on you, sir; nay, pray Captain,—you are Sir Joseph's back. (From Act ii. sc. t.)

Brisk. Right, right; that saves all.

And when at night his labour's done, Then, too, like heaven's charioteer, the sun—

Ay, charioteer does better-

Into the dairy he descends, And there his whipping and his driving ends; There he's secure from danger of a bilk; His fare is paid him, and he sets in milk.

For Susan, you know, is Thetis, and so-

Brisk. Incomparable well and proper, egad! But I have one exception to make: don't you think 'bilk'—I know it's a good rhyme—but don't you think 'bilk' and 'fare' too like a hackney coachman?

Lady F. I swear and vow I'm afraid so. And yet our Jehu was a hackney coachman when my lord took him.

Brisk. Was he? I'm answered, if Jehu was a hackney coachman. You may put that in the marginal notes though, to prevent criticism; only mark it with a small asterisk, and say, 'Jehu was formerly a hackney coachman.'

Lady F. I will; you'd oblige me extremely to write notes to the whole poem.

Brisk. With all my heart and soul, and proud of the vast honour, let me perish!

Lord Froth. Hee, hee, hee! my dear, have you done? Won't you join with us? We were laughing at my Lady Whisler and Mr Sneer.

Lady F. Ay, my dear, were you? Oh! filthy Mr Sneer; he's a nauseous figure, a most fulsamic [fulsome] fop, foh! He spent two days together in going about Covent Garden to suit the lining of his coach with his complexion.

Lord F. O silly! Yet his aunt is as fond of him as if she had brought the ape into the world herself.

Brisk. Who? my Lady Toothless? Oh, she's a mortifying spectacle; she's always chewing the cud like an old ewe.

Cynthia. Fy, Mr Brisk! eringos for her cough.

Lord F. I have seen her take 'em half chewed out of her mouth, and then put them in again—foh!

Lady F. Foh!

Lord F. Then she's always ready to laugh when Sneer offers to speak; and sits in expectation of his no-jest, with her gums bare, and her mouth open—

Brisk. Like an oyster at low ebb, egad! Ha, ha, ha! Cynthia. [Aside.] Well, I find there are no fools so inconsiderable in themselves but they can render other people contemptible by exposing their infirmities.

Lady F. Then that t'other great strapping lady; I can't hit of her name; the old fat fool that paints so exorbitantly.

Brisk. I know whom you mean. But, deuce take me, I can't hit of her name either. Paints, d'ye say? Why, she lays it on with a trowel. Then she has a great beard that bristles through it, and makes her look as if she were plastered with lime and hair, let me perish!

Lady F. Oh! you made a song upon her, Mr Brisk.

Brisk. He? egad, so I did—my lord can sing Cynthia. O good my lord; let's hear it.
Brisk. 'Tis not a song neither—it's a sort of or rather an epigrammatic sonnet; I don't k to call it, but it's satire. Sing it, my lord.

Lord F. [Sings]

Ancient Phyllis has young graces;
'Tis a strange thing, but a true one;
Shall I tell you how?
She herself makes her own faces,
And each morning wears a new one;
Where's the wonder now?

Brisk. Short, but there's salt in't; my way egad! (From Act

Sir S. A very wag! Ben's a very wag! only a little rough; he wants a little polishing.

Mrs F. Not at all; I like his humour mightily; it's plain and honest; I should like such a humour in a husband extremely.

Ben. Say'n you so, forsooth? Marry, and I should like such a handsome gentlewoman hugely. How say you, mistress! would you like going to sea? Mess, you're a tight vessel, and well rigged. . . . But I'll tell you one thing, an you come to sea in a high wind, or that, lady, you mayn't carry so much sail o' your head. Top and topgallant, by the mess.

Miss F. No? why so?

Ben. Why, an you do, you may run the risk to be overset, and then you'll carry your keels above water; he he he.

Angelica. I swear Mr Benjamin is the veriest wag in nature—an absolute sea-wit.

Sir S. Nay, Ben has parts; but, as I told you before, they want a little polishing. You must not take anything ill, madam.

Ben. No; I hope the gentlewoman is not angry; I mean all in good part; for if I give a jest, I take a jest; and so, forsooth, you may be as free with me.

Ang. I thank you, sir; I am not at all offended. But methinks, Sir Sampson, you should leave him alone with his mistress. Mr Tattle, we must not hinder lovers.

Tattle. Well, Miss, I have your promise. [Aside. Sir S. Body o' me, madam, you say true. Look you, Ben, this is your mistress. Come, Miss, you must not be shame-faced; we'll leave you together.

Miss Prue. I can't abide to be left alone; mayn't my cousin stay with me?

Sir S. No, no; come, let's away.

Ben. Look you, father, mayhap the young woman mayn't take a liking to me.

Sir S. I warrant thee, boy; come, come, we'll be gone; I'll venture that. [They leave Ben and Miss Prue alone.

Ben. Come, mistress, will you please to sit down? for an you stand astern a that'n, we shall never grapple together. Come, I'll haul a chair; there, an you please to sit, I'll sit beside you.

Min Prue. You need not sit so near one; if you have anything to say, I can hear you farther off; I an't deaf.

Ben. Why, that's true as you say, nor I an't dumb; I can be heard as far as another. I'll heave off to please you. [Sits further off.] An we were a league asunder, I'd undertake to hold discourse with you, an 'twere not a main high wind indeed, and full in my teeth. Look you, forsooth, I am as it were bound for the land of matrimony; 'tis a voyage, d' ye see, that was none of my steeking, I was commanded by father; and if you like of it, mayhap I may steer into your harbour. How say you, mistress? The short of the thing is, that if you like me, and I like you, we may chance to swing in a hammock together.

Miss P. I don't know what to say to you, nor I don't care to speak with you at all.

Ben. No? I'm sorry for that. But pray, why are ou so scornful?

Miss P. As long as one must not speak one's mind, ne had better not speak at all, I think; and truly I ron't tell a lie for the matter.

Ben. Nay, you say true in that; it's but a folly to lie; for to speak one thing, and to think just the contrary way, is, as it were, to look one way and to row another. Now, for my part, d'ye see, I'm for carrying things above-board, I'm not for keeping anything under hatches; so that if you ben't as willing as I, say so a God's name, there's no harm done. Mayhap you may be shame-faced; some maidens, thof they love a man well enough, yet they don't care to tell'n so to's face. If that's the case, why, silence gives consent.

Miss P. But I'm sure it is not so, for I'll speak sooner than you should believe that; and I'll speak truth, though one should always tell a lie to a man; and I don't care, let my father do what he will; I'm too big to be whipt; so I'll tell you plainly I don't like you, nor love you at all, nor never will, that's more. So there's your answer for you, and don't trouble me no more, you ugly thing!

Ben. Look you, young woman, you may learn to give good words, however. I spoke you fair, d'ye see, and civil. As for your love or your liking, I don't value it of a rope's end; and mayhap I like you as little as you do me. What I said was in obedience to father: I fear a whipping no more than you do. But I tell you one thing, if you should give such language at sea, you'd have a cat-o'-nine-tails laid across your shoulders. Flesh! who are you? You heard t'other handsome young woman speak civilly to me of her own accord. Whatever you think of yourself, I don't think you are any more to compare to her than a can of small beer to a bowl of punch.

Miss P. Well, and there's a handsome gentleman, and a fine gentleman, and a sweet gentleman, that was here, that loves me, and I love him; and if he sees you speak to me any more, he'll thrash your jacket for you, he will, you great sea-calf!

Ben. What! do you mean that fair-weather spark that was here just now? Will he thrash my jacket? Let'n, let'n—but an he comes near me, mayhap I may give him a salt-eel for's supper, for all that. What does father mean, to leave me alone, as soon as I come home, with such a dirty dowdy? Sea-calf! I an't calf enough to lick your chalked face, you cheese-curd you. Marry thee! oons, I'll marry a Lapland witch as soon, and live upon selling contrary winds and wrecked vessels.

Miss P. I won't be called names, nor I won't be abused thus, so I won't. If I were a man [Cries] you durst not talk at this rate; no, you durst not, you stinking tarbarrel!

(From Act iii. sc. 3.)

A good edition of Congreve's comedies is that by Mr Henley (1895); all the plays were edited for the 'Mermaid Series' by A. C. Ewald (1888); and there is a short Life by Mr Gosse (1888).

Nathaniel Lee (1653?—92) was possessed of no small share of the fire of genius, though in him genius was near allied to madness. The son of a Hertfordshire clergyman, a Presbyterian and a pluralist, who conformed at the Restoration, Lee received a classical education at Westminster School and at Trinity College, Cambridge. He tried the stage both as an actor and author, was patronised by Rochester, lived a dissipated and vicious life, and was five years in Bedlam from wild insanity. Recovering his reason, he lived on precarious gifts or charity; and falling into intemperance again, died from the effects of a fall when he was drunk. He was the author of about a dozen tragedies, mainly on classical themes. The best of the tragedies are The Rival Queens, or Alexander the Great: Mithridates; Theodosius; and Lucius Junius Brutus. His comedy, The Princess of Cleve, was founded on Madame La Fayette's romance. Several of the plays were long popular; Alexander (as The Rival Queens came to be called) held the stage for a hundred and fifty years. The earlier (and least successful) plays were in rhyme; from Alexander on they were mostly in blank verse. Lee had the honour of being invited to collaborate with Dryden in two pieces. In praising Alexander and his friend's power to move the passions. Dryden counsels him to despise those critics who condemn 'the too much vigour of his youthful muse.' Here is indicated the source both of Lee's strength and of his weakness. In tenderness and genuine passion he excels Dryden; but his style often degenerates into bombast and extravagant frenzy -defects heightened in his late productions by his mental malady. Poor Nat was aware of his weakness. 'It has often been observed against me,' he says in his dedication of Theodosius, 'that I abound in ungoverned fancy; but I hope the world will pardon the sallies of youth: age, despondency, and dulness come too fast of themselves. I discommend no man for keeping the beaten road; but I am sure the noble hunters that follow the game must leap hedges and ditches sometimes, and run at all, or never come into the fall of a quarry.' Colley Cibber denounces Lee's 'furious fustian and turgid rant;' Addison says his thoughts are 'frequently lost in such a cloud of words that it is hard to see the beauty of them. There is an infinite fire in his works, but so involved in smoke that it does not appear in half its lustre.' Steele finds in Alexander 'passion in its purity . . . drawn by a mad poet.' Lee wanted discretion to temper his too luxuriant genius and reduce his poetical conceptions to consistency and order; yet among his wild ardour and rhapsodical enthusiasm are very powerful and graceful lines and passages. The following is an unusually pregnant comparison:

Speech is morning to the mind; It spreads the beauteous images abroad, Which else lie furled and clouded in the soul.

This is a fragment from Lee's Sophonisba:

Love, that brightest jewel of a crown, That fires ambition and adorns renown, That with sweet hopes does our harsh pains beguile, And midst of javelins makes the soldier smile.

And here is a declaration of love from Theodosius:

No more of this, no more; for I disdain
All pomp when thou art by: far be the noise
Of kings and courts from us, whose gentle souls
Our kinder stars have steered another way.
Free as the forest-birds we'll pair together,
Fly to the arbours, grots, and flowery meads,

And in soft murmurs interchange our souls. Together drink the crystal of the stream, Or taste the yellow fruit which autumn yields; And when the golden evening calls us home, Wing to our downy nest, and sleep till morn.

From the same play comes this on self-murder

What torments are allotted those sad spints, Who, groaning with the burden of despair, No longer will endure the cares of life, But boldly set themselves at liberty, Through the dark caves of death to wander on, Like wildered travellers, without a guide; Eternal rovers in the gloomy maze Where scarce the twilight of an infant more, By a faint glimmer checkering through the tree Reflects to dismal view the walking ghosts, That never hope to reach the blessed fields.

Lee's heroic style—verging upon rodomon—may be seen in lines such as those on Bi throwing off his disguise of idiocy after the of Lucrece by Tarquin:

As from night's womb the glorious day breaks for And seems to kindle from the setting stars; So, from the blackness of young Tarquin's crime And furnace of his lust, the virtuous soul Of Junius Brutus catches bright occasion. I see the pillars of his kingdom totter: The rape of Lucrece is the midnight lantern That lights my genus down to the foundation. Leave me to work, my Titus, O my son! For from this spark a lightning shall arise, That must ere night purge all the Roman air, And then the thunder of his ruin follows.

For Warburton the following speech of A ander's contained 'not only the most sublime the most judicious imagery that poetry could ceive or paint;' for Joseph Warton, on the 0 hand, there was not in the language 'a striking example of true turgid expression genuine fustian and bombast;'

When Glory, like the dazzling eagle, stood Perched on my bearer in the Granic flood; When Fortune's self my standard trembling bor And the pale Fates stood frighted on the shore When the Immortals on the billows rode, And I myself appeared the leading god.

Warton was surely the truer critic.

Wishes for Obscurity.

How miserable a thing is a great man! Take noisy vexing greatness they that please; Give me obscure and sase and silent ease. Acquaintance and commerce let me have none With any powerful thing but Time alone: My rest let Time be searful to offend, And creep by me as by a slumbering friend; Till, with ease glutted, to my bed I steal, As men to sleep after a plenteous meal. Oh, wretched he who, called abroad by power, To know himself can never find an hour! Strange to himself, but to all others known, Lends every one his life, but uses none; So, ere he tasted life, to death he goes, And himself loses ere himself he knows.

Love in Women.

These are great maxims, sir, it is confessed; Too stately for a woman's narrow breast. Poor love is lost in men's capacious minds; In ours, it fills up all the room it finds.

Inconstancy of the Multitude.

I'll not such favour to rebellion shew, To wear a crown the people do bestow; Who, when their giddy violence is past, Shall from the king, the adored, revolt at last; And then the throne they gave they shall invade, And scorn the idol which themselves have made.

Warriors.

I hate these potent madmen, who keep all Mankind awake, while they, by their great deeds, Are drumming hard upon this hollow world, Only to make a sound to last for ages.

Crowne's works were edited in 1873-74 by Maidment and Logan (4 vols. 8vo).

George Farquhar (1678-1707) was a better artist, in stage effect and happy combinations of incident and adventure, than most of this race of comic writers. He had an uncontrollable vivacity and love of sport, which still render his comedies attractive both on the stage and in the closet. Farquhar was an Irishman, born in Londonderry. After some months at Trinity College, Dublin, he took to the stage; but happening dangerously to wound a fellow-actor in a fencing-scene, he left the boards at the age of eighteen, and procured a commission in the army from the Earl of Orrery. His first play, Love and a Bottle, came out at Drury Lane in 1698, The Constant Couple in 1700, Sir Harry Wildair in 1701, The Inconstant in 1703, The Stage-coach in 1704, The Twin Rivals in 1705, The Recruiting Officer in 1706, and The Beaux' Stratagem in 1707. Farquhar was early married to a lady who had deceived him by pretending to be possessed of a fortune, and he sank a victim to ill-health and over-exertion in his thirtieth year. A letter written shortly before his death to Wilkes the actor possesses a touching brevity of expression: 'Dear Bob, I have not anything to leave to thee to perpetuate my memory but two helpless girls. Look upon them sometimes, and think of him that was to the last moment of his life thine—GEORGE FARQUHAR.' One of these daughters, it appears, married a 'low tradesman,' and the other became a servant, while their mother died in utter poverty.

The Beaux' Stratagem is Farquhar's best comedy. The plot is admirably managed, and the disguises of Archer and Aimwell form a ludicrous yet natural series of incidents. Boniface, the landlord, is still a favourite on the stage; and hence the name (originally Bonniface, as if to express genial looks, and not a derivative from the Latin 1 has become an ordinary name for any as such. Scrub, the servant, is equally amusing; and the women characters spoken though not as frail as the fine-t of Congreve and Vanbrugh, are suffic criminated. Sergeant Kite, in the Officer, is an original picture of low humour rarely surpassed. Farquhar havipe wit of Congreve; he was the Sn the Fielding, of the stage.

'Farquhar,' says Leigh Hunt, 'was natured, sensitive, reflecting man, of s order of what may be called the tow genius as to sympathise with mankin upon the strength of what he saw of the: and to extract from a quintessence of § an inspiration just short of the ron imaginative; that is to say, he could he had experienced in common life to account. . . . He felt the little world and the universal too little. He saw in pretensions, but not into all true ones; had had a larger sphere of nature to upon in his adversity, would probably died of it. The wings of his fancy common, and grown in too artificial support him in the sudden gulfs and ac of that new region, and enable him to way to their green islands. . . . Sir, will you give me leave to try this cap upon your head?

Costar Pearmain. Is there no harm in 't? Won't the cap list me?

Kite. No, no; no more than I can. Come, let me see how it becomes you.

Cost. Are you sure there is no conjuration in it?—no gunpowder-plot upon me?

Kite. No, no, friend; don't fear, man.

Cost. My mind misgives me plaguily. Let me see it. It smells woundily of sweat and brimstone. Smell, Tummas.

Thomas Appletree. Ay, wauns ['oons, wounds], does it.

Cost. Pray, sergeant, what writing is this upon the face of it?

Kite. The crown, or the bed of honour.

Cost. Pray, now, what may be that same bed of honour?

Kite. Oh, a mighty large bed!—bigger by half than the great bed at Ware—ten thousand people may lie in it together. . . .

Cost. But do folk sleep sound in this same bed of honour?

Kite. Sound !-ay, so sound that they never wake.

Cost. Wauns! I wish that my wife lay there.

Kite. Say you so? then I find, brother-

Cost. Brother! hold there, friend; I am no kindred to you that I know of yet. Look ye, sergeant, no coaxing, no wheedling, d'ye see. If I have a mind to list, why, so; if not, why, 'tis not so; therefore take your cap and your brothership back again, for I am not disposed at this present writing. No coaxing, no brothering me, faith.

Kite. I coax! I wheedle! I'm above it, sir; I have served twenty campaigns; but, sir, you talk well, and I must own you are a man every inch of you; a pretty young sprightly fellow! I love a fellow with a spirit; but I scorn to coax, 'its base; though, I must say that never in my life have I seen a man better built. How firm and strong he treads!—he steps like a castle!—but I scorn to wheedle any man! Come, honest lad! will you take share of a pot?

Cost. Nay, for that matter, I'll spend my penny with the best he that wears a head; that is, begging your pardon, sir, and in a fair way.

Kite. Give me your hand then; and now, gentlemen, I have no more to say but this—here 's a purse of gold, and there is a tub of humming ale at my quarters; 'tis the queen's money and the queen's drink; she 's a generous queen, and loves her subjects. I hope, gentlemen, you won't refuse the queen's health?

Mob. No, no, no.

Kite. Huzza, then ! - huzza for the queen and the honour of Shropshire.

Mob. Huzza !

Kite. Beat drum,

Exeunt shouting.

The third scene of the second act opens with the entry of Kite leading Costar and Thomas, both drunk; and Kite sings, while the mob choruses:

Our 'prentice Tom may now refuse To wipe his scoundrel master's shoes, For now he's free to sing and play Over the hills and far away.

Over the hills and over the main, To Flanders, Portugal, or Spain; The queen commands, and we'll obey, Over the hills and far away.

GEORGE FARQUHAR, From an Engraving by Clamp in the Burney Collection.

We shall lead more happy lives
By getting rid of brats and wives,
That scold and brawl both night and day—
Over the hills and far away.

Kite. Hey, boys! thus we soldiers live! drink, sing, dance, play; we live, as one should say—we live—'tis impossible to tell how we live—we are all princes; why —why you are a king, you are an emperor, and I'm a prince; now an't we?

Thomas. No, sergeant; I'll be no emperor.

Kite. No!

Tho. I'll be a justice-of-peace.

Kite. A justice-of-peace, man!

Tho. Ay, wauns will I; for since this pressing act, they are greater than any emperor under the sun.

Kite. Done; you are a justice-of-peace, and you are a king, and I'm a duke, and a rum duke, an't I?

Cost. I'll be a queen.

Kite. A queen!

Cost. Ay, queen of England; that's greaking of them all.

Kite. Bravely said, faith! Huzza for the hark'ee, you Mr Justice, and you Mr Queen, see the queen's picture?

Both. No, no, no.

Kite. I wonder at that; I have two of thei and as like her majesty; God bless the mark they are set in gold. [Taking two broad pic pocket, presents one to each.]

Cost. 'Tis a fine thing to be a scollard. Syou part with this? I'll buy it on you, if it the compass of a crown.

Kite. A crown! never talk of buying; thing among friends, you know. I'll preser both: you shall give me as good a thing. I and remember your old friend when I am '(and far away.' [They ring, and put a Kite. They disobey command: they deny being listed.

The Nay, sergeant, we don't downright deny it neither;

that we dare not do, for fear of being shot; but we humbly conceive, in a civil way, and begging your worship's pardon, that we may go home.

Plume. That's easily known. Have either of you received any of the queen's money?

Cost. Not a brass farthing, sir.

Kite. They have each of them received three-and-twenty shillings and sixpence, and 'tis now in their pockets.

Cast. Wauns, if I have a penny in my pocket but a bent surpence, I'll be content to be listed, and shot into the barrain.

Plume. The case is plain, gentlemen: the goods are found upon you. Those pieces of gold are worth three-and-twenty shillings and sixpence each.

Cost. So it seems that Carolus is three-and-twenty shillings and sixpence in Latin?

Tho. 'Tis the same thing in Greek, for we are listed.

Cost. Flesh, but we an't, Tummas: I desire to be carried before the mayor, captain.

The. Why, captain, we know that you soldiers have more liberty of conscience than other folks; but for me or neighbour Costar here to take such an oath, 'twould be downight perjuration.

Plume [to Kite]. Look ye, rascal, you villain! if I find that you have imposed upon these two honest fellows, I'll trample you to death, you dog! Come, how was 't?

Tho. Nay, then, we'll speak. Your sergeant, as you say, is a rogue; an't like your worship, begging your worship's pardon; and—

Car. Nay, Tummas, let me speak; you know I can read. And so, sir, he gave us those two pieces of money for pictures of the queen, by way of a present.

Plume. How? by way of a present? the rascal! I'll teach him to abuse honest fellows like you. Scoundrel, rogue, villain! [Beats off the Sergeant, and follows. Both. O brave noble captain! huzza! A brave aptain, faith!

The 'broad-piece,' a name given to the 20s. piece (Jacobus or rolus) to distinguish it from the guinea (which was not so broad d thin), had in 1706, when this play was produced, risen in value 23s. 6d. Broad-pieces were called in in 1732 and recoined into ineas. Ewald edited Farquhar's works in 1893. Nicholas Rowe (1674-1718), who was bred to the law, but early forsook it for the tragic drama, was born at Little Barford in Bedfordshire, and from Westminster School and Dr Busby passed to the Middle Temple. His father had an estate at Lamerton in Devonshire, and was a serjeant-at-law in the Temple; by his death in 1692 Nicholas came into £300 a year, and cultivated the muses in chambers in the Temple. His blank-verse tragedy, The Ambitious Stepmother, was acted in 1700 with great success; and it was followed by Tamerlane (1702), The Fair Penitent (1703), Ulysses, The Royal Convert (1705), Jane Shore (1714), and Lady Jane Grey (1715). On rising into fame as an author, Rowe was munificently patronised. The Duke of Queensberry made him his secretary for public affairs in 1709he was, of course, a Whig. On the accession of George I. he was made poet-laureate and a surveyor of customs, the Prince of Wales appointed him clerk of his council, and the Lord Chancellor gave him the office of clerk of the presentations. The fortunate playwright was a favourite in society; his voice was singularly sweet, his conversation lively, and his manner engaging. Pope, Swift, and Addison were amongst his intimates. Yet Spence reports that there was a certain levity and carelessness about him which made Pope declare him to have no heart. Rowe was the first editor of Shakespeare entitled to the name, and the first -of a long series-to collect biographical facts about him. His edition, published in 1709 and based on the Fourth Folio, was the earliest octavo one, and the first to contain regular lists of the dramatis personæ. Rowe was twice married. His widow, who erected a handsome monument over his grave in Westminster Abbey, received a pension from the Crown in consideration not of his dramatic genius, but 'of the translation of Lucan's Pharsalia made by her late husband.'

The translation is a spirited enough paraphrase, but little in Rowe's two volumes of miscellaneous poetry rises above dull and respectable mediocrity. His tragedies are passionate and tender, in smooth and equable verse. His Jane Shore, still performed from time to time, is effective in the pathetic scenes descriptive of the sufferings of the heroine. The Fair Penitent, adapted from Massinger's Fatal Dowry, was long a popular play, and the 'gallant gay Lothario' was the prototype of many stage seducers and romance heroes. Richardson elevated the character in his Lovelace, and gave a sanctity to Clarissa's sorrows which leaves Rowe's Calista immeasurably behind. Johnson praised the play heartily both for plot and language; Scott pronounced it greatly inferior to its original. The incidents of Rowe's dramas, well arranged as they are for stage effect, were studied and prepared in the manner of the French school, and were adapted to the taste of the age. As the study of Shakespeare and the romantic drama advanced, Rowe declined in credit, and is now but seldom acted or read. His popularity in his own day is best seen in the epitaph by Pope—an effusion of friendship presumably not irreconcilable with the anecdote preserved by Spence:

Thy relics, Rowe, to this sad shrine we trust,
And near thy Shake peare place thy honoured bust;
Oh next him skilled to draw the tender tear,
For never heart felt passion more sincere;
To nobler sentiment to fire the brave,
For never Briton more disdained a slave.
Peace to thy gentle shade, and endless rest!
Blest in thy genius, in thy love, too, blest!
And blest that, timely from our scene removed,
Thy soul enjoys the liberty it loved.

The style of the translation of Lucan's Pharsalia may be illustrated by such sententious passages as:

The vulgar falls and none laments his fate; Sorrow has hardly leisure for the great.

Laws in great rebellions lose their end, And all go free when multitudes offend.

To strictest justice many ills belong, And honesty is often in the wrong.

When fair occasion calls, 'tis fatal to delay.

More sprightly is (from an occasional poem):

Thus some who have the stars surveyed
Are ignorantly led
To think those glorious lamps were made
To light Tom Fool to bed.

Colin's Complaint: a Song.

Despairing beside a clear stream,
A shepherd forsaken was laid;
And while a salse nymph was his theme,
A willow supported his head.
The wind that blew over the plain,
To his sighs with a sigh did reply;
And the brook, in return to his pain,
Ran mournfully murmuring by.

'Alas, silly swain that I was!'
Thus sadly complaining he cried;
'When first I beheld that fair face
'Twere better by far I had died.
She talked, and I blessed the dear tongue;
When she smiled 'twas a pleasure too great:
I listened and cried when she sung,
"'Was nightingale ever so sweet?"

'How foolish was I to believe
She could dote on so lowly a clown,
Or that her fond heart would not grieve
To forsake the fine folk of the town.
To think that a beauty so gay,
So kind and so constant would prove,
Or go clad like our maidens in gray,
Or live in a cottage on love.

'What though I have skill to complain,
Though the Muses my temples have crowned?
What though, when they hear my soft strain,
The virgins sit weeping around?
Ah, Colin, thy hopes are in vain;
Thy pipe and thy laurel resign;
Thy false one inclines to a swain
Whose music is sweeter than thine.

'And you, my companions so dear,
Who sorrow to see me betrayed,
Whatever I suffer, forbear—
Forbear to accuse the false maid.

Though through the wide world I should range,
'Tis in vain from my fortune to fly;
'Twas hers to be false and to change,
'Tis mine to be constant and die.

'If while my hard fate I sustain,
In her breast any pity is found,
Let her come with the nymph of the plain,
And see me laid low in the ground.
The last humble boon that I crave,
Is to shade me with cypress and yew;
And when she looks down on my grave,
Let her own that her shepherd was true.

"Then to her new love let her go,
And deck her in golden array,
Be finest at every fine show,
And frolic it all the long day;
While Colin, forgotten and gone,
No more shall be talked of or seen,
Unless when beneath the pale moon
His ghost shall glide over the green."

Six editions of Rowe's works appeared between 1727 and 1792.

Susannah Centlivre (c. 1667-1723), dramatist, is said to have been born in Ireland, her surname either Freeman or Rawkins; her father according to one account having fled to Ireland after the Restoration, when his religious or political opinions made him obnoxious to the authorities. She had already been the wife or mistress of two or three gentlemen, when in 1700 she produced a tragedy, The Perjured Husband, and not long after she appeared on the stage at Bath. In 1706 she married Joseph Centlivre, head-cook to Queen Anne, with whom she lived happily till the end. Her nineteen plays (with Life, 3 vols. 1761; new ed. 1872) include The Perjured Husband (1700); The Gamester (1705); The Platonick Lady (1707); The Busybody ('Marplot' its leading character, 1709); A Bickerstaff's Burial, ultimately called The Custom of the Country (1710); The Wonder! A Woman Keeps a Secret (1714); and A Bold Stroke for a Wife (1717), her most original playfor many of them are adaptations of French and other plays or stories. Some of her plays, on the other hand, were translated into French and into German. She was a strong Whig. In the Wonder, the scene of which is laid in Lisbon, the principal characters, except Spanish Dons and Donnas, are Colonel Briton, 'a Scotchman,' who has for three years held a command in Spain, and Gibby, his footman, who wears full Highland costume and speaks a dialect absolutely unknown to Highlanders, compounded of Aberdeenshire and south-country Scots, and English or disguised English, with a large element of a sort of Volapük concocted on hypothetical analogies. Much is genuine Scotch (as in Tatham's plays, vol. i. p. 786), often very oddly spelt; and, as in the former case, one wonders how many persons in a London audience in 1714—the year the play was produced-would understand that carich (i.e. carritch) meant catechism, speer ask, kenspeckle conspicuous and recognisable, and sculd: Allan Ramsay referred to by that na institution, if not the word, figures large Centlivre's plays. When Gibby in full fi Colonel Briton and a Spanish gentleman not unnaturally exclaims, 'What have and Colonel Briton explains: 'My footm our country dress, you must know, whi honour of Scotland 1 make all my serv. 'I HAVE receiv'd a letter from you, wherein you tax me as if I were Bicker flaff, with falling upon you as Author of the Atalantis, and the Person who honour'd me with 'a Character in that Celebrated Piece. I folemnly affure 'you, you wrong me in this, as much as you know you do in all elfe you have been pleafed to fay of me. "This will convince you how little I am an Ingrate; for I believe you will allow no one that is fo mean as to be forgetful of Services, ever fails in returning Injuries.

'As for the Verfes you quote of mine, they are ftill my Opinion, i.e.

SINCE Mr. Steele's reconcil'd Friendship (promised after my Application to him when under Confinement) could never be guilty of fo barbarous a Breach, fince he could not commit the Treacherousest! the Basest! the most Abject thing upon the Earth! fo contrary to his Assurances! It must be you, Sir, to whom my Thanks are due; making me a Person of such Consideration, as to be worthy your important War. A weak unlearned Woman's Writings, to employ fo great a Pen! Heavens!

Nay, (just tho' you are) you even strain a Point to oblige me, as to the Fate of my Atalantis, calling that present State Oblivion, which was Suppression. I doubt your Worship must be forced to make many as bold Attempts, else in my frail Woman's Life there will be little of Heroick Ills worth recording: Nor would I for the World (as your Worship seems to fear) by feign'd Names or none at all, put you to your Criticisms upon the Style of all your Contemporaries, though to give you an Opportunity to show your profound Judgment. No, Sir, I will not hazard losing my Title to so promising a Favour. Receive then, Sir, with your usual Goodness, with the same intent with which it is directed, this Address of,

> SIR, Your most Oblig'd Most humble Servant,

The letter from Steele is a true letter, and acknowledged a real service rendered. D. M. stands, of course, for De la Riviere Manley. The attack referred to is in Tatler No. 92. Sheer Lane (spelt also Shear Lane) was Shire Lane near Temple Bar-afterwards called Lower Serle's Place-in which stood a public-house called the 'Trumpet,' where the Tatler was said to meet his club. The lane has many other literary associations-with Sir Charles Sedley, Elias Ashmole, the Kit-Cat Club, Theodore Hook, and Dr Maginn.

Walter Pope, born at Fawsley in Northamptonshire, was a half-brother of Bishop Wilkins. He entered Trinity College, Cambridge, in 1645, but graduated from Wadham College, Oxford, in which college he became dean. Having succeeded Sir Christopher Wren as professor of Astronomy in Gresham College, he died in London a very old man in 1714. Besides scientific papers, he wrote ironical Memoires of M. Du Vall and an ode on Claude Duval, translated Select Novels from Cervantes and Petrarch, wrote Moral and Political Fables, and was author of The Old Man's Wish, 'sung a thousand times' by Benjamin Franklin in his youth, and done into Latin by Vincent Bourne. It is curiously irregular in rhythm, with many extra syllables. The chorus is repeated after each of the twenty verses.

From 'The Old Man's Wish.'

If I live to be old, for I find I go down, Let this be my fate. In a country town May I have a warm house, with a stone at my gate, And a cleanly young girl to rub my bald pate.

May I govern my passions with an absolute sway, And grow wiser and better as my strength wan Without gout or stone, by a gentle decay.

May my little house stand on the side of a hill With an easy descent to a mead and a mill, That when I've a mind I may hear my boy read In the mill if it rains, if it's dry in the mead.

Near a shady grove, and a murmuring brook, With the ocean at distance whereon I may look, With a spacious plain without hedge or stile, And an easy pad nag to ride out a mile.

With Horace and Petrarch, and two or three more Of the best wits that reigned in the ages before; With roast-mutton rather than ven'son or teal, And clean though coarse linen at every meal.

With a pudding on Sunday, with stout humming liquor, And remnants of Latin to welcome the vicar; With Monte-Fiascone or Burgundy wine To drink the king's health as oft as I dine. . . .

With a courage undaunted may I face my last day, And when I am dead may the better sort say, In the morning when sober, in the evening when mellow, 'He's gone and left not behind him his fellow.' . . . May I govern, &c.

Thomas Wharton (1648-1715), first Marquis of Wharton, escaped from the Presbyterian and Puritan régime of his father, the third Barot Wharton, to become the greatest rake in England Famous at Newmarket before he became & keen Whig partisan, he made himself highly obnoxious to the Duke of York, and finally boasted that by his ballad of Lillibulero (1688)-so the word is usually now spelt—set to music by Purcel, he had sung a king out of three kingdoms. He joined the Prince of Orange, but though made Privy Councillor and Master of the Household, did not realise his ambitions under William III. He was, without doubt, the astutest of the Whig managers. He was abhorred by Tories and Churchmen, and described by Lady Mary Worter Montagu as the 'most profligate, impious, and shameless of men.' Swift reviled him as 'ma atheist grafted on a dissenter;' Queen Anne disliked him, but in 1710 he was made Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, when he had Joseph Addison as his secretary. As a great Whig leader be naturally attained to a marquisate and other honours, which he enjoyed but for a few months. That very little ingenuity, the most rudimentary wit, and a plentiful lack of poetry sufficed to produce an epoch-making rhyme will be plain from a verse or two of his early and poor prophetic counterblast to 'The Wearing of the Green' (which oddly enough begins with a precisely similar question):

And yet the arbitrary doctrine of those times did not bring any great terror along with it: it was then but a rake, and serv'd only to scrape up a little paltry passive mony from the subject; but now it is become a murdering piece, loaden with no body knows how many bullets. And that the patrons of it may not complain that it is an exploded doctrine, as if men only hooted at it, but con'd not answer it, I shall stay to speak a little more to it.

From 'Julian the Apostate,'

In reading many of the late addresses [against the exclusion of the Duke of York from succeeding to the crown], I cou'd not forbear thinking of those angels which Mahomet saw, whose horns were half fire and half snow: those contrarietys which they wore on the outside of their heads, methought, many of our addressers had got on the inside of theirs. For with a brave and warm zeal for the Protestant religion and a Protestant prince, they generously offer'd their lives and fortunes, and the last drop of blood, in defence of his Majesty and the religion now establish'd by law; and by and by the same lives and fortunes, and last drop of blood, are promis'd over again to a popish successor. What is this but clapping cold snow upon the head of all their Protestant real? For he that offers his service to both of these together, lifts himself under two the most adverse partys in the world, and is Guelph and Gibeline at once. What benefit a popish successor can reap from lives and fortunes spent in defence of the Protestant religion, he may put in his eye: and what the Protestant religion gets by lives and fortunes spent in the service of a popish successor, will be over the left shoulder.

But this contradictious real was nothing near so surprizing as that of our friends of Rippon, who beseech his Majesty, and are very sollicitous, lest he shou'd agree to a bill of exclusion (for plain English is as well understood on this side the Trent as on the other), and seem to be very much afraid of losing the great blessing of a popish successor. All the sober men that I have met with, who remain unsatisfy'd as to a bill of exclusion, do nevertheless acknowledg, that a popish successor will be a heavy judgment of God to this nation; to which we must patiently submit, as we do to all other calamitys. But did ever men pray for a judgment, and make it their humble request, that they might be sure of it? Do they not, on the other hand, when it begins to threaten them, heartily deprecate the evil, and are they not earnest with God to avert it? Nay, do they not moreover use all lawful human means to prevent it? There is no judgment represented in scripture to be so immediately the stroke of God as the plague. David, in his great strait, made choice of it under that notion, when he desir'd rather to fall into the hands of God than into the hands of men; and yet men do constantly make use of all lawful means to prevent it. For, besides their using Hippocrates's receipt of Citò, longè, tardè, and running away from it, they make no scruple of antidoting and fortifying themselves against it. They strive with an infected gir; and with fires, and fumes of pitch and tar, &c., they endeavour to correct it." Nay, they imprison men that are infected, and put them under a very close confinement, when they have committed no fault, nor done any thing to forfeit their liberty, only that they may thereby preserve others. This and many other things are done by law, till such time as it pleases God to countermand that heavy judgment. I was therefore perfectly pos'd with that address, and cou'd not tell what to make of it. The least I cou'd think of them was this, that if they were Protestants, they were men weary of their religion, who were so undone for a prince. a great part of whose religion it is to persecute and extirpate theirs. And considering with my self what precedents or examples they might have of this strange conduct, and being able to find none; instead thereof, I had an imperfect remembrance of the quite contrary carriage of the primitive Christians towards Julian. In which having thorowly satisfy'd my self, I was willing to give the world this short scheme of it. I can term it no otherwise: for whoever pleases to look into those places which I have cited will find that I have not impoverish'd the subject, but have left, untouch'd, sufficient materials for whole volumes, to any one that shall be dispos'd to write them. From the Preface.

How the Christians us'd Julian's Memory.

To make amends for their dry eyes at Julian's funeral, the Christians spar'd neither pains nor cost to erect pillars and monuments to his memory. Gregory gives us the description of that stately one which he rear'd for him, speaking to Julian: 'This pillar we erect for you, which is higher and more conspicuous than Hercules's pillars. For they are fix'd in one place, and are only to be seen by those that come thither; but this being a movable one, cannot chuse but be known every where and by all men: which I am sure will last to future ages, branding thee and thy actions, and warning all others not to attempt any such rebellion against God, lest doing the like things, they fare alike.' And I think he has made an example of him.

For let any one read the inscription of this monument, and he will bless himself to see what titles of honour are bestow'd upon him. 'Thou persecutor next to Herod, thou traitor next to Judas (only thou hast not testify'd thy repentance by hanging thy self, as he did) and killer of Christ after Pilate; and next to the Jews, thou hater of God!' He calls him murderer, enemy, and avenger, &c. And all the ecclesiastical historians do the like.

But I am weary of ripping up the reproachful and ignominious titles which the Christians tongues being unfetter'd, as Gregory's expression is, and the great facility of compounding Greek words, have lavishly bestow'd upon him. And after all, they lodg him in hell, and there they leave him. Says St. Chrysostom, 'Where is the emperor that threaten'd these things? He is lost and destroy'd, and now he is in hell, undergoing endless punishment.'

What Protestants ever treated their worst persecutors at this rate? Who ever call'd Queen Mary mad bitch, as St. Jerom does Julian, mad dog? No, the courtesy of England has been shewn, even to that treacherous and bloody woman, who deserv'd as ill of the Christian religion as ever Julian did, which I hope to make very plain by and by.

In the mean time it will be necessary to make some reflections upon this strange and unexpected behaviour of the primitive Christians.

That there should be a restraint upon the I a matter of necessity; but the manner of it of debate.

The use and intent of printing is (the sthat of preaching) for communicating our tlothers.

And there is equal reason (in it self) for a the one as the other.

But this communication being the naturs mankind (as sociable creatures, and all embarl common salvation), the suppressing of either taking away the children's bread.

And in this communication, printing is mor than speaking.

In the beginning of the gospel, for calling the the Spirit of God interpreted the first preaching every auditor in his own language.

And since that miraculous communication ceased.

It pleased God in his own time to have a Man the invention of printing, to supply of it.

By which what is at first published in one only, is made intelligible to all others by transl

Nor any more a reason for suppressing it than it would be for shutting up the ch because hypocrites crowd into the church worshippers.

Whenever the sons of God came to pre:

lves before the Lord, Satan would jostle in among 1em, and present himself before the Lord also.

And yet we don't hear that they quitted their devotion pon it.

And as Satan used our Saviour himself so:

Have not I chosen you twelve, and one of you is a levil.

So it will be to the end of the world.

Wherefore to me, the clergy of the Church of England, in admitting their auditors to the sacraments without any personal examination, seem more orthodox with that standing rule, Let every man examine himself, than the ministers of those dissenting congregations, that first put each communicant to a test of experience; there being no such test necessary in the churches of God.

such test necessary in the churches of God.

Nor are they thereby secure of what they intend (to have none among them but true believers).

A hypocrite will stand and sit, and kneel and pray, as the people of God.

And I am apt to believe, that upon such a test, the Pharisee by giving himself so many distinguishing characters, might have had admission; and the poor publican, that had nothing to say for himself to God or man, but Lord have mercy upon me a sinner! might have been excluded.

And as by the common rules of justice, 'tis better ten guilty escape than one innocent suffer:

So in common charity among Christians, it is a less error to admit ten unworthy than to exclude one believing communicant.

And by the like rules both of justice and charity to mankind, 'tis safer to suffer ten errors to be vented than one necessary truth concealed.

For man is not bound to embrace the errors; but 'tis at his peril to come to the knowledg of the truth in matters of salvation.

When Virgil (by reflection on his own works) finding some things imperfect, had devised them to the flames, the Roman emperor strained a point of law to preserve them from that sentence.

'Rather than Maro shall in fire burn, Let laws themselves be cast into the urn.'

All which is hinted as reasons against restraining the press, by subjecting it to a licence.

And the project of a tax upon it seems impracti-

But the present licentiousness being chiefly occasioned by concealing the names of the authors:

The most just and natural remedy seems by prohibiting the prints without the names of the authors to them.

As the press is now used, it is a paper-inquisition, by which any man may be arraigned, judged, and condemned (ay, and broad hints given for his execution too) without ever knowing his accusers.

If this be objected to, as an imperfect remedy; for that, notwithstanding this, things may be clandestinely printed and dispersed:

So they may under the restraint by licence.

No prohibitions of human laws can totally extirpate the evils prohibited, but serve only to restrain the frequent commission of them.

Then may they expect to teach their fellow-creatures to cease from sin.

In the meantime, they must content themselves with driving the offenders into corners (as they do their cattel into pounds).

Patrick Walker, the Covenanting hagiographer, was born probably in Lanarkshire, some time about the middle of the seventeenth century. In 1682, as one of the wild Westland Whigs, he was concerned in the shooting of a dragoon near Lanark, and two years later was captured as a rebel and imprisoned in Edinburgh and Dunnottar Castle, suffering, according to his own story, the torture of the thumbscrew and the He made his escape from Leith tolbooth in 1685, and was active in the rabbling of the curates at the Revolution. After the return of peaceful times he seems to have lived as a packman or pedlar, and, in the words of an unfriendly authority, 'when his means went from him, he became a vagrant person without a calling, and wandered through the country gathering old stories' about the Cameronian saints of the 'killing time.' Walker's own account is, that in the process of research he travelled upwards of a thousand miles in Scotland and Ireland in 1722 and 1723. The results appeared in the 'Remarkable Passages' of the Lives of Alexander Peden, John Semple, Richard Cameron, Daniel Cargill, and others, which were published mostly by the author himself at Bristo Port in Edinburgh, between 1724 and 1732. Walker was one of the irreconcilable zealots known as 'Society men,' who left their testimony in the Hind Let Loose; and his biographies, in their quaint and picturesque sincerity, give striking illustration of the ferocity, fanaticism, and childish superstition of that intractable remnant. They had a great chap-book vogue—the Life of the miraculous Peden in especial—among the Scottish peasantry of the eighteenth century, and supplied plentiful materials for such later writers as Howie of Lochgoin; while Sir Walter Scott turned them to good account in another fashion for Old Mortality and The Heart of Midlothian. In 1827 appeared a reprint, Biographia Presbyteriana; a scholarly new edition by Dr D. H. Fleming in 1901 fixed Walker's death in 1745. The first extract is from the life of Peden; the next is 'To the Reader.'

Brown of Priesthill shot by Claverhouse.

In the beginning of May 1685, he [Peden] came to the house of John Brown and Isabel Weir, whom he married before he went last to Ireland, where he stayed all night; and in the morning, when he took his farewel, he came out at the door, saying to himself, Poor woman, a fearful morning, twice over, a dark misty morning. The next morning between five and six hours, the said John Brown, having performed the worship of God in his family, was going with a spade in his hand, to make ready some peat-ground; the mist being very dark, knew not until bloody, cruel Claverhouse compassed him with three troops of horses, brought him to his house, and there examined him; who, tho' he was a man of a stammering speech, yet answered him distinctly and solidly; which made Claverhouse to examine these whom he had taken to be his guides thorow the muirs, if ever they heard him preach: they answered, No, no, he was never a preacher. He said, If he has never preached, meikle has he prayed in his time. He said to John, Go to your prayers, for you shall immediately die. When he was praying, Claverhouse interrupted him three times. One time that he stopt him, he was pleading that the Lord would spare a remnant, and not make a full end in the day of his anger, Claverhouse said, I gave you time to pray, and ye're begun to preach; he turned about upon his knees, and said. Sir. you know neither the nature of preaching nor praying, that calls this preaching; then continued without confusion. When ended, Claverhouse said, Take goodnight of your wife and children; his wife standing by, with her child in her arms, that she had brought forth to him, and another child of his first wife's, he came to her, and said, Now Isabel, the day is come, that I told you would come, when I spake first to you of marrying me; she said, Indeed, John, I can willingly part with you; then he said, That's all I desire, I have no more to do but die, I have been in case to meet with death for so many years. He kissed his wife and bairns, and wished purchased and promised blessings to be multiplied upon them, and his blessing. Claverhouse ordered six soldiers to shoot him; the most part of the bullets came upon his head, which scattered his brains upon the ground. Claverhouse said to his wife, What thinkest thou of thy husband now, woman? She said, I thought ever much good of him, and as much now as ever: he said, It were but justice to lay thee beside him; she said, If ye were permitted, I doubt not but your cruelty would go that length; but how will you make answer for this morning's work? He said, To man I can be answerable; and for God, I will take him in my own hand. Claverhouse mounted his horse, and marched, and left her with the corps of her dead husband lying there; she set the bairn upon the ground, and gathered his brains, and tied up his head, and straighted his body, and covered him with her plaid, and sat down and wept over him; it being a very desert place, where never victual grew, and far from neighbours. It was some time before any friends came to her; the first that came was a very fit hand, that old singular Christian woman in the Cummerhead, named Jean Brown, three miles distant, who had been tried with the violent death of her husband at Pentland, afterwards of two worthy sons, Thomas Weir, who was killed at Drumclog, and David Steil, who was suddenly shot afterwards, when taken. The said Isabel Weir, sitting upon her husband's gravestone, told me that before that, she could see no blood but she was in danger to faint, and yet was helped to be a witness to all this, without either fainting or confusion, except when the shotts were let off, her eves dazled. His corps were buried at the end of his house where he was slain, with this inscription on his grave-

In earth's cold bed the dusty part here lies Of one who did the earth as dust despise. Here in that place from earth he took departure, Now he has got the garland of the martyr.'

This murder was committed betwirt six and area in the morning; Mr Peden was about ten or eleve miles distant, having been in the fields all night; le came to the house betwixt seven and eight, and descal to call in the family, that he might pray among them: He said, Lord, when wilt thou avenge Brown's blood? Oh, let Brown's blood be precious in the sight, and hasten the day when thou'lt avenge it, with Cameron's, Cargill's, and many others of our martyrs' names; and O for that day when the Lod would avenge all their bloods. When ended, John Muirhead enquired what he meant by Brown's blood; he said twice over, What do I mean? Claverhous has been at the Preshill this morning, and has enely murdered John Brown: his corps are lying at the ed of his house, and his poor wife sitting weeping by his corps, and not a soul to speak comfortably her. This morning after the sun-rising, I saw a strain apparition in the firmament, the appearance of a very bright clear-shining star, fall from heaven to the eath; and indeed there is a clear-shining light fallen this deg, the greatest Christian that ever I conversed with.

Straighted in the form straighted is still the vernacular word in Scotland for laying out a dead body.

Signs and Wonders.

In the year 1686, especially in the months of June and July, many yet alive can witness, that about the Crosfoord-boat, two miles beneath Lanark, especially at the Mains, on the water of Clyde, many people gathered together for several afternoons, where there were showers of bonnets, hats, guns and sworth, which covered the trees and ground, companies of men in arms marching in order, upon the water-side, companies meeting companies, going all through other, through other, and then all falling to the ground, and disappearing; and other companies immediately appearing the same way. I went there three afternoons together, and, as I could observe, there were two the people that were together saw, and a third the saw not; and tho' I could see nothing, yet there w such a fright and trembling upon these that did sea that was discernible to all from these that saw ast There was a gentleman standing next to me who spake as too many gentlemen and others speak, whe said, A pack of damn'd witches and warlocks, the have the second sight, the devil-ha't do I see. After a mong the lawless logwood-cutters of the joined in 1679 a band of buccaneers used the Isthmus of Darien and ravaged a far south as Juan Fernandez. In expedition (1683), after seizing a Danish terra Leone, the coasted along the shores Peru, and Mexico, sailing thence across ic, and touching at the Philippines, China, tralia. Marooned on Nicobar Islands the made his way in a native canoe to and got back to England (1691), where thed his Voyage round the World (1697), eminently interesting in substance, and in style homely but clear and easily read. He conducted (1699-1700) a voyage of discovery to the South Seas, in which he explored the north-west coast of Australia, as also the coasts of New Guinea and New Britain, giving his name to the Dampier Archipelago and Strait. On the return voyage he was wrecked off Ascension, and until relieved some two months later lived with his crew on turtles and goats. The old buccaneer was a better pilot than commander, and his cruelty to his lieutenant led to his being court-martialled. Yet in 1703 he was reappointed to the command of two privateers (the sailing-master of one of them Alexander Selkirk) to the South Seas, where he was said to have been guilty of drunkenness, brutality, and even cowardice. Dampier returned home at the close of 1707, poor and broken; nor did his angry Vindication re-establish his reputation. Next year he sailed again as pilot to a privateer, which rescued Selkirk, and returned in 1711 after a prosperous voyage. In the portrait of Dampier, a rough sailor but a man of exquisite mind, Coleridge in the Table Talk insisted that he could trace 'that something feminine discoverable in the countenances of all men of genius.' Coleridge, who probably knew much less about the buccaneerhydrographer than Dr Laughton, would on no account hear of his being called a pirate. The passage below from the 1683 voyage obviously contributed (as well as the experiences of Selkirk, published 1712) in not a few particulars to Defoe's great picture (1719) of a solitary's life on the island of Juan Fernandes.

Both we and Capt. Eaton being bound for John Fernando's Isle, we kept company, and we spared him bread and beef, and he spared us water, which he took in as he passed thro' the Streights [of Magellan].

March the 22d 1684, we came in sight of the island, and the next day got in and anchored in a bay at the south-end of the island, and 25 fathom water, not two cables length from the shore. We presently got out our canoa, and went ashore to seek for a Moskito Indian, whom we left here when we were chased hence by three Spanish ships in the year 1681, a little before we went to Arica; Capt. Watlin being then our commander, after Capt. Sharp was turned out.

This Indian lived here alone above three years, and altho' he was several times sought after by the Spaniards, who knew he was left on the island, yet they could never find him. He was in the woods, hunting for goats, when Captain Watlin drew off his men, and the ship was under sail before he came back to shore. He had with him his gun and a knife, with a small horn of powder, and a few shot; which being spent, he contrived a way by notching his knife, to saw the barrel of his gun into small pieces, wherewith he made harpoons, lances, hooks and a long knife, heating the pieces first in the fire, which he struck with his gun-flut, and a piece of the harrel of his gun, which he hardned; having learnt to do that among the English. The hot pieces of iron he would hammer out and bend as he pleased with stones, and saw them with his jagged knife; or grind them to an edge by long labour, and harden them to a good temper as there was occasion. All this may seem strange to those that are not acquainted with the sagacity of the Indians; but it is no more than these Moskito men are accustomed to in their own country, where they make their own fishing and striking instruments, without either forge or anvil; tho' they spend a great deal of time about them.

Other wild Indians who have not the use of iron, which the Moskito men have from the English, make hatches of a very hard stone, with which they will cut down trees (the cotton-tree especially, which is a soft tender wood), to build their houses or make canoas; and tho' in working their canoas hollow, they cannot dig them so neat and thin, yet they will make them fit for their service. This their digging or hatchet-work they help out by fire, whether for the felling of trees, or for making the inside of their canoa hollow. These contrivances are used particularly by the savage Indians of Blewfield's River, described in the 3d Chapter, whose canoas and stonehatches I have seen. These stone-hatches are about 10 inches long, 4 broad, and three inches thick in the middle. They are grownd away flat and sharp at both ends: right in the midst and clear round it they make a notch, so wide and deep that a man might place his finger along it, and taking a stick or withe about 4 foot long, they bind it round the hatchet-head, in that notch, and so twisting it hard, use it as an handle or helve; the head being held by it very fast. Nor are other wild Indians less ingenious. Those of Patagonia, particularly, head their arrows with flint, cut or ground; which I have seen and admired. But to return to our Moskito man on the isle of J. Fernando. With such instruments as he made in that manner, he got such provision as the island afforded; either goats or fish. He told us that at first he was forced to eat seal, which is very ordinary meat, before he had made hooks: but afterwards he never killed any seals but to make lines, cutting their skins into thongs. He had a little house or hut half a mile from the sea, which was lin'd with goats skin; his couch or barbecu of sticks lying along about two foot distant from the ground, was spread with the same, and was all his bedding. He had no cloaths left, having worn out those he brought from Watlin's ship, but only a skin about his waist. He saw our ship the day before we came to an anchor, and did believe we were English, and therefore kill'd three goats in the morning, before we came to an anchor, and drest them with cabbage, to treat us when we came ashore. He came then to the sea-side to congratulate our safe arrival. And when we landed, a Moskito Indian, named Robin, first leap'd ashore, and running to his brother Moskito man, threw himself flat on his face at his feet, who helping him up, and embracing him, fell flat with his face on the ground at Robin's feet, and was by him taken up also. We stood with pleasure to behold the surprize, and tenderness, and solemnity of this interview, which was exceedingly affectionate on both sides; and when their ceremonies of civility were over, we also that stood gazing at them drew near, each of us embracing him we had found here, who was overjoyed to see so many of his old friends come hither, as he thought purposely to fetch him. He was named Will, as the other was Robin. These were names given them by the English, for they had no names among themselves; and they take it as a great favour to be named by any of us; and will complain for want of it, if we do not appoint them some name when they are with us: saying of themselves they are poor men, and have no name.

This island is in lat. 34 d. 45 m. and about 120 leagues from the main. It is about 120 leagues round, full of high hills and small pleasant valleys, which if manured, would probably produce any thing proper for the climate. The sides of the mountains are part savannahs, part woodland. Savannahs are clear pieces of land without woods; not because more barren than the wood-land, for they are frequently spots of as good land as any, and often are intermixt with wood-land...

The grass in these savannahs at John Fernando's is not a long flaggy grass, such as is usually in the savannahs in the West-Indies, but a sort of kindly grass, thick and flourishing the biggest part of the year. The woods afford divers sorts of trees; some large and good timber for building, but none fit for masts. The cabbage-trees of this isle are but small and low, yet afford a good head, and the cabbage very sweet. This tree I shall describe in the Appendix, in the Bay of Campeachy. The savannahs are stocked with goats in great herds: but those that live on the east-end of the island are not so fat as those on the west-end; for though there is much more grass, and plenty of water in every valley, never theless they thrive not so well here as on the west-end where there is less food; and yet there are found greate flocks, and those too fatter and sweeter. That west-end of the island is all high champion ground without an! valley, and but one place to land; there is neither wood nor any fresh water, and the grass short and dry.

Goats were first put on the island by John Fernando who first discovered it on his voyage from Lima to Baldivia (and discovered also another island about the same bigness, 20 leagues to the westward of this). From those goats these were propagated, and the island hat' taken its name from this its first discoverer, who whe he returned to Lima, desired a patent for it, designing t settle here; and it was in his second voyage hither the he set ashore three or four goats, which have since b their increase so well stock'd the whole island. But in could never get a patent for it, therefore it lies still dest tute of inhabitants, the doubtless capable of maintaining 4 or 500 families, by what may be produced or the land only. I speak much within compass; for the savannahs would at present feed 1000 head of cattle besides goats, and the land being cultivated would pre bably bear corn, or wheat, and good pease, yams, € potatoes; for the land in their valleys and sides of the mountains is of a good black fruitful mould. about it is likewise very productive of its inhabitans Seals swarm as thick about this island as if they had other place in the world to live in; for there is not a be nor rock that one can get ashore on but is full of these Sea-lions are here in great companies, and fish, partic larly snappers and rock-fish, are so plentiful, that t men in an hour's time will take with hook and line 1 many as will serve 100 men. . . .

There are only two bays in the whole island where ships may anchor; these are both at the east-end, and in both of them is a rivulet of good fresh water. Either of these bays may be fortified with little charge, to that degree that 50 men in each may be able to keep off 1000; and there is no coming into these bays from the west-end, but with great difficulty, over the mountains, where if 3 men are placed, they may keep down as many as come against them on any side. This was partly experienced ishmen that Capt. Davis left here, who defended a against a great body of Spaniards who landed ys, and came here to destroy them; and tho' the me one of their consorts deserted and fled to iards, yet the other four kept their ground, and twards taken in from hence by Capt. Strong m. We remained at John Fernando's sixteen it sick men were ashore all the time, and one in Eaton's doctors (for he had four in his ship) and feeding them with goat and several herbs, here is plenty growing in the brooks; and their were chiefly scorbutick.

ard Bentley (1662-1742), born of yeoman ge at Oulton near Leeds, passed from ald grammar-school to St John's College, age, in 1676, as subsizar, and in 1682 was ed by his college head-master of Spalding ir-school. As tutor to the son of Stillingen Dean of St Paul's, he accompanied his 1 1689 to Oxford, where he was twice ed to deliver the Boyle Lectures on the es of Religion. He had taken orders in nd to Stillingfleet he owed various good stical preferments, with the post of royal a at St James's. His Letter to Mill (1691) Greek chronicler John Malelas is itself erpiece; but it was the Dissertation upon utles of Phalaris (1699), an expansion of ier essay, that established his reputation out Europe, and may be said to mark a un scholarship. The origin and course of title of the Books is sketched in Vol. I. of th in connection with Sir William Temple 54). The essay is not merely a monument lition, a triumph of penetrative insight in wart of making accurate philosophy eluciistory, but a great literary masterpiece, in trenchant argument is enlivened by keen entiful wit and satire. The style is direct tple, with many homely phrases. In 1700 was appointed Master of Trinity College, dge. The history of his mastership is an en series of quarrels and litigations, proby his arrogance and rapacity; but when in was made regius professor of Divinity, he xl to pass scathless through all his cones. Only death prevented the Bishop of itor of Trinity, from depriving him of his hip (1714); the university senate did deprive his degrees (1718); and another bishop iced sentence of deposition (1734). But at h he was in full possession both of degrees stership. This stormy life did not impair ary activity. As 'Phileleutherus Lipsiensis' ked Anthony Collins's Discourse of Freewith a trenchancy of argument, ripeness larship, and a brilliancy of style such as the deistical writers could command. It hese Remarks that he incidentally endorsed othesis that the Homeric poems were put together from many separate ballads or lays long after their first date of composition, thus partly anticipating Wolf's theory. He edited a number of classical authors-among others, Horace (1711) and Terence (1726)-upon which he bestowed vast labour. Emendations were at once his forte and foible-the latter conspicuously in his edition of Paradise Lost (1732). His theory was that Milton's blindness had necessitated the help of an amanuensis who made stupid mistakes, and of an editor who made mistakes as well as wilful alterations and interpolations. These by internal criticism he set himself to correct, with much superfluous acuteness. The proposal (1720) to print an edition of the Greek New Testament, in which the received text should be corrected by a careful comparison with the Vulgate and all the oldest existing Greek MSS., was then singularly bold, and evoked violent opposition; in the settling of the New Testament text, his principles were triumphantly carried out by Lachmann. The founder of the school of classical criticism of which Porson illustrated the excellences and the defects, he wielded with equal effect the weapons of textual and of higher criticism. By uncomplimentary remarks on Pope's Homer he incurred the enmity of the translator and a place in the Dunciad, which reflected more ridicule on the jealous poet than on the great critic. One of Bentley's daughters was the mother of Richard Cumberland the dramatist.

From the 'Phalaris.'

That sophist, whoever he was, that wrote a small book of letters in the name and character of Phalaris (give me leave to say this now, which I shall prove by and by) had not so bad a hand at humouring and personating, but that several believed it was the tyrant himself that talked so big, and could not discover the ass under the skin of that hon; for we find Stobæus quoting the 38, and 67, and 72 of those Epistles, under the title of Phalaris; and Suidas, in the account he gives of him, says he has wrote 'very admirable letters,' dwww.hd; Sauparies wave, meaning those that we are speaking of. And Johannes Tzetzes, a man of much rambling learning, has many and large extracts out of them in his Chiliads; ascribing them all to the tyrant whose livery they wear. These three, I think, are the only men among the antients that make any mention of them; but since they give not the least hint of any doubts concerning their author, we may conclude that most of the scholars of those ages received them as true originals; so that they have the general warrant and certificate for this last thousand years before the restoration of learning. As for the moderns, besides the approbation of those smaller critics that have been concerned in the editions of them, and cry them up of course, some very learned men have espoused and maintained them; such as Thomas Fazellus and Jacobus Cappellus. Even Mr Selden himself draws an argument in chronology from them, without discovering any suspicion or jealousy of a cheat; to whom I may add their latest and greatest advocate, who has honoured them with that most high character, prefixed to this

Others, indeed, have shewn their distrust of Phalaris's title to them, but are content to declare their sentiment without assigning their reasons. Phalaris, or 'somebody else,' says Cælius Rhodus. 'The Epistles that go under the name of Phalaris,' says Menagius. Some name the very person at whose door they lay the forgery. 'Lucian, whom they commonly mistake for Phalaris,' says Ang. Politianus. 'The Epistles of Phalaris, if they are truly his, and not rather Lucian's,' says Lilius Greg. Gyraldus, who in another place informs us, that Politian's opinion had generally obtained among the learned of that age, 'The Epistles,' says he of Phalaris, which 'most people attribute to Lucian.' How judiciously they ascribe them to Lucian we shall see better anon, after I have examined the case of Phalaris, who has the plea and right of possession; and I shall not go to dispossess him, as those have done before me, by an arbitrary sentence in his own tyrannical way, but proceed with him upon lawful evidence, and a fair and impartial trial; and I am very much mistaken in the nature and force of my proofs, if ever any man hereafter that reads them persist in his old opinion of making Phalaris an author.

The censures that are made from style and language alone are commonly nice and uncertain, and depend upon slender notices. Some very sagacious and learned men have been deceived in those conjectures, even to The great Scaliger published a few iambics, as a choice fragment of an old tragedian, given him by Muretus; who soon after confessed the jest, that they were made by himself. Boxhornius wrote a commentary upon a small poem De Lite, supposed by him to be some ancient author's; but it was soon discovered to be Michael Hospitalius's, a late Chancellor of France; so that if I had no other argument but the style to detect the spuriousness of Phalaris's Epistles, I myself, indeed, should be satisfied with that alone; but I durst not hope to convince every body else. I shall begin therefore with another sort of proofs, that will affect the most slow judgments, and assure the most timid or incredulous.

Then follows the argument proper, in too great detail for quotation. Bentley's unheard-of liberties with the most perfect passages of Paradise Lost may be well illustrated by his transformation of 'No light, but rather darkness visible' into 'No light but rather a transpicuous gloom;' and by his proposed emendations of the very last lines of the last book (see the last paragraph quoted in Vol. I. p. 703). Addison had suggested that the omission of the last two unforgetable lines—would make a better close for the poem. Bentley disapproved this suggestion, but asserted that the lines had been utterly corrupted by the editor, and for the reasons given proposed to restore or emend them into woefully different verses:

Milton 'tells us before, that Adam, upon hearing Michael's predictions, was even surcharg'd with joy (xii. 372); was replete with joy and wonder (468); was in doubt whether he should repent of, or rejoice in, his fall (475); was in great peace of thought (558); and Eve herself was not sad, but full of consolation (620). Why then does this distich dismiss our first parents in anguish, and the reader in melancholy? And how can the expression be justified, "with wand'ring steps and slow"? Why wand'ring? Erratic steps? Very improper: when in the line before, they were guided by Providence. And why slow? when even Eve profess'd her readiness and alacrity for the journey (614):—"But now lead on; is me is no delay." And why "their solitary way"? All words to represent a sorrowful parting; when even their former walks in Paradise were as solitary as their way now: there being nobody besides them two, both here and there. Shall I therefore, after so many prior presumptions, presume at last to offer a distich, as close as may be to the author's words, and entirely agreeable to his scheme?

"Then hand in hand with social steps their way Through Eden took, with heav'nly comfort cheer'd."

Dyce's edition of Bentley's works (3 vols. 1836-38) is unfinished.

The Duke of Buckingham (JOHN SHEF-FIELD, often called DUKE OF BUCKINGHAM -SHIRE—1648-1721) was associated in his latter days with the wits and poets of the reign -Queen Anne, though in spirit he belongs to the Having succeeded his father previous age. Earl of Mulgrave in 1658, he served with Prince Rupert against the Dutch, and in 1673 became colonel of a regiment of foot. In order to lear the art of war under Marshal Turenne, he made a campaign in the French service. Bus even amidst the din of arms he did not wholl y neglect literary pursuits, and he made himself an accomplished scholar. He was a member of the Privy Council of James II., but acquiesced in the Revolution, and was for three years a member of the Privy Council of William and Mary, with a pension of £3000 and the title of Marquis of Normanby. Sheffield is said to have 'made love' to Queen Anne when they were both young, and Her Majesty heaped honours on the favourite immediately on her accession to the throne, including the dukedom of the county of Buckingham. He lived in great state in a magnificent house be had built in St James's Park, of which he has given a long description-dwelling with delight on its gardens, terrace, park, and canal, and the rows of goodly elms and limes through which he approached his mansion. This stately residence was purchased by George III., and taken down by George IV. to make way for the present royal palace, which still bears the name of Buckingham. Sheffield wrote several poems and prose works, among the latter being an Account of the Revolution. Among the former is an Essay on Satire, which Dryden is reported, but erroneously, to have revised. His principal work, however, is his Essay on Poetry, which was published anonymously in 1682; the second edition, enlarged in 1691, received the praises of Roscommon, Dryden, and This poem was retouched by Pope, and in return some of the last lines of Buckingham were devoted to the praise of the young poet of Windsor Forest. The Essay on Poetry, written a the heroic couplet, seems to have suggested 'ope's Essay on Criticism. It is in the style of Roscommon, plain, perspicuous, and sensible, but it contains little or no true poetry—less than many of Dryden's prose essays—and is much of it incredibly commonplace in thought and in word. Out of Shakespeare's Julius Casar he manufactured, with the help of some new love scenes and other tags, two model dramas according to his own—and his contemporaries'—notions of good taste.

From the 'Essay on Poetry.'

Of all those arts in which the wise excel, Nature's chief master-piece is writing well; No writing lifts exalted man so high As sacred and soul-moving Poesy: No kind of work requires so nice a touch. And, if well finished, nothing shines so much. But Heaven forbid we should be so profane To grace the vulgar with that noble name. Tis not a flash of fancy, which, sometimes Dazzling our minds, sets off the slightest rhymes; Bright as a blaze, but in a moment done: True wit is everlasting like the sun, Which, though sometimes behind a cloud retired, Breaks out again, and is by all admired. Number and rhyme, and that harmonious sound Which not the nicest ear with harshness wound, Are necessary, yet but vulgar arts; And all in vain these superficial parts Contribute to the structure of the whole; Without a genius, too, for that 's the soul: A spirit which inspires the work throughout, As that of nature moves the world about; A flame that glows amidst conceptions fit, Even something of divine, and more than wit; Itself unseen, yet all things by it shewn, Describing all men, but described by none. . . .

First, then, of songs, which now so much abound, Without his song no fop is to be found; A most offensive weapon which he draws On all he meets, against Apollo's laws. Though nothing seems more easy, yet no part Of poetry requires a nicer art; For as in rows of richest pearl there lies Many a blemish that escapes our eyes, The least of which defects is plainly shewn In one small ring, and brings the value down: So songs should be to just perfection wrought; Yet when can one be seen without a fault? Exact propriety of words and thought; Expression easy, and the fancy high; Yet that not seem to creep, nor this to fly; No words transposed, but in such order all, As wrought with care, yet seem by chance to fall. . . .

Of all the ways that wisest men could find To mend the age and mortify mankind, Satire well writ has most successful proved, And cures, because the remedy is loved. Tis hard to write on such a subject more, Without repeating things oft said before. Some vulgar errors only we'll remove, That stain a beauty which we so much love. Of chosen words some take not care enough, And think they should be, as the subject, rough;

This poem must be more exactly made,
And sharpest thoughts in smoothest words conveyed.
Some think, if sharp enough, they cannot fail,
As if their only business was to rail;
But human frailty, nicely to unfold,
Distinguishes a satire from a scold.
Rage you must hide, and prejudice lay down;
A satyr's smile is sharper than his frown;
So, while you seem to slight some rival youth,
Malice itself may pass sometimes for truth. . . .

By painful steps at last we labour up Parnassus' hill, on whose bright airy top The epic poets so divinely shew, And with just pride behold the rest below. Heroic poems have a just pretence To be the utmost stretch of human sense; A work of such inestimable worth, There are but two the world has yet brought forth-Homer and Virgil; with what sacred awe Do those mere sounds the world's attention draw! Just as a changeling seems below the rest Of men, or rather as a two-legged beast, So these gigantic souls, amazed, we find As much above the rest of human-kind! Nature's whole strength united! endless fame And universal shouts attend their name! Read Homer once, and you can read no more, For all books else appear so mean, so poor, Verse will seem prose; but still persist to read, And Homer will be all the books you need.

Sir Richard Blackmore (birth year unknown; died 1729) was one of the most fortunate physicians and most severely handled poets of the age. Born of a good family at Corsham in Wiltshire, and educated at Westminster and St Edmund Hall, Oxford, he took his B.A. in 1674. He was in extensive medical practice, was knighted in 1697 by William III., and afterwards made censor of the College of Physicians. In 1695 he published Prince Arthur, an epic poem, which he says he wrote amidst the duties of his profession, 'for the greatest part in coffee-houses, or in passing up and down the Dryden, whom he had attacked for licentiousness, satirised him for writing 'to the rumbling of his chariot-wheels.' In Prince Arthur Blackmore flattered himself that he had imitated Virgil's manner, angels taking the place of heathen gods in the management of sublunary affairs. In King Arthur (1697) he seems to think he had followed rather the Homeric model. The twelve dreary books of this preposterous epic are devoted wholly to one of the most fabulous of Arthur's exploits as reported by Geoffrey of Monmouth—an expedition to support the Christian people of Gaul against certain heathen Franks, in which history, ethnology, and commonsense are alike defied. The principal enemy is the Frankish king Clotar, assumed to be a heathen-though the Franks were converted to Christianity before the end of the fifth century, and Arthur or his prototype seems to have belonged to the sixth. The prince of darkness and his pseudo-Miltonic council of war-Belus, Milcom, Ammon, Rimmon, &c.—discuss in long speeches how to check the Christian champion's progress, but in vain. There are endless lists of the princes in either camp, and the numbers of their forces. The battle in which Arthur triumphs is not more amusing than the rest. Before the campaign is ended Satan effects a diversion by stirring up strife in Britain; Arthur has to hasten thither, but soon returns, and in a final battle wounds Clotar mortally, takes the opportunity as he lies 'weltering in his gore' to address a sermon to him about Divine justice, and then hacks off his head and 'spurns' or apparently kicks the corpse. last stage of the personal conflict between the kings proceeded thus:

The Frank observing that his arm did wield His sword in vain against King Arthur's shield, Retreating, to the ground did downward stoop, And heav'd a mighty rocky fragment up. Then did the furious warriour forward step, And hurl'd with both his hands the pondrous heap. The Britons trembled when they saw the stone With such a force against their monarch thrown. O'er Arthur's shoulder flew the flinting rock, But as it past a craggy corner struck The shoulder's point, and his bright armour bruis'd, Which in his flesh a painful wound produc'd. His friends grew pale to see that shoulder hurt, Which did their empire and their hopes support. The pious monarch did the wound neglect, And for one mortal stroke did all his might collect, Like some celestial sword of temper'd flame, Down on the Frank keen caliburno came. It fell upon his neck with vengeful sway, And thro' the shrinking muscles made its way, The head, reclin'd, on the right shoulder lay. Down fell the Frank, disabled by the wound, Weltering in gore and raging, bit the ground. The pious prince did o'er the warriour stand, Bright caliburno flaming in his hand.

Blackmore continued writing, and published a series of epics on King Alfred, Queen Elizabeth, the Redeemer, the Creation, &c. All are intolerably tedious, and have sunk into oblivion; but Pope has preserved his memory in various satirical allusions. Addison extended his friendship to the Whig poet, whose private character was irreproachable, and strongly approved his hostility to the prevalent grossness and impiety of dramatic poetry. Dr Johnson included Blackmore in his edition of the poets, but of his works reproduced only the poem of Creation, which, he said, 'wants neither harmony of numbers, accuracy of thought, nor elegance of diction.' Even Dennis, formerly hostile, thought Blackmore surpassed Lucretius. The design of Creation was to demonstrate the existence of a Divine Eternal Mind. The worthy doctor recites the proofs of a Deity from natural and physical phenomena, and afterwards reviews the systems of the Epicureans and the Fatalists, concluding with a hymn to the Creator of the wear The old-fashioned orthodox piety of Blackn is everywhere apparent in his writings; but genius of poetry evaporates amidst tedious a mentations, commonplace illustrations, prosing clamation, and general dullness. From the oper of Creation it would appear that he delibera designed to outsoar Milton 'to heights unknown to anybody but himself, presumably:

No more of courts, of triumphs, or of arms,
No more of valour's force, or beauty's charms;
The themes of vulgar lays, with just disdain,
I leave unsung, the flocks, the amorous swain,
The pleasures of the land, and terrors of the main.
How abject, how inglorious 'tis to lie
Grovelling in dust and darkness, when on high
Empires immense, and rolling worlds of light,
To range their heavenly scenes, the muse invite!
I meditate to soar above the skies,
To heights unknown, through ways untry'd to rise:
I would th' Eternal from his works assert,
And sing the wonders of creating art.

While I this unexampled task essay,
Pass awful gulfs, and beat my painful way;
Celestial Dove! divine assistance bring,
Sustain me on thy strong-extended wing,
That I may reach th' Almighty's sacred throne,
And make his causeless power, the cause of all this

Thou dost the full extent of nature see,
And the wide realms of vast immensity:
Eternal Wisdom thou dost comprehend,
Rise to her heights, and to her depths descend:
The Father's sacred counsels thou canst tell,
Who in his bosom didst for ever dwell.
Thou on the deep's dark face, immortal dove!
Thou with Almighty energy didst move
On the wild waves, incumbent didst display
Thy genial wings, and hatch primæval day.
Order from thee, from thee distinction came,
And all the beauties of the wond'rous frame.
Hence stampt on nature we perfection find,
Fair as th' idea in the Eternal Mind.

Sir Samuel Garth, an eminent London physician, was born in 1661 at Bowland Forest in the West Riding of Yorkshire, and educated at Ingleton, Peterhouse (Cambridge), and Leyden, taking his M.D. in 1691, and being elected a Fellow of the College of Physicians in 1693. In 1699 he published his poem of The Dispensary, to aid the College in a war they were then waging with the apothecaries. The latter, supported by some of the physicians, had ventured to prescribe as well as compound medicines; and the physicians advertised that they would give advice gratis to the poor, and establish a dispensary of their own for the sale of cheap medicines. 'The original of this difference, Garth said in the preface, 'has been of some standing, though it did not break out into fury and excess until the time of the erecting of the dispensary, a room in the college set up for the relief of the sick poor.' The College triumphed; but in 1703 the House of Lords decided that apothecaries were entitled to exercise the privilege Garth and his brother-physicians resisted. Garth was a popular and kindly man, a firm Whig, yet the early encourager of Pope; and when Dryden died he pronounced a Latin oration over his remains. With Addison he was, politically and personally, on terms of the closest intimacy. On the accession of George I. he was knighted with Marlborough's sword, and received the double appointment of Physician-in-Ordinary to the King and Physician-General to the Army. He edited Ovid's Metamorphoses, 'translated by the most eminent hands,' in 1717, and wrote a good many prologues and occasional poems and verses, such as those inscribed on the toastglasses of the Kit-Cat Club, of which he was a member. He died 18th January 1719, and was buried in the chancel of the church at Harrowon-the-Hill. Pope praised him as 'the best good Christian he, although he knows it not;' and Bolingbroke, in oddly similar terms, called him 'the best-natured ingenious wild man I ever knew.' The Dispensary is a mock-heroic poem in six cantos, designed, Garth said, 'to rally some of our disaffected members into a sense of their duty;' it culminates in a grand combat between physicians and apothecaries. Envy and Disease play a large part, and a delegate is finally sent to the shades to consult Harvey on the matter in dispute. In the management of the plot Garth took hints both from Boileau's Lutrin and from Dryden's MacFlecknoe. Some of the leading apothecaries of the day are happily ridiculed; but the interest of the satire has largely passed away. It opens thus:

Speak, goddess! since 'tis thou that best canst tell How ancient leagues to modern discord fell; And why physicians were so cautious grown Of others' lives, and lavish of their own; How by a journey to the Elysian plain, Peace triumphed, and old time returned again.

Not far from that most celebrated place The Old Bailey Where angry Justice shews her awful face; Where little villains must submit to fate. That great ones may enjoy the world in state; There stands a dome, majestic to the sight, The College of Physicians And sumptuous arches bear its oval height; A golden globe, placed high with artful skill, Seems to the distant sight a gilded pill; This pile was, by the pious patron's aim, Raised for a use as noble as its frame: Nor did the learn'd society decline The propagation of that great design; In all her mazes, Nature's face they viewed, And, as she disappeared, their search pursued. Wrapt in the shade of night the goddess lies, Yet to the learn'd unveils her dark disguise, But shuns the gross access of vulgar eyes.

Now she unfolds the faint and dawning strife Of infant atoms kindling into life; How ductile matter new meanders takes, And slender trains of twisting fibres makes; And how the viscous seeks a closer tone, By just degrees to harden into bone; While the more loose flow from the vital urn, And in full tides of purple streams return; How lambent flames from life's bright lamps arise, And dart in emanations through the eyes; How from each sluice a gentle torrent pours, To slake a feverish heat with ambient showers; Whence their mechanic powers the spirits claim; How great their force, how delicate their frame: How the same nerves are fashioned to sustain The greatest pleasure and the greatest pain; Why bilious juice a golden light puts on, And floods of chyle in silver currents run; How the dim speck of entity began To extend its recent form, and stretch to man; . . . Why Envy oft transforms with wan disguise, And why gay Mirth sits smiling in the eyes; . . . Whence Milo's vigour at the Olympic's shewn, Whence tropes to Finch, or impudence to Sloane; How matter, by the varied shape of pores Or idiots frames or solemn senators.

Hence 'tis we wait the wondrous cause to find How body acts upon impassive mind; How fumes of wine the thinking part can fire, Past hopes revive, and present joys inspire; Why our complexions oft our soul declare, And how the passions in the feature are; How touch and harmony arise between Corporeal figure and a form unseen; How quick their faculties the limbs fulfil, And act at every summons of the will; With mighty truths, mysterious to descry, Which in the womb of distant causes lie.

But now no grand inquiries are descried; Mean faction reigns where knowledge should preside; Feuds are increased, and learning laid aside Thus synods oft concern for faith conceal, And for important nothings shew a zeal: The drooping sciences neglected pine, And Pæan's beams with fading lustre shine. No readers here with hectic looks are found Nor eyes in rheum, through midnight watching The lonely edifice in sweats complains That nothing there but sullen silence reigns.

This place, so fit for undisturbed repose,
The god of Sloth for his asylum chose;
Upon a couch of down in these abodes,
Supine with folded arms, he thoughtless no
Indulging dreams his godhead lull to ease,
With murmurs of soft rills, and whispering
The poppy and each numbing plant dispens
Their drowsy virtue and dull indolence;
No passions interrupt his easy reign,
No problems puzzle his lethargic brain:
But dark oblivion guards his peaceful bed,
And lazy fogs hang lingering o'er his head.

The poem proceeds to show how the slumbers of effectively and finally disturbed. The Sloane named s fully is the famous Sir Hans, who was one of the first to the Dispensary.

On Death.

'Tis to the vulgar death too harsh appears;
The ill we feel is only in our fears.
To die is landing on some silent shore,
Where billows never break, nor tempests ro
Ere well we feel the friendly stroke, 'tis o'er
The wise through thought the insults of deat
The fools through blest insensibility.
'Tis what the guilty fear, the pious crave;
Sought by the wretch, and vanquished by th
It eases lovers, sets the captive free,
And, though a tyrant, offers liberty.

Garth wrote the epilogue to Addison's of Cato, which ends with the following as:

Walsh (1663-1708) was the son of the manor of Abberley in Worcester-'adham College without a degree, and in nt to Parliament for his native county. Throughout life he supported the Whig and the Honoverian interest. Johnson honoured him with a place among the poets, though in his judgment he had 'more elegance than vigour,' and seldom rises higher than to be pretty. He was for a while Master of the Horse, and was a man of fashion, 'ostentatiously splendid in his dress.' He is known chiefly through his connection with Pope, whom, when still a young man, he helped with encouragement, advice, and criticism, for which Pope was very grateful. It was he who gave Pope the famous advice to try and be a correct poet, as this was now the only way of excellency. His own poems comprise pastorals, eclogues, imitations of Virgil and Horace, and a variety of love poems and occasional verses, some of them sprightly enough.

The Unrewarded Lover.

Let the dull merchant curse his angry fate, And from the winds and waves his fortune wait: Let the loud lawyer break his brains, and be A slave to wrangling coxcombs, for a fee: Let the rough soldier fight his prince's foes, And for a livelihood his life expose: I wage no war, I plead no cause but Love's; I fear no storms but what Celinda moves. And what grave censor can my choice despise? But here, fair charmer, here the difference lies: The merchant, after all his hazard's past, Enjoys the fruit of his long toils at last; The soldier high in his king's favour stands, And, after having long obey'd, commands; The lawyer, to reward his tedious care, Roars on the bench, that babbled at the bar: While I take pains to meet a fate more hard, And reap no fruit, no favour, no reward.

Written in a Lady's Table-book.

With what strange raptures would my soul be blest, Were but her book an emblem of her breast!

As I from that all former marks efface,
And, uncontrolled, put new ones in their place;
So might I chace all others from her heart,
And my own image in the stead impart.
But ah, how short the bliss would prove, if he
Who seized it next might do the same by me!

Death.

What has this bugbear Death that's worth our care?
After a life in pain and sorrow past,
After deluding hope and dire despair,
Death only gives us quiet at the last.

How strangely are our love and hate misplaced!
Freedom we seek, and yet from freedom flee;
Courting those tyrant sins that chain us fast,
And shunning Death, that only sets us free.

'Tis not a foolish fear of future pains,
(Why should they fear who keep their souls from stains?)
That makes me dread thy terrors, Death, to see:
'Tis not the loss of riches, or of fame,
Or the vain toys the vulgar pleasures name;
'Tis nothing, Cælia, but the losing thee.

Phyllis's Resolution.

When slaves their liberty require,
They hope no more to gain,
But you not only that desire,
But ask the power to reign.

Think how unjust a suit you make,
Then you will soon decline;
Your freedom when you please pray take,
But trespass not on mine.

No more in vain, Alcander, crave, I ne'er will grant the thing, That he who once has been my slave Should ever be my king.

John Dunton (1659-1733), son of the rector of Graffham, Hunts, was apprenticed to a London bookseller, and acquired much varied knowledge, in spite of love, politics, and other distractions. He took a shop, married happily, made some lucky ventures, but was involved in financial troubles as security for relatives. He visited America, Holland, and Cologne, settled with his creditors, and kept shop for ten years with fair prosperity, his Athenian Gazette (afterwards Athenian Mercury, 1691-97) being specially successful as one of the earliest journals devoted to answering correspondents. He wrote political pamphlets on the Whig side, satires, &c., to the number of forty, published six hundred books, and carried out a few of the 'six hundred projects' he cherished. He married a second time unhappily, and under the real and imaginary troubles of his later years his mind seems to have crossed the line between crackbrained flightiness and sheer lunacy, as may be gathered from his extraordinary Life and Errors of John Dunton (1705).

An abridgment of the Athensan Oracle, Dunton's own fourvolume selection of articles from the Athensan Mercury, was edited by John Underhill in 1892.

George Stepney (1663-1707) was one of Johnson's poets, reported in youth to have made grey authors blush,' but adjudged by Johnson to have 'little either of the grace of wit or the vigour of nature.' And time has confirmed this judgment: Stepney's poems figure in collections like Chalmers's British Poets, but nobody reads them, and his name is all but forgotten. Of Pembrokeshire stock, he was the son of a groom of the chamber to Charles II., became famous at Cambridge as a writer of Latin verse, and chose a diplomatic career. Than this envoy to the Emperor, to the Elector Palatine, the Electors of Brandenburg, Saxony, Mainz, Treves, and Cologne, and the Landgrave of Hesse, 'no Englishman knew the affairs of Germany so well and few Germans better.' His work is but small in volume. He made some free translations or imitations from Juvenal, Horace, and Ovid, praised William III. and Mary in neat and commonplace verses as he had done James II., and wrote 'occasional poems,' like so many of his contemporaries.

Dreams.

At dead of night imperial Reason sleeps, And Fancy with her train loose revels keeps; Then airy phantoms a mix'd scene display, Of what we heard, or saw, or wish'd by day; For memory those images retains Which passion form'd, and still the strongest re-Huntsmen renew the chace they lately run, And generals fight again their battles won. Spectres and furies haunt the murderer's dreams Grants or disgraces are the courtier's themes. The miser spies a thief, or a new hoard: The cit's a knight, the sycophant a lord. Thus fancy 's in the wild distraction lost, With what we most abhor or covet most. But of all passions that our dreams control, Love prints the deepest image in the soul .

John Pomfret (1667-1702) was the ! the rector of Luton, Bedfordshire, and him clergyman. In 1695 he became rector of Ma also in Bedfordshire, and had the prosp preferment; but the Bishop of London, at regarding as immoral in the mouth of a n clergyman the gently cynical wish to have n expressed in The Choice, considered and n the poetical candidate. Detained in London unsuccessful negotiation, Pomfret caught so and died. His works comprise occasional and some 'Pindaric Essays' in Cowley's m Cruelty and Lust, on Colonel Kirke's procee and Reason: a Poem upon the Divine Att The only piece of Pomfret's now remembers can hardly say read-is The Choice. Dr Jo said that perhaps no poem in our language been oftener perused; and Southey still aski Pomfret was the most popular among the I poets. It is difficult nowadays to conceiv The Choice could ever have been a truly ! poem. It is a graceful but tame and mone celebration, in neat verse, of the mild joy country retirement, a modest dwelling, with garden, and stream, a clear and competent and the enjoyment of lettered ease and has -a subject sufficiently often handled by Pocontemporaries; and Thomson and Cowp might have thought, would long ere So time have obliterated all but the dim n of Pomfret's commonplaces.

Matthew Prior.

The rset here found him once reading got his uncle to send the lad back ster; in 1681 he became a king's in 1683 was elected to a scholarship ; College, Cambridge. Here he disnimself, and amongst other verses, 87), in conjunction with Charles Monards Earl of Halifax), a no-popery the City Mouse and Country Mouse, Dryden's Hind and Panther, in which s somewhat as in the Rehearsal. The set subsequently obtained for him an as secretary to Lord Dursley, afterof Berkeley, ambassador to the Hague. Prior showed gifts unusual in successid secured the approbation of King o made him one of the gentlemen of the bedchamber. In 1697 he was appointed secretary to the embassy on the treaty of Ryswick; and next year he was secretary of embassy at Paris. Johnson relates that, viewing at Versailles Le Brun's pictures of the victories of Louis, Prior, on being asked whether the King of England's palace had any such decorations, happily replied: 'The monuments of my master's actions are to be seen everywhere but in his own house.' After his return to England Prior was appointed a Commissioner of Trade and Plantations. In 1701 he entered the House of Commons for the borough of East Grinstead, and abandoning his former friends, the Whigs, joined the Tories in impeaching Lord Somers. This came with a bad grace from Prior, for the charge against Somers was that he had advised that partition treaty in which the poet himself had had a share. He showed his patriotism by afterwards celebrating in verse the battles of Blenheim (1704) and Ramillies (1706). When the Whig Government was overturned, Prior became attached to Harley's administration, and went with Bolingbroke to France in 1711 to negotiate a treaty of peace. He lived in splendour in Paris, was a favourite of the French monarch, and enjoyed all the honours of ambassador. He was recalled, sore against his will, to London in 1715. Queen Anne being dead, and the Whigs again in office, Prior was committed to custody on a charge of high treason. The charge was that he had held clandestine conferences with the French plenipotentiary—though, as he justly replied, no treaty was ever made without private interviews and preliminaries; it was suggested, too, that Bolingbroke and he were intriguing for the Pretender. The Whigs were indignant at what they regarded as the disgraceful treaty of Utrecht; Prior only shared in the blame of the Government and the unpopularity of Bolingbroke. After two years' confinement, the poet was released without a trial. He had in the interval written his poem of Alma; and being now left without any other support than his fellowship of St John's, and very improvident to boot, he produced Solomon, the most elaborate of his works. He further issued a collected edition of his poems (1718), which was sold to subscribers for two guineas a copy and realised four thousand guineas. An equal sum was presented to Prior by Lord Oxford's son, Lord Harley, now Earl of Oxford, and thus he had laid up a provision for old age. He was now ambitious only of comfort and private enjoyment-or said so. Even these he did not long possess; he died on the 18th of September 1721, at Lord Harley's seat at Wimpole, in the fifty-eighth year of his age. The Duchess of Portland, Lord Harley's daughter, said Prior 'made himself beloved by every living thing in the house-master, child, and servant, human creature or animal.' To this lady as a child he had addressed his well-known verses beginning:

> My noble lovely little Peggy, Let this, my first epistle, beg ye,

At dawn of morn and close of even To lift your heart and hands to heaven: In double beauty say your prayer, 'Our Father' first, then 'Notre Père.'

He was said to have been fond of toping and of low company, and at the time of his death was, according to Arbuthnot, on the point of marrying a certain Bessy Cox, who kept an alehouse in Long Acre. To this person and to his secretary, Prior left his estate. Arbuthnot, writing to a friend the month after Prior's death, says: 'We are to have a bowl of punch at Bessy Cox's She would fain have put it upon Lewis that she was his (Prior's) Emma: she owned Flanders Jane was his Chloe.' To this doubtful Chloe some of his happiest verses were

They were but my visits, but thou art my home.

To Chloe was inscribed his Henry and Emma, a poem upon the model of the Nut-brown Maid; but in discarding the simplicity of the original, Prior sacrificed much of its charm.

The works of Prior range over a variety of styles and subjects-odes, songs, epistles, epigra tales; he was unquestionably versatile, tho always equal to himself in grace. His narratives flow on like i stream, without break or fall, and interest their perpetual good-humour and vivacity when they wander into metaphysics, as in or into coarseness, as in his tales-though] called Prior's works 'a lady's book.' The Secretary, The Female Phak the lines To a Child of Quality, all famous lifetime, were not included in the poems of Pope and Beattie praised four (unprinted) Dialogues of the Dead by him; an inte 'History of his own Time,' printed among works, is of doubtful authenticity. Prior, w tall and lank in person, and in manner somewhat solemn, was vain of his gifts, he constantly professed that his poetry w the accident of a busy life. An Epitaph.

Interred beneath this marble stone. Lie sauntering Jack and idle Joan. While rolling threescore years and one Did round this globe their courses run, If human things went ill or well, If changing empires rose or fell, The morning past, the evening came, And found this couple still the same. They walked and ate, good folks: What then? Why, then they walked and ate again; They soundly slept the night away; They did just nothing all the day . . . Nor sister either had nor brother; They seemed just tallied for each other. Their moral and economy Most perfectly they made agree; Each virtue kept its proper bound, Nor trespassed on the other's ground. Nor fame nor censure they regarded; They neither punished nor rewarded. He cared not what the footman did; Her maids she neither praised nor chid;

So every servant took his course, And, bad at first, they all grew worse. Slothful disorder filled his stable, And sluttish plenty decked her table. Their beer was strong, their wine was port; Their meal was large, their grace was short. They gave the poor the remnant meat, Just when it grew not fit to eat. They paid the church and parish rate, And took, but read not the receipt; For which they claimed their Sunday's due, Of slumbering in an upper pew. No man's defects sought they to know, So never made themselves a foe. No man's good deeds did they commend, So never raised themselves a friend. Nor cherished they relations poor, That might decrease their present store; Nor barn nor house did they repair, That might oblige their future heir. They neither added nor confounded; They neither wanted nor abounded . . . Nor tear nor smile did they employ At news of public grief or joy. When bells were rung and bonfires made, If asked, they ne'er denied their aid; Their jug was to the ringers carried, Whoever either died or married. Their billet at the fire was found, Whoever was deposed or crowned. Nor good, nor bad, nor fools, nor wise, They would not learn, nor could advise; Without love, hatred, joy, or fear, They led-a kind of-as it were; Nor wished, nor cared, nor laughed, nor cried; And so they lived, and so they died.

To a Child of Quality (one of the Dorset House), Five Years Old, the Author Forty. 1704.

Lords, knights, and squires, the numerous band
That wear the fair Miss Mary's fetters,
Were summoned by her high command
To shew their passion by their letters.

My pen amongst the rest I took,

Lest those bright eyes that cannot read
Should dart their kindling fires, and look
The power they have to be obeyed.

Nor quality nor reputation

Forbid me yet my flame to tell.

Dear five-years-old befriends my passion,

And I may write till she can spell.

For, while she makes her silkworms beds With all the tender things I swear; Whilst all the house my passion reads, In papers round her baby's hair;

She may receive and own my flame,
For though the strictest prudes should know it,
She'll pass for a most virtuous dame,
And I for an unhappy poet.

Then, too, alas! when she shall tear
The lines some younger rival sends;
She'll give me leave to write, I fear,
And we shall still continue friends.

For, as our different ages move,
'Tis so ordained (would Fate but mend it!)
That I shall be past making love,
When she begins to comprehend it.

Abra's Love for Solomon.

Another nymph, amongst the many fair That made my softer hours their solemn care, Before the rest affected still to stand, And watched my eye, preventing my command. Abra-she so was called-didst soonest haste To grace my presence; Abra went the last; Abra was ready ere I called her name; And, though I called another, Abra came. Her equals first observed her growing zeal, And laughing, glossed that Abra served so well. To me her actions did unheeded die. Or were remarked but with a common eye; Till, more apprised of what the rumour said, More I observed peculiar in the maid. The sun declined had shot his western ray, When tired with business of the solemn day, I purposed to unbend the evening hours, And banquet private in the women's bowers. I called before I sat to wash my hands-For so the precept of the law commands-Love had ordained that it was Abra's turn To mix the sweets and minister the urn. With awful homage, and submissive dread, The maid approached, on my declining head To pour the oils; she trembled as she poured; With an unguarded look she now devoured My nearer face; and now recalled her eye, And heaved, and strove to hide, a sudden sigh. 'And whence,' said I, 'canst thou have dread or pain?

What can thy imagery of sorrow mean?
Secluded from the world and all its care,
Hast thou to grieve or joy, to hope or fear?
For sure,' I added, 'sure thy little heart
Ne'er felt love's anger, or received his dart.'

Abashed she blushed, and with disorder spoke: Her rising shame adorned the words it broke:

'If the great master will descend to hear
The humble series of his handmaid's care;
O! while she tells it, let him not put on
The look that awes the nations from the throne!
O! let not death severe in glory lie
In the king's frown and terror of his eye!
Mine to obey, thy part is to ordain;
And, though to mention be to suffer pain,
If the king smile whilst I my woe recite,
If weeping, I find favour in his sight,
Flow fast my tears, full rising his delight,
O! witness earth beneath, and heaven above!
For can I hide it? I am sick of love;
If madness may the name of passion bear,
Or love be called what is indeed despair.

'Thou Sovereign Power, whose secret will controls The inward bent and motion of our souls! Why hast thou placed such infinite degrees Between the cause and cure of my disease? The mighty object of that raging fire, In which unpitied, Abra must expire. Had he been born some simple shepherd's he The lowing herd or fleecy sheep his care, At morn with him I o'er the hills had run, Scornful of winter's frost and summer's sun, Still asking where he made his flock to rest : For him at night, the dear expected guest, I had with hasty joy prepared the feast; And from the cottage, o'er the distant plain, Sent forth my longing eye to meet the swain Wavering, impatient, tossed by hope and fe Till he and joy together should appear, And the loved dog declare his master near. On my declining neck and open breast I should have lulled the lovely youth to rest, And from beneath his head, at dawning day With softest care have stol'n my arm away, To rise and from the fold release his sheep, Fond of his flock, indulgent to his sleep. Or if kind heaven, propitious to my flame-For sure from heaven the faithful ardour can Had blest my life, and decked my natal hou With height of title, and extent of power; Without a crime my passion had aspired, Found the loved prince, and told what I de: Then I had come, preventing Sheba's queen To see the comeliest of the sons of men, To hear the charming poet's amorous song, And gather honey falling from his tongue. Ode to a Lady:

She refusing to continue a Dispute with me, and leaving me in the Argument.

Spare, generous victor, spare the slave, Who did unequal war pursue; That more than triumph he might have In being overcome by you!

In the dispute whate'er I said,
My heart was by my tongue belied;
And in my looks you might have read
How much I argued on your side.

You, far from danger as from fear,
Might have sustained an open fight;
For seldom your opinions err,
Your eyes are always in the right.

Why, fair one, would you not rely
On reason's force with beauty's joined?
Could I their prevalence deny,
I must at once be deaf and blind.

Alas! not hoping to subdue,
I only to the fight aspired;
To keep the beauteous foe in view,
Was all the glory I desired.

But she, howe'er of victory sure, Contemns the wreath too long delayed; And, armed with more immediate power, Calls cruel silence to her aid.

Deeper to wound she shuns the fight;
She drops her arms to gain the field:
Secures her conquest by her flight;
And triumphs when she seems to yield.

So when the Parthian turned his steed, And from the hostile camp withdrew, With cruel skill the backward reed He sent, and as he fled he slew.

As, in a watch's fine machine, Though many artful springs are seen; The added movements, which declare How full the moon, how old the year, Derive their secondary power From that which simply points the hour: For though these gimcracks were away-Quare would not swear, but Quare would say-However more reduced and plain, The watch would still a watch remain: But if the horal orbit ceases. The whole stands still or breaks to pieces, Is now no longer what it was, And you may e'en go sell the case. So if unprejudiced you scan The goings of this clockwork, man, You find a hundred movements made By fine devices in his head; But 'tis the stomach's solid stroke That tells his being what 's o'clock. THE AGE OF QUEEN ANNE.

HE death of Dryden in 1700 and the appearance of Thomson's Winter in 1726 make the best boundary-marks for the so-called Augustan age of English literature, which is likewise styled the age of Anne, although it really includes also m of George I. It is true that the and influence of the greatest poet of od extended far beyond the latter limit, e lived on till near the middle of the and his Dunciad, Essay on Man, and were all produced during the reign of The same is true in a measure , who died a month after the battle of pans, as well as of some minor men like ose Fables and Beggar's Opera in their publication just overpass the line here Yet that line seems on the whole as sitrary as possible, since the appearance nson marks the beginning of the slow o nature in poetry, which, despite its g conventionalism, shows a nascent regainst the limited ideals of correctness ed with the name of Pope. Moreover, t bulk of the definitely Augustan litera-I been produced before the end of 1726. work of Addison and Steele, and all the work of Swift from the Tale of a Tub) Gulliver's Travels, as well as Pope's m Criticism, Rape of the Lock, and were given to the world within what ily the first quarter of the eighteenth ; and the same holds good of the novels e. It is perhaps not insignificant that ding line thus drawn in literature may ed also in the sphere of public affairs, ie few years before 1726 the generation men which had flourished under Queen nade way for their successors. Stanjunderland, Marlborough, and Cowper 1 between 1720 and 1723: in that latter erbury was exiled, and Bolingbroke exed by pardon and return from banishthile Oxford ended his days in 1724. se of the first twenty-six years of the ith century may be said, indeed, to coincide with the critical point of the transition from Pope and Swift to Thomson and Richardson and Fielding, and also from the contemporaries of Harley and St John to those of Walpole and the Pelhams.

The epithet Augustan, so often applied to the period of Oueen Anne, suggests a parallel with the age of Virgil and Horace which can only partially be justified. Assuredly there was no Virgil among the poets of eighteenth-century England, and if Pope may be accepted as all we have for an English Horace, he must be taken as but a maimed one at the best. With a sharper satiric genius than the Roman, and almost as shrewd a knowledge of human life and character, he has none of the geniality that delights us in the Epistles, and as little of the lyric charm that gives immortality to the Odes. The Horatian quality in the age of Queen Anne is to be sought rather in the work of Addison, and not in Addison's verse but in his prose. The papers of the Spectator, in their delightful and always genial mingling of humour, sature, and observation, show all the best of Horace's traits, except of course the purely poetical, while at the same time they are absolutely unstained by the characteristically Horatian blots. As for the sinister and solitary genius of Swift, there is no parallel to that in any literary age whatever. In the creator of the Struldbrugs and the Yahoos there was certainly little of that urbanity which is reckoned as a specially Augustan trait; and indeed the literary urbanity of the age of Anne is to be found less in the gracious tone of a polished civilisation than in an absorption in the artificial life of what had come to be called 'the town.' Virgil and Horace are always at home-and even most at home-in the country; but it is not so with Swift or Pope, or even, despite his Shepherd's Week of pastorals, with Gay. Here again, however, an exception must be made for Addison, who is as much at his ease in Worcestershire as in the Strand, and whose portrait of Sir Roger de Coverley recalls Horace's pictures of the farmers among the Samnite hills.

On the other hand, there are one or two particulars in which the age of Queen Anne on the literary side did really resemble that of Augustus. It was an age of comparative repose and contentment and prosperity after civil disquiet, and an age too in which letters were splendidly encouraged by the great. peculiar development of literary patronage due to the Revolution has been considered on a former page, and here it will suffice to say that in no other period has English literature owed so much to the imitators of Mæcenas; so that even Pope, who thanked Homer alone for his pecuniary independence, was indebted to Harley and St John for his social position, while Addison's essays procured him a Secretaryship of State. It has to be added, however, that the end of the period saw the decline of the political patronage of letters under Walpole's unromantic régime. That shrewd opportunist was quick to perceive that the consolidation of the Whig oligarchy had made literary aid superfluous to the administration. Not clever satire or pamphleteering but crafty political management was needed to sustain the Minister's majority, and so under Walpole English literature passed into those gloomy decades through which Fielding and Johnson struggled.

The statement that the age of Queen Anne was one of comparative repose and content may seem paradoxical in face of the fact that it was occupied by a long foreign war, by constant Jacobite intrigue, and by the conflict of fierce political factions. Yet the war, illustrated by the victories of Marlborough, was brilliantly successful, and served to overshadow the Jacobite intriguing, while the strife of Whigs and Tories, with all its bitterness, was far less violent than the civil broils of the later Stuart reigns or even of the time of William III. great majority of the people were undoubtedly more contented with their political lot than they had been since the years immediately succeeding the Restoration. They were ruled now not by a real or suspected Papist, or a Dutch intruder, but by a native sovereign of the old line, fervently attached to the national Church. The constitution and the succession had been settled. the danger from Scotland was peacefully avoided by the Union of 1707, and every year the Tower guns were sounding the news of glorious victories over the French. It would seem that the nation was really very little troubled by fears of Jacobitism, and it is significant at least that, so far as its abiding literature gives evidence, there might almost have been no such thing as Jacobitism at all. Of the Tory revivalpromoted largely perhaps by the publication of Lord Clarendon's great History in 1704-7there are traces in plenty, especially in the jeux d'esprit of Arbuthnot and the voluminous! pamphleteering of Swift, though even this revival has left no such mark on our literature as the terrible factions of Charles IL's time have done in the satires of Dryden. Jacobitism one must turn to the subterranean literature of the time—to secret memoirs and libellous broadsheets and clandestine comspondence, or at the best to such unread tracts of Defoe as And what if the Pretender should come? or Hannibal at the Gate. England in truth was almost as hopeful and as well satisfied with herself in the reign of Queen Anne as in the reign of Queen Victoria; and although her self-consciousness did not issue, as in the case of Augustan Rome, in a great national epic or history, it is sufficiently evident in the optimism of Pope, the easy good-humour of Addison, and even the mordant activity of Swift.

Passing from these general aspects to some of the particular features of the age, one may note that in poetry it consummated the effort after orderliness and correctness which bad followed as a natural reaction upon the licentious degeneracy of Elizabethan vigour. Of that consummation Pope of course was the grand agent, and his influence is seen in all the minor poets (some of them little more than his satellites) from Gay and Parnell down to Fenton and Broome. A fresh reaction against the excess of convention and correctness was of course inevitable, and the return to nature which at first and for long was made with reverent loyalty to the authority of Pope, has been discerned by some in the poems of the Countess of Winchilsea, who would thus be very small and early herald of Thomson. Is the drama the Restoration comic model lingered on in the work of Farquhar till 1707, bu was gradually supplanted by the sentiments comedy, wherein Steele, the first effectiv moraliser of the stage, was succeeded by Colle Tragedy was continued mainly b Cibber. Nicholas Rowe, a very much weaker and pure Otway; but the entire lack of aptitude for the poetic drama was most signally shown in Add son's Cato, the production of which, in th year of the Treaty of Utrecht, was one of it conspicuous literary events. Rowe and Addiso are far more notable in other regards-the on as the first critical editor of Shakespeare (fol ere long by Pope himself and Theobald), the other as the earliest popular and hetic critic of Milton. English literary in may almost be said to begin with ctator, which led the way in its attempt w and explain to intelligent men and at large the methods and merits of a English writer. The age, indeed, was ally though crudely critical, as beseemed ration that made correctness the main rirtue; and its bent in this direction is seen in the sallies of the Scriblerus Club, ter war of Pope against the dunces, and izies of Mr John Dennis.

w other prose-writers in different fields a word of notice. The works of Lord roke, one of the great political figures age, were mostly written and published terwards; but his Letter to Sir William am, composed in 1717, shows his essenratorical style almost at its best. In 1711 the third Lord Shaftesbury had published the Characteristics, a collection of philosophical essays in stately and somewhat too rhetorical Shaftesbury has often been ranked as one of the Deists, an active and notable band of controversialists in their day, though now half-forgotten. Their leaders were such men as Toland, Tindal, Woolston, and Anthony Collins, and their attacks on revelation raised a fierce controversy, which was begun by the Nonjuror Leslie so early as 1697, and culminated perhaps in the encounter of Anthony Collins and Bentley in 1713. The polemical monuments of Deism are not of great literary interest, but the movement is noteworthy as showing the change of the ecclesiastical battleground from the old question of Papal supremacy which had occupied the attention of combatants in the century before. important also because of the effect it had on French speculation through the agency of Voltaire, whose memorable sojourn in England began just at the end of this period, in 1726. A loftier and rarer spirit than most of those engaged in the Deistical controversy was Bishop Berkeley, famous in metaphysics as the exponent of an extreme idealism, but mentionable here mainly for the literary grace of dialogues like Hylas and Philonous, which are the most successful adaptations in our language of the manner and method of Plato. Externally the Church was strong, prosperous, and even aggressive in the reign of Queen Anne, while among its ministers were some of the most brilliant intellects of the age-notably Atterbury and Swift. It was already, however, very largely affected by a practical if not a dogmatic rationalism, which was to prevail for more than a century, until the romantic and Tractarian movements had ended the reign of common-sense. An eccentric but not an insignificant phenomenon was the career of the wayward Whiston, who managed to combine Arianism with supernaturalism, and was in consequence deprived of the Cambridge professorship, in which he had succeeded Newton. Outside the bounds of the Establishment the same rationalising tendency is apparent; and it was in the reign of Queen Anne that the Unitarian sect in England (not then consciously rationalist) had its beginning out of the isolated congregations—many of them Presbyterian which in the preceding half-century had left the Anglican Church.

Jonathan Swift.

It is not at all uncommon for the lives of men of letters to be comparatively uninteresting, or to possess interest only or mainly in connection with their works. But there are certain notable exceptions, and perhaps the greatest of these exceptions is the case of Jonathan Swift. One of the greatest names in English or in any literature, he presents likewise a 'human document' of the most interesting and in part puzzling kind; while he also exercised no small influence upon the public fortunes of his country as well as upon the private fates of his friends. He was born in Hoey's Court, Dublin, on 30th November 1667; he spent by far the greater part of his life in Ireland, and was most intimately and momentously connected with its affairs; yet he was only an Irishman by the accident of the time and place of his birth, and his characteristics were not in the slightest degree Irish-in fact, few of the distinguished men of the three kingdoms have been more thoroughly English in blood. The Swifts themselves were of Yorkshire origin, but Jonathan's grandfather was a royalist parson in Herefordshire, most active in the king's cause during the rebellion, and sorely punished by the triumphant party. He married Elizabeth Dryden, first cousin to the poet's father. who brought Cumberland and Northants blood into the strain; and Swift's own mother was Abigail Erick or Herrick, a kinswoman of the author of the Hesperides, and of a Leicestershire family who traced themselves back to the most distinguished Saxon ancestry. In the generation before Swift's birth his uncles had established themselves chiefly in Ireland; and his father obtained the position of Steward of the King's Inns in Dublin, but died before his son's birth, leaving his wife and a baby girl in very poor circumstances. Part of Swift's own infancy was passed with a nurse at Whitehaven, but he returned to Ireland at three years old, and was educated by his uncle Godwin at Kilkenny Grammar-school (the best in Ireland), with Congreve for a schoolfellow, and then a Trinity College, Dublin. It is said (with the confirmation of his own admissions, or rather frank assertions) that he showed not only no clevemes as a boy or young man, but not even the scatterbrained idleness which sometimes preludes genis.

It is at least interesting to note that his two great kinsmen on different sides of the tree were also very late in showing what was in them. At any rate, the termination of Swift's career at college mortifiel himself very much At Easter 168; be failed to, satisfy the examiners is two out of three necessary subjects —a failure which in the ordinary course would have apparently kept him back a whole vear. But a sort of back-door was provided special gratia, as it was called, for unfortunates in this plight; and Swift, it seems, was ≱ lowed to avail himself of it February 1686 He could hards

He had accuading; and for the last ten years acquired even more knowledge of ublished practically nothing, and had been given up to the writing of pseudo-'Pindaric' odes, which had, according to legend, brought down upon him the fatal and never-forgiven judgment of Dryden - 'Cousin Swift, you will never be a [Pindaric] poet.' The word 'Pindaric' does not appear in all versions of the legend, but it suits the facts, it justifies the judgment, and, above all, it makes it more likely to have come from Dryden, who was never harsh to the young. But Swift had before Temple's death written two things, though they were not published till later, which in degree of merit only three men then living-Dryden himself, Addison, and Popehad equalled or were to equal, and which in special kind none of them had rivalled or was to rival. These were The Battle of the Books and A Tale of a Tub.

How far these were known even in MS. is a matter of guesswork; but we find with Swift (as with some, though not many, other men of letters) that a queer kind of general impression of his talents had got abroad long before he had any ostensible titles to urge. But patrons were still necessary, and not long after Temple's death Swift went back to Ireland with the Deputy Lord Berkeley as chaplain, and with definite hopes of clerical preferment as such. He seems to have enjoyed himself-as his unsleeping and unyielding pride always enabled him to do after a fashion—in the viceregal household; but he was jockeyed out of one benefice after another till he had to put up with a paltry group of small livings-Laracor the chief of them-which lay not very far from Dublin, and which brought him in some £200 a year. Before long Stella, who was in a small way an heiress through Sir William Temple's bequest, came over to Ireland with her companion, Mrs (i.e. Miss) Dingley. She was continually in Swift's neighbourhood and society, though the most elaborate precautions were taken not merely to avoid scandal, but to make any ground for it impossible. For some years Swift oscillated between Ireland and England, belonging in a rather outside manner to the Whig party when in London, associating with its wits, especially Addison and Steele, and being patronised in a distant, unpractical way by its Mæcenates, Somers and Halifax. Whatever may be thought of his religious standpoint (and an impartial examination will find it very difficult to discover anything therein incompatible with at least eighteenth-century orthodoxy), his esprit de corps was undeniable; and he was enraged at finding that the more the Whigs succeeded in edging out their Tory colleagues from the coalition government with which Queen Anne started, the less were they disposed to do anything for the Church. In particular, a suit for the remission of the Irish first-fruits, with which Swift was semi-officially charged, was continually played with and evaded by the Whigs, especially Godolphin. Meanwhile Harley, who was certainly a master of intrigue if not of statesmanship, and St John, whose brilliancy appealed to, and was appealed to by, Swift, were overhauling their rivals on the very back-stairs by which those rivals had climbed to power. And at last Swift openly joined them. All talk of apostasy is here absurd, for neither of the party creeds was then formulated; and as Marlborough joined the Whigs when the Tories went against the war, so Swift joined the Tories when the Whigs would not help the Church.

His aid, however, was most momentous. the troubled four last years of the queen he first fought his friends into grip of power by his masterly journalism in the Examiner; then defended them in the great pamphlets of The Conduct of the Allies (1711), the Barrier Treaty (1712), and The Public Spirit of the Whigs (1714); and always was at hand to mitigate as far as possible their personal jars, to stimulate Harley's sluggishness, remedy Bolingbroke's levity, curb the rabid extremeness of the October Club, and introduce system and method and public spirit into the welter of jealousy, greed, and carelessness in which, from the Restoration downwards, both parties had wallowed. As for himself, he obtained, and just obtained, in the teeth of the scruples instilled into Anne's stupid piety by personal enemies, the sorry preferment of the Deanery of And he had no sooner obtained it · St Patrick's. than Oxford and Bolingbroke became hopelessly Swift, who had gone over to take at variance. possession of his deanery, came back after much entreaty in order to mediate, but found it quite impossible, and retired to a remote village on the Berkshire Downs (Letcombe) to wait for the end. That end is matter of history, though still to some extent matter of mystery also. Swift never seems to have been a Jacobite, though his intimate friends Arbythnot and Atterbury certainly were. queen's personal dislike for or distrust of him would in any case have prevented his having any say in the alleged intrigues for getting her to prefer her brother to the Elector of Hanover. He was much more a friend of Oxford, who was hardly a Jacobite at all, than of Bolingbroke, who at times was as 'thorough' as he could be on that side. On the other hand, the Duke of Shrewsbury -that strange, wavering king-maker-was, though of his friends, not of his most intimate friends; and of the two dukes whose invasion of the Privy Council decided the matter, he had stood with Argyll much as he did with Shrewsbury, till the attack on Scotland in The Public Spirit of the Whigs alienated Duke John altogether; while Somerset was the husband of his bitterest and most envenomed enemy. The situation had got out of his grasp altogether; and he seems at the last to have contemplated it with a sort of cynical resignation. And though he was practically exiled (for Ireland was always a foreign country to him), though he was for a time made a target for Grub Street abuse, as was to be expected, yet the helplessness of his later days under the queen protected him from any active molestation under the Elector-king—from the immediate prison of Oxford and Prior, as from the positive exile of Bolingbroke and Ormond and later of Atterbury. So finished the second period of Swift's life, which, despite the disappointment and defeat with which it closel, was not merely by far his happiest time, but might almost be called positively happy. Just after the beginning he obtained, and just before the end he secured, that independence of fortune which was absolutely the first of blessings to so prod a spirit. Throughout he possessed, in whatever strange conditions, the unstinted affection of Stelly the only person whom he ever really loved. And for the last year or two this affection was supple mented in a manner already somewhat emberassing, and destined to be more so, but flattering and undoubtedly pleasant, by that of the other Esther—'Vanessa'—i.e. Miss Vanhomrigh, as the 'Cadenus' of the poem that has made her inmortal is 'Decanus'-i.e. Swift. During almost the whole time he had abundance of intellected companionship, and during the latter part of it such power and influence in the State as few men letters have ever achieved—power, too, which not lost by his own fault, as has usually happend in these few cases. Even up to this time he bal published little, and most of that little anonmously. But his position of 'the greatest genis of the nation,' which the clear and competed judgment, even more than the not then estranged friendship, of Addison had assigned to him year before, would have been allowed, it seems, ms merely by most of his friends, but by many of his enemies.

His third and last stage was a long one-long indeed than even the first. It was free from some of the hardships which had beset that earlier time; it set him, if possible, higher—it certainly strengthened his position as a man of letters; but it lay from the first in the valley of the shadow, and the shadows deepened to their very darkest before its close. On his first return to Ireland after the downfall of the Tories and the establishment the Hanoverian succession, Swift was extremely unpopular; and watch was laid in high quarter= though vainly, to see if he could be entangled is charges of treason. The deanery was encumbered and the promise of a sum of money to clear the encumbrances fell through with the Tory fall But courage, wariness, and parsimony saw Swif through all these things. It is not long afterward (in 1716) that tradition places his actual marries with Stella, a marriage formal but in no was: altering the relations between them. We have certain evidence of this marriage, and it has be argued about with the voluminousness and the unnecessary violence which are often displayed of such things. It is sufficient to say that the quality and amount of such testimony as does exist, though it falls short of legal proof, is immensely in its favour, and would probably be regarded—in any case which did not excite partisanship one way or s morally decisive. But as it was not was of no help to Swift in the compli-Vanessa, who followed him to Ireland ned herself at a house of hers not far -complications which, also in some of resting on evidence probable only, and must have been great. This y, a figure not so attractive as her be pitied quia multum amavit, died 1 the interval Swift-whether out of h patriotism, or to revenge himself on s a moot point-had been working up ck against the undoubted misdeeds of wernment; and a year later the best ras given to him by the affair called Ifpence.' The idlest attempts have y his detractors to lessen the scandal It will probably be sufficient, even for re not prone to listen to 'Irish grievention two simple facts. At any rate, Swift natter in the famous Drapier's Letters infra), and, not without some slight k, beat the Government completely, ereby the idol of Ireland. Not long n 1726 and 1727, he made visits to his ingland, and these visits not merely friendship anew, but were fruitful in This was the time when Gulliver's eared. Moreover, Swift's genius had remarkable for its suggestive and power over his friends, and there is at both the Beggar's Opera and the ed something, perhaps much, to him. realth had been breaking for some time, 1 in 1728, shortly after his return from Of the world-famous inscription, man's hair,' on a lock of hers in his sufficient to say that there have been parently possessing heads, who have ft with wanting a heart. He outlived ly twenty years, and probably wroteplished-some of his most characterisiant work: the Modest Proposal (see of the very apices of the irony of the charming Polite Conversation, almost I in its satire on society; the verses, in .r way consummate, 'On the Death of thapsody of Poetry,' and 'Legion Club,' rtually though not technically authenti-'Last Judgment.' But the mysterious h had afflicted his whole life, which he lown to some ailment of the stomach, now held to have been a local affection not necessarily affecting the brain, was increasing, and, aided by disappointment, bereavement, and the 'fierce indignation' which in the happiest circumstances and highest health would probably have still been fated to him, made his life more and more of a misery. At last its ravages gained the brain itself; and after some five years, sometimes of hideous torture, sometimes of apathetic vacancy, a series of epileptic fits ended in his death on October 19, 1745. He lies buried, with Stella, in his cathedral; and the Latin inscription written by himself still records that sava indignatio which is an undoubted psychological and historical fact, and which perhaps wisdom will join with charity in bidding us not too hastily to condemn as a moral fault. An intelligent passerby, like him who has secured immortality for himself in the case of Ben Jonson, might have added Addison's verdict forty years before—'The greatest genius of the nation.'

Of his character no adequate discussion, or even summary, is possible in a small space. To those who would reduce all human nature to a set of probable types, acting consciously in accordance with or deliberately against certain accepted moral rules and intellectual principles, it must always be an insoluble enigma or a shocking deformity and abnormality. To those who like cheap and glaring antitheses it is an easy prey. But those who are content to admit infinite diversity, plus in at least many cases not a little mystery, in human character, will find Swift not at all astounding except in his genius, and only incomprehensible as great things and persons usually are. It may, however, be permitted to dissent from some high authorities who assert his entire sanity before the last breakdown. In the discernment of right from wrong, and in the co-ordination of action to consequence, he was no doubt as sane as the sanest. But the too famous 'coarseness' (for which coarseness itself is a word too fine) of his ideas and language has rather horribly suggestive analogies in some symptoms of insanity itself, and the suggestion is repeated in other traits of his character. At any rate, one famous saying would not here be out, for of the greatness of the wits allied to this madness no one himself possessing wit however small can doubt.

These wits were shown both in prose and in verse; but admirable as are some of Swift's verses, it cannot be said that those are wholly wrong who maintain that even the widest form of Dryden's alleged sentence, 'You will never be a poet,' Pindaric or other, was justified. Not only does Swift never attain the finest, rarest, most charming strokes of poetry, but it can hardly be said that his very best things (with the possible exception of the 'Last Judgment,' where the light style of the medium and the tremendous gravity of the sense create the most marvellously effective discord) gain very much from their poetic form. Swift has made them capital in poetry; he could have made them as capital, though in a slightly different way, in prose. Rash as it is to generalise about things poetical, it is scarcely rash to say that with real poetry this never happens.

His prose is a very different matter. Unlike his verse, the relative perfection of the lighter kinds of which was led up to by unsuccessful apprenticeship in the severer, this prose seems to have come to Swift almost at once. We have nothing of the slightest importance of his earlier than A Tale of a Tub, which, though not published till later, seems to have been written in whole or in part at Kilroot in 1695. And in A Tale of a Tub Swift's style and his thought are both sent out full-grown, fully armed, indissolubly linked, distinguished from everything else in literature. Both suggest Lucian more than anybody else; but the differences are even greater than the likeness. 'The folly of it' almost sums up Lucian's view; and that folly affects him with nothing stronger or more unpleasant than amusement. Swift's amusement exists, but it is sardonic from the outset, and it passes quickly into contempt, indignation, furious abhorrence. true that in the Tale these later stages are only seen afar off, not fully present as in the later parts of Gulliver, and still more in the verses of his closing years. But at no period does his style alter much. It has from the first that impalpable but intense individuality which is quite independent of mannerism. Swift was a great purist, as is shown in his early and excellent rebuke, through the Tatler, of the slipshod vulgarity which threatened English at the close of the seventeenth century. His own grammar has been found fault with—as indeed has Addison's; but a remark made above as to Dryden applies here too, and Swift even more than Addison is also entitled to the Thucydidean excuse of 'construction according to the meaning.' That meaning is always transparently clear, though it has an almost preternatural power (the source of his triumphant irony) of allowing a quite different meaning to be seen through and behind the literal and grammatical sense. It is ostentatiously plain in diction-with a plainness which some have been unlucky enough to take for meanness. But it combines the sharpness of Saladin's scimitar with the crushing force of Cœur-de-Lion's mace.

These characteristics do not appear eminently in Swift's first published prose work of any importance, the Discourse of the Contests and Dissensions between the Nobles and Commons in Athens and Rome (1701), though this is very valuable both historically and as giving light on Swift's serious political views. They appear most eminently in the anonymous volume of 1704 which contained A Tale of a Tub (at first not with all its appurtenances) and The Battle of the Books. By this volume, in a manner which not quite seldom happens, but to an extent which is very rare, Swift is 'constituted.' The shorter and less important Battle of the Books is in scheme an attempt to help his patron Temple out of the scrape into which he had got by meddling with the 'Anciest and Modern' quarrel without any sufficient asquaintance with the facts (see Vol. I. p. 754) Substantively it is of course worthless—the mee allotting of the parts of defender of the ancients Temple, and of champion of the upstart moderns to Bentley, speaks for itself. But as a piece of light horse advocacy it is superb and almost supreme The strokes are incessant, and every stroke tell The Tale, very much less easy to define, and less complete on any definition, flies far higher and on a longer and stronger wing, though we may be uncertain of its exact destination. As far as it has any single theme, that theme is satire on the warring and jarring divisions of political Christianity in Swift's time. 'Peter' (Rome) and 'Jad'. (Presbyterianism and the Protestant sects generally) are most hardly treated, though 'Martin' (Lutheranism, with more special reference to the Anglica Church) by no means escapes. But the piece melts and shades off into a vast if rather vage ironic survey of human beliefs, principles, creek, and habits generally, in which the still outward restrained but inwardly all-pervading misanthron of the author finds consummate expression. Ms anthropy, be it most definitely repeated. The consistency of the writer's temper with any recognised form of piety may be questioned; but he's no misotheos, however inexplicable the constitution of the world by the Divinity may seem to him, and however roughly he may handle systems of theology. Side-lights on the life and character of Swift will be found in the articles in this work dealing with friends, enemies, and contemporaries, such as Temple in the first volume, and Arbubnot, Pope, Gay, Steele, and others in the present.

For some twenty years after 1704 Swift's production, though never long intermitted, included no one thing that can be called a book, but consisted of pamphlets and articles, sometimes serious, sometimes continuing his campaign of irony. The most important in the order of time are the admirable Argument against abolishing Christianity (1708). the masterpiece, with the Modest Proposal, of this latter method among his smaller things, as A Tele of a Tub and Gulliver are among his greater; the quaint persecution of Partridge the almanac-maker (about the same time) by a series of 'skits' first predicting the poor man's death, then describing it, and at last calmly reaffirming it against his protests; the miscellaneous contributions to The Tatler (1709-10); the political articles in The Examiner (1710-11); the great pamphlets above referred to (1711-14); and a cluster of retro spective papers on the Tory collapse, with a fuller History of the Four Last Years of Queen Aume, which he quite certainly wrote, but which was never published till after his death, and has in its published form been rather unreasonably doubted The development of the new line of attack against the Whigs in Ireland turned his pamphleteering into a new political channel, while

In the two earlier divisions unts of Lilliput, where men's height is our foot, and of Brobdingnag, where it for our inch—the satire on humanity atively good-humoured; the absurdity n the malignity of man is the thing isted upon. In the third the attack dants and 'projectors' of Laputa and grows much more savage; while the escription of the Struldbrugs or decrepit of Luggnagg shows us not only what :00 truly feared for himself, but one of i for detesting humanity. Then in the , the description of the Houyhnhnms s, the batteries are shifted, and it is no the folly and feebleness of man but at and almost devilish corruption that they Perhaps the picture, which Swift hold up to contrasted admiration, of hnhnm character — sensible, orderly, it utterly without passion or enthusiasm l—is more really depressing than even the baboon-like bestiality of his male and female Yahoos. As a whole, however, the book, with the possible exception of the Struldbrug passage, is much too amusing to depress at all. Dullness (especially German dullness) has picked out this and that reminiscence of or similarity to preceding work, especially that of Cyrano de Bergerac; but this is usual and negligible. There is no more original work of genius in literature than Gulliver's Travels.

The only two pieces still requiring mention (of about a hundred credited to him) are Polite Con-[versation (1738) and the Directions to Servants, the latter not published except posthumously. piece, though very amusing in parts, and a wonderful instance of that microscopic observation which had so much to do with Swift's success, is at best a little trivial, and at worst spoilt by the nastiness which is his greatest weakness. But the Polite Conversation is perfectly charming. Purporting to be the talk of a fashionable set in London during something like the double round of the clock, it not merely abounds with strokes of humour, not merely hits types and ways which exist very little changed to-day, but clothes those types with dramatic individualities in a fashion never indulged in by Swift elsewhere. Even Lemuel Gulliver is but an eidolon compared with 'Miss' and Tom Neverout, Lady Smart and the Colonel. Everywhere, or almost everywhere, else Swift's comedy turns, or seems constantly on the point of turning, either to the sternest tragedy or at least to acrimonious invective. Here, keen as is the rapier and unerring as is the artist's fence, he never exactly takes off the button that keeps it a harmless foil.

Yet if not the greatest, the most unique, the most charming, the most pathetic, the most varied in appeal of Swift's works remains to be mentioned, and that is what he never meant for a work at allthe Journal to Stella. This consists of the budgets of diary-letters which he sent to his beloved and her companion (for this strange etiquette of the third person was kept up even here) during his momentous stay in London during the last years of the queen (2nd September 1710 to 6th June As vivid as Pepys, shot through and through by the light of an intellect beside which that of the good, or at least agreeable, Clerk of the Acts is a mere farthing candle, dealing with matters of the greatest historical and social interest publicly, and revealing in private one of the strangest tragi-comedies in the great theatre of Love, diversified by the extraordinary 'little language' or baby jargon which Swift sprinkles here and there as a sort of caress to his correspondent, this wonderful book even by itself defies the existence of anything like a second to it. But standing as it does between the Tale and Gulliver, it completes, as nothing else possibly could, the evidence of the greatness and the strangeness of its author's genius.

From 'Cadenus and Vanessa.'

But Cupid, full of mischief, longs To vindicate his mother's wrongs. On Pallas all attempts are vain: One way he knows to give her pain; Vows on Vanessa's heart to take Due vengeance, for her patron's sake; Those early seeds by Venus sown, In spite of Pallas now were grown; And Cupid hop'd they would improve By time, and ripen into love. The boy made use of all his craft, In vain discharging many a shaft, Pointed at colonels, lords, and beaux: Cadenus warded off the blows; For, placing still some book betwixt, The darts were in the cover fix'd, Or, often blunted and recoil'd, On Plutarch's Morals struck, were spoil'd.

The Queen of Wisdom could foresee, But not prevent, the Fates' decree:

She fancies music in his tongue; Nor further looks, but thinks him your What mariner is not afraid To venture in a ship decay'd? What planter will attempt to yoke A sapling with a falling oak? As years increase, she brighter shines; Cadenus with each day declines: And he must fall a prey to time, While she continues in her prime. Cadenus, common forms apart, In every scene had kept his heart; Had sigh'd and languish'd, vow'd and ws For pastime, or to show his wit; But books, and time, and state affairsi Had spoil'd his fashionable airs: He now could praise, esteem, approve, But understood not what was love. His conduct might have made him styl'd A father, and the nymph his child. That innocent delight he took To see the virgin mind her book, Was but the master's secret joy In school to hear the finest boy. Her knowledge with her fancy grew; She hourly press'd for something new; Ideas came into her mind So fast, his lessons lagg'd behind;

She reason'd, without plodding long, Nor ever gave her judgment wrong. But now a sudden change was wrought: She mainds no longer what he taught. Cademus was amaz'd to find Such marks of a distracted mind: For though she seem'd to listen more To all he spoke than e'er before, He found her thoughts would absent range, Yet guess'd not whence could spring the change. And first he modestly conjectures His pupil might be tir'd with lectures; Which help'd to mortify his pride, Yet gave him not the heart to chide: But in a mild dejected strain, At last he ventur'd to complain: Said she should be no longer teaz'd, Might have her freedom when she pleas'd: Was mow convinc'd he acted wrong To hade her from the world so long, And im dull studies to engage One of her tender sex and age: That every nymph with envy own'd, How she might shine in the grande monde; And every shepherd was undone To see her cloister'd like a nun. This was a visionary scheme: He wak'd, and found it but a dream, A Project far above his skill; For Pature must be nature still. If he were bolder than became A scholar to a courtly dame, She might excuse a man of letters: tutors often treat their betters: since his talk offensive grew, He came to take his last adieu. anessa, fill'd with just disdain, Ould still her dignity maintain, I restructed from her early years scorn the art of female tears. Had he employ'd his time so long To teach her what was right and wrong; Yet could such notions entertain That all his lectures were in vain? She own'd the wandering of her thoughts; But he must answer for her faults. She well remember'd to her cost That all his lessons were not lost. Two maxims she could still produce, And sad experience taught their use; That virtue, pleas'd by being shown, Knows nothing which it dares not own: Can make us without fear disclose Our inmost secrets to our foes: That common forms were not design'd Directors to a noble mind. Now, said the nymph, to let you see My actions with your rules agree; That I can vulgar forms despise, And have no secrets to disguise; I knew, by what you said and writ, How dangerous things were men of wit; You caution'd me against their charms, But never gave me equal arms; Your lessons found the weakest part. Aim'd at the head, but reach'd the heart. 61

Cadenus felt within him rise Shame, disappointment, guilt, surprise. He knew not how to reconcile Such language with her usual style: And yet her words were so exprest, He could not hope she spoke in jest. His thought had wholly been confin'd To form and cultivate her mind. He hardly knew, till he was told, Whether the nymph were young or old; Had met her in a public place, Without distinguishing her face: Much less could his declining age Vanessa's earliest thoughts engage; And, if her youth indifference met, His person must contempt beget: Or grant her passion be sincere, How shall his innocence be clear? Appearances were all so strong, The world must think him in the wrong: Would say he made a treacherous use Of wit to flatter and seduce : The town would swear he had betray'd By magic spells the harmless maid: And every beau would have his jokes, That scholars were like other folks; And when Platonic flights were over, The tutor turn'd a mortal lover! So tender of the young and fair! It show'd a true paternal care-Five thousand guineas in her purse! The doctor might have fancy'd worse.—

Hardly at length he silence broke, And falter'd every word he spoke; Interpreting her complaisance, Just as a man sans consequence. She rallied well, he always knew: Her manner now was something new; And what she spoke was in an air As serious as a tragic player. But those who aim at ridicule Should fix upon some certain rule, Which fairly hints they are in jest, Else he must enter his protest: For, let a man be ne'er so wise, He may be caught with sober lies; A science which he never taught, And, to be free, was dearly bought; For, take it in its proper light, 'Tis just what coxcombs call a bite.

But, not to dwell on things minute, Vanessa finish'd the dispute; Brought weighty arguments to prove That reason was her guide in love. She thought he had himself describ'd, His doctrines when she first imbib'd; What he had planted, now was grown; His virtues she might call her own; As he approves, as he dislikes, Love or contempt her fancy strikes. Self-love, in nature rooted fast, Attends us first, and leaves us last: Why she likes him, admire not at her; She loves herself, and that's the matter. How was her tutor wont to praise The geniuses of ancient days!

(Those authors he so oft had nam'd, For learning, wit, and wisdom fam'd;) Was struck with love, esteem, and awe, For persons whom he never saw. Suppose Cadenus flourish'd then, He must adore such godlike men. If one short volume could comprise All that was witty, learn'd, and wise, How would it be esteem'd and read, Although the writer long were dead! If such an author were alive, How all would for his friendship strive, And come in crowds to see his face! And this she takes to be her case. Cadenus answers every end, The book, the author, and the friend; The utmost her desires will reach. Is but to learn what he can teach: His converse is a system fit Alone to fill up all her wit: While every passion of her mind In him is cent'red and confin'd.

Love can with speech inspire a mute, And taught Vanessa to dispute. This topic, never touch'd before, Display'd her eloquence the more: Her knowledge, with such pains acquir'd, By this new passion grew inspir'd; Through this she made all objects pass, Which gave a tincture o'er the mass; As rivers, though they bend and twine, Still to the sea their course incline; Or, as philosophers who find Some favourite system to their mind, In every point to make it fit, Will force all nature to submit. Cadenus, who could ne'er suspect His lessons would have such effect, Or be so artfully apply'd, Insensibly came on her side. It was an unforeseen event; Things took a turn he never meant. Whoe'er excels in what we prize, Appears a hero in our eyes: Each girl, when pleas'd with what is taught, Will have the teacher in her thought. When miss delights in her spinnet, A fiddler may a fortune get; A blockhead, with melodious voice, In boarding-schools may have his choice; And oft the dancing-master's art Climbs from the toe to touch the heart. In learning let a nymph delight, The pedant gets a mistress by 't. Cadenus, to his grief and shame, Could scarce oppose Vanessa's flame; And, though her arguments were strong, At least could hardly wish them wrong. Howe'er it came, he could not tell, But sure she never talk'd so well. His pride began to interpose; Preferr'd before a crowd of beaux! So bright a nymph to come unsought! Such wonder by his merit wrought! 'Tis merit must with her prevail! He never knew her judgment fail!

She noted all she ever read!

And had a most discerning head!

'Tis an old maxim in the schools,
That flattery's the food of fools;
Yet now and then your men of wit
Will condescend to take a bit.

So, when Cadenus could not hide. He chose to justify his pride; Construing the passion he had shown, Much to her praise, more to his own. Nature in him had merit plac'd, In her a most judicious taste. Love, hitherto a transient guest, Ne'er held possession of his breast; So long attending at the gate, Disdain'd to enter in so late. Love why do we one passion call, When 'tis a compound of them all? Where hot and cold, where sharp and swe In all their equipages meet; Where pleasures mix'd with pains appear,-Sorrow with joy, and hope with fear; Wherein his dignity and age Forbid Cadenus to engage. But friendship, in its greatest height, A constant, rational delight, On virtue's basis fix'd to last, When love allurements long are past, Which gently warms, but cannot burn, He gladly offers in return; His want of passion will redeem With gratitude, respect, esteem: With that devotion we bestow, When goddesses appear below.

While thus Cadenus entertains Vanessa in exalted strains, The nymph in sober words entreats A truce with all sublime conceits: For why such raptures, flights, and fancie To her who durst not read romances? In lofty style to make replies, Which he had taught her to despise? But when her tutor will affect Devotion, duty, and respect, He fairly abdicates the throne: The government is now her own; He has a forfeiture incurr'd; She vows to take him at his word, And hopes he will not think it strange. If both should now their stations change; The nymph will have her turn to be The tutor; and the pupil, he: Though she already can discern Her scholar is not apt to learn; Or wants capacity to reach The science she designs to teach; Wherein his genius was below The skill of every common beau, Who, though he cannot spell, is wise Enough to read a lady's eyes, And will each accidental glance Interpret for a kind advance. But what success Vanessa mei

St John, as well as Pulteney, knows
That I had some repute for prose;
And, till they drove me out of date,
Could maul a minister of state.
If they have mortified my pride,
And made me throw my pen aside;
If with such talents heaven hath blest 'em,
Have I not reason to detest 'em?

To all my foes, dear Fortune, send Thy gifts, but never to my friend: I tamely can endure the first; But this with envy makes me burst.

Thus much may serve by way of proem;

Proceed we therefore to our poem. The time is not remote, when I Must by the course of nature die; When, I foresee, my special friends Will try to find their private ends: And, though 'tis hardly understood. Which way my death can do them good, Yet thus, methinks, I hear them speak: 'See, how the dean begins to break! Poor gentleman! he droops apace! You plainly find it in his face. That old vertigo in his head Will never leave him till he 's dead. Besides his memory decays: He recollects not what he says: He cannot call his friends to mind: Forgets the place where last he dined; Plies you with stories o'er and o'er-He told them fifty times before. How does he fancy we can sit To hear his out-of-fashion wit? But he takes up with younger folks. Who for his wine will bear his jokes. Faith, he must make his stories shorter, Or change his comrades once a quarter: In half the time he talks them round, There must another set be found.

'For poetry he's past his prime; He takes an hour to find a rhyme: His fire is out, his wit decayed, His fancy sunk, his Muse a jade. I'd have him throw away his pen— But there's no talking to some men.'

And then their tenderness appears
By adding largely to my years:
'He's older than he would be reckoned,
And well remembers Charles the Second.
He hardly drinks a pint of wine;
And that, I doubt, is no good sign.
His stomach, too, begins to fail;
Last year we thought him strong and hale;
But now he's quite another thing;
I wish he may hold out till spring.'
They hug themselves and reason thus:
'It is not yet so bad with us.'

In such a case they talk in tropes,
And by their fears express their hopes.
Some great misfortune to portend
No enemy can match a friend.
With all the kindness they profess,
The merit of a lucky guess
(When daily Hov-d'ye's come of course,
And servants answer: 'Worse and worse!')

Afterwards Lords Bolingbroke and Bath Would please them better than to tell, That, 'God be praised! the dean is well.' Then he who prophesied the best, Approves his foresight to the rest: 'You know I always feared the worst, And often told you so at first.' He'd rather choose that I should die, Than his prediction prove a lie. Not one foretells I shall recover, But all agree to give me over.

Yet should some neighbour feel a pain Just in the parts where I complain, How many a message would he send! What hearty prayers that I should mend! Inquire what regimen I kept? What gave me ease, and how I slept? And more lament when I was dead, Than all the snivellers round my bed.

My good companions, never fear; For, though you may mistake a year, Though your prognostics run too fast, They must be verified at last.

Behold the fatal day arrive! How is the dean? 'He's just alive.' Now the departing prayer is read; 'He hardly breathes.' 'The dean is dead.'

Before the passing-bell begun,
The news through half the town is run;
'Oh! may we all for death prepare!
What has he left? and who's his heir?'
'I know no more than what the news is;
'Tis all bequeathed to public uses.'
'To public uses! there's a whim!
What had the public done for him?
Mere envy, avarice, and pride:
He gave it all—but first he died.
And had the dean in all the nation
No worthy friend, no poor relation?
So ready to do strangers good,
Forgetting his own flesh and blood!'...

Now Curll his shop from rubbish drains: Three genuine tomes of Swift's Remains! And then to make them pass the glibber, Revised by Tibbalds, Moore, and Cibber. He'll treat me as he does my betters, Publish my will, my life, my letters; Revive the libels born to die, Which Pope must bear, as well as I.

Here shift the scene, to represent
How those I love my cleath lament.
Poor Pope will grieve a month, and Gay
A week, and Arbuthnot a day.
St John himself will scarce forbear
To bite his pen, and drop a tear.
The rest will give a shrug, and cry:
'I'm sorry—but we all must die!'...

One year is past; a different scene!

No further mention of the dean,
Who now, alas! no more is missed,
Than if he never did exist.

Where's now this favourite of Apollo?

Departed: and his works must follow;
Must undergo the common fate;
His kind of wit is out of clate.

True genuine dulness mov'd his pity, Unless it offer'd to be witty. Those who their ignorance confest, He ne'er offended with a jest; But laughed to hear an idiot quote A verse from Horace learn'd by rote.

'He knew a hundred pleasing stories, With all the turns of Whigs and Tories: Was cheerful to his dying day; And friends would let him have his way.

'He gave the little wealth he had To build a house for fools and mad; And show'd by one satiric touch, No nation wanted it so much. That kingdom he hath left his debtor, I wish it soon may have a better.'

Curll was the Dean's pet aversion, the bookseller who published bogus pieces in Swift's name; Tibbalds is Theobald, the editor of Shakespeare; Moore, James Moore (afterwards J. Moore Smythe), a forgotten dramatist satirised in the Dunciad; Stephen Duck, a farm-labourer who took to rhyming and was patronised by Queen Caroline; 'Orator Henley' was a quack preacher; The Crastsman was a political periodical, organ of the opposition to Walpole; Sir Robert is Walpole; Colonel Francis Charteris was infamous (see Arbuthnot's epitaph, page 146); the six hundred pounds refers to proclamations offering that sum for the discovery of the author of two of Swift's pamphlets; Wood was the 'destructive cheat.'

Mrs Frances Harris's Petition, 1700.

To their excellencies the Lords Justices of Ireland, The humble petition of Frances Harris, Who must starve and die a maid if it miscarries; Humbly sheweth, that I went to warm myself in Lady Betty's chamber, because I was cold;

And I had in a purse seven pounds, four shillings, and sixpence, besides farthings, in money and gold;

So because I had been buying things for my lady last night,

I was resolv'd to tell my money, to see if it was right. Now, you must know, because my trunk has a very bad lock.

Therefore all the money I have, which, God knows, is a very small stock,

I keep in my pocket, tied about my middle, next my smock.

So when I went to put up my purse, as God would have it, my smock was unripp'd,

And instead of putting it into my pocket, down it slipp'd; Then the bell rung, and I went down to put my lady to

And, God knows, I thought my money was as safe as my maidenhead.

So, when I came up again, I found my pocket feel very

But when I search'd, and miss'd my purse, Lord! I thought I should have sunk outright.

'Lord! madam,' says Mary, 'how d' ye do?'- 'Indeed,' says I, 'never worse:

But pray, Mary, can you tell what I have done with my purse?'

'Lord help me!' says Mary, 'I never stirr'd out of this place!'

'Nay,' said I, 'I had it in Lady Betty's chamber, that's a plain case.'

So Mary got me to bed, and cover'd me up warm:

However, she stole away my garters, that I might do myself no harm.

So I tumbled and toss'd all night, as you may very well think,

But hardly ever set my eyes together, or slept a wink.

So I was a dream'd, methought, that I went and search'd the folks round,

And in a corner of Mrs Dukes's box, tied in a rag, the money was found.

So next morning we told Whittle, and he fell a swearing: Then my dame Wadger came; and she, you know, is thick of hearing.

'Dame,' said I, as loud I could bawl, 'do you know what a loss I have had?'

'Nay,' said she, 'my Lord Colway's folks are all very sad:

For my Lord Dromedary comes a Tuesday without fail.' 'Pugh!' said I, 'but that's not the business that I ail.'

Says Cary, says he, 'I have been a servant this five and twenty years, come spring,

And in all the places I liv'd I never heard of such a thing.'

'Yes,' says the steward, 'I remember when I was at my Lady Shrewsbury's,

Such a thing as this happen'd, just about the time of gooseberries.'

So I went to the party suspected, and I found her full of grief:

(Now, you must know, of all things in the world, I hate a thief:)

However, I was resolv'd to bring the discourse slily about:

'Mrs Dukes,' said I, 'here's an ugly accident has happen'd out:

'Tis not that I value the money three skips of a louse; But the thing I stand upon is the credit of the house.

'Tis true, seven pounds, four shillings, and sixpence makes a great hole in my wages:

Besides, as they say, service is no inheritance in these ages.

Now, Mrs Dukes, you know, and every body understands, That though 'tis hard to judge, yet money can't go without hands.'

'The devil take me!' said she (blessing herself,) 'if ever I saw't!'

So she roar'd like a bedlam, as though I had call'd her all to naught.

So you know, what could I say to her any more?

I e'en lest her, and came away as wise as I was before.

Well; but then they would have had me gone to the cunning man!

'No,' said I, ''tis the same thing, the Chaplain will be here anon.'

So the Chaplain came in. Now the servants say he is my sweetheart, Because he's always in my chamber, and I always take his part.

So, as the devil would have it, before I was aware, out I blunder'd.

*Parson,' said I, 'can you cast a nativity, when a body's plunder'd?' (Now you must know, he hates to be call'd Par the devil!)

'Truly,' says he, 'Mrs Nab, it might become j more civil;

If your money be gone, as a learned Divine so see,

You are no text for my handling; so take t me:

I was never taken for a Conjurer before, I'd hav know.'

'Lord!' said I, 'don't be angry, I am sure thought you so;

You know I honour the cloth; I design to be a wife;

I never took one in your coat for a conjurer i

With that he twisted his girdle at me like a rope should say.

'Now you may go hang yourself for me!' and away.

Well: I thought I should have swoon'd. 'Loi I, 'what shall I do?

I have lost my money, and shall lose my true lo Then my lord call'd me: 'Harry,' said my Lor cry;

I'll give you something toward thy loss: ' 'A my lady, 'so will I.'

Oh! but, said I, what if, after all, the Chapla come to?

For that, he said (an't please your Excellencies petition you.

The premises tenderly consider'd, I desire you lencies protection, Vanbrugh's House, built from the ruing Whitehall that was burnt, 1703.

In times of old, when Time was young, And poets their own verses sung, A verse would draw a stone or beam, That now would overload a team; Lead them a dance of many a mile, Then rear them to a goodly pile. Each number had its different power: Heroic strains could build a tower; Sonnets, or elegies to Chloris, Might raise a house about two stories; A lyric ode would slate; a catch Would tile; an epigram would thatch. But, to their own or landlord's cost, Now poets feel this art is lost. Not one of all our tuneful throng Can raise a lodging for a song. For Jove consider'd well the case, Observ'd they grew a numerous race; And should they build as fast as write, Twould ruin undertakers quite. This evil therefore to prevent, He wisely chang'd their element :

On earth the God of Wealth was made Sole patron of the building trade: Leaving the wits the spacious air, With licence to build castles there: And 'tis conceiv'd; their old pretence To lodge in garrets comes from thence.

Premising thus, in modern way, The better half we have to say; Sing, Muse, the house of Poet Van, In higher strains than we began.

Van (for 'tis fit the reader know it) Is both a herald and a poet; No wonder then if nicely skill'd In both capacities to build. As herald, he can in a day Repair a house gone to decay; Or, by achievements, arms, device, Erect a new one in a trice; And as a poet, he has skill To build in speculation still. 'Great Jove!' he cry'd, 'the art restore To build by verse as heretofore, And make my Muse the architect; What palaces shall we erect! No longer shall forsaken Thames Lament his old Whitehall in flames; A pile shall from its ashes rise, Fit to invade or prop the skies.'

Jove smil'd, and like a gentle god, Consenting with the usual nod, Told Van, he knew his talent best, And left the choice to his own breast. So Van resolv'd to write a farce; But, well perceiving wit was scarce, With cunning that defect supplies: Takes a French play as lawful prize; Steals thence his plot and every joke, Not once suspecting Jove would smoke; And (like a wag set down to write) Would whisper to himself, 'a bite.' Then, from this motley mingled style, Proceeded to erect his pile.

So men of old, to gain renown, did Build Babel with their tongues confounded. Jove saw the cheat, but thought it best

To turn the matter to a jest: from Olympus' top he slides, Laughing as if he'd burst his sides: A hought the god, are these your tricks? then old plays deserve old bricks;

since you're sparing of your stuff, building shall be small enough. Pake, and grudging, lent his aid; == xperienc'd bricks, that knew their trade being bricks at second-hand), move, and now in order stand. e building, as the poet writ, in proportion to his wit: And first the prologue built a wall; ide as to encompass all.

The scene, a wood, produc'd no more a few scrubby trees before. The plot as yet lay deep; and so A Cellar next was dug below:

But this a work so hard was found, Two acts it cost him under ground. Two other acts, we may presume, Were spent in building each a room: Thus far advanc'd, he made a shift To raise a roof with act the fifth. The epilogue behind did frame A place not decent here to name. Now poets from all quarters ran, To see the house of brother Van: Look'd high and low, walk'd often round; But no such house was to be found. One asks the watermen hard by, 'Where may the poet's palace lie?' Another of the Thames inquires, If he has seen its gilded spires? At length they in the rubbish spy A thing resembling a goose-pye. Thither in haste the poets throng, And gaze in silent wonder long.

Till one in raptures thus began

To praise the pile and builder Van:

'Thrice happy poet! who mayst trail Thy house about thee like a snail: Or, harness'd to a nag, at ease Take journeys in it like a chaise; Or in a boat whene'er thou wilt, Canst make it serve thee for a tilt! Capacious house! 'tis own'd by all Thou 'rt well contriv'd, though thou art small: For every wit in Britain's isle May lodge within thy spacious pile. Like Bacchus thou, as poets feign, Thy mother burnt, art born again, Born like a phoenix from the flame: But neither bulk nor shape the same; As animals of largest size Corrupt to maggots, worms, and flies; A type of modern wit and style, The rubbish of an ancient pile: So chemists boast they have a power, From the dead ashes of a flower Some faint resemblance to produce, But not the virtue, taste, or juice. So modern rhymers wisely blast The poetry of ages past; Which, after they have overthrown, They from its ruins build their own.'

The Day of Judgment.

With a whirl of thought oppress'd, I sunk from reverie to rest. A horrid vision seiz'd my head, I saw the graves give up their dead! Jove, arm'd with terrors, bursts the skies, And thunder roars and lightning flies! Amaz'd, confus'd, its fate unknown, The world stands trembling at his throne! While each pale sinner hung his head, Jove, nodding, shook the heavens, and said: 'Offending race of human kind, By nature, reason, learning, blind; You who, through frailty, stepp'd aside; And you, who never fell from pride: You who in different sects were shamm'd, And come to see each other damn'd: (So some folk told you, but they knew No more of Jove's designs than you) —The world's mad business now is o'er, And I resent these pranks no more. —I to such blockheads set my wit! I damn such fools!—Go, go, you're bit.'

The three extracts that follow are from the Tale of a Tub. The overpowering and overshadowing greatness of this book is believed to have sometimes produced an impression that Swift invented the title-phrase. This is of course quite wrong. Ben Jonson had actually used it, as the title of his last play (1633), seventy years before. Nearly a hundred earlier (1538) it occurs in Bale, and is probably much older still, having, like all such alliterative popular sayings, no definitely ascertainable origin.

The Epistle Dedicatory to His Royal Highness Prince Posterity.

SIR,—I here present your highness with the fruits of a very few leisure hours, stolen from the short intervals of a world of business, and of an employment quite alien from such amusements as this, the poor production of that refuse of time which has lain heavy upon my hands during a long prorogation of parliament, a great dearth of foreign news, and a tedious fit of rainy weather: for which and other reasons it cannot choose extremely to deserve such a patronage as that of your highness, whose numberless virtues, in so few years, make the world look upon you as the future example to all princes: for although your highness is hardly got clear of infancy, yet has the universal learned world already resolved upon appealing to your future dictates, with the lowest and most resigned submission; fate having decreed you sole arbiter of the productions of human wit, in this polite and most accomplished age. Methinks the number of appellants were enough to shock and startle any judge, of a genius less unlimited than yours: but in order to prevent such glorious trials, the person, it seems, to whose care the education of your highness is committed, has resolved (as I am told) to keep you in almost a universal ignorance of our studies, which it is your inherent birth-right to inspect.

It is amazing to me that this person should have the assurance, in the face of the sun, to go about persuading your highness that our age is almost wholly illiterate, and has hardly produced one writer upon any subject. I know very well that when your highness shall come to riper years, and have gone through the learning of antiquity, you will be too curious to neglect inquiring into the authors of the very age before you: and to think that this insolent, in the account he is preparing for your view, designs to reduce them to a number so insignificant as I am ashamed to mention; it moves my zeal and my spleen for the honour and interest of our vast flourishing body, as well as of myself, for whom, I know by long experience, he has professed and still continues a peculiar malice.

It is not unlikely that, when your highness will one day peruse what I am now writing, you may be ready to expostulate with your governor upon the credit of what I here affirm, and command him to shew you some of our productions. To which he will answer (for I am well informed of his designs) by asking your highness, where they are? and what is become of them? and pretend it a demonstration that there never were any, because they are not then to be found. Not to be found! who has mislaid them? are they sunk in the abyss of things? it's certain, that in their own nature, they were light enough to swim upon the surface for all eternity. Therefore the fault is in him, who tied weights so heavy to their heds as to depress them to the centre. Is their very exerce destroyed? who has annihilated them? were they drowed by purges, or martyred by pipes? who administered then to the posteriors of ----? But, that it may no longer le a doubt with your highness who is to be the author of this universal ruin, I beseech you to observe that large and terrible scythe which your governor affects to ber continually about him. Be pleased to remark the length and strength, the sharpness and hardness of his nails and teeth: consider his baneful, abominable breath, enem to life and matter, infectious and corrupting: and the reflect, whether it be possible for any mortal ink and paper of this generation to make a suitable resistance O! that your highness would one day resolve to disars this usurping maitre du palais of his furious engine, and bring your empire hors de page.

It were needless to recount the several methods of tyranny and destruction which your governor is pleased to practise upon this occasion. His inveterate malice is such to the writings of our age, that of several thousands produced yearly from this renowned city, before the next revolution of the sun there is not one to be heard of: unhappy infants! many of them barbarously destroyed, before they have so much as learnt their mother tonges to beg for pity. Some he stifles in their cradles; other he frights into convulsions, whereof they suddenly die: some he flays alive; others he tears limb from limb. Great numbers are offered to Moloch; and the rea, tainted by his breath, die of a languishing consumption.

But the concern I have most at heart, is for our corporation of poets; from whom I am preparing a petition to your highness, to be subscribed with the names of one hundred thirty-six of the first rate; but whose immortal productions are never likely to reach your eyes, though each of them is now an humble and an earnest appelled for the laurel, and has large comely volumes ready to shew for a support to his pretensions. The never-dying works of these illustrious persons, your governor, sir, has devoted to unavoidable death; and your highness is to be made believe, that our age has never arrived at the honour to produce one single poet.

We confess Immortality to be a great and powerful goddess; but in vain we offer up to her our devotions and our sacrifices, if your highness's governor, who has usurped the priesthood, must, by an unparalleled ambition and avarice, wholly intercept and devour them.

To affirm that our age is altogether unlearned and devoid of writers in any kind, seems to be an assertion so bold and so false that I have been some time thinking the contrary may almost be proved by uncontrollable demonstration. It is true, indeed, that although their numbers be vast, and their productions numerous is proportion, yet are they hurried so hastily off the scene, that they escape our memory and elude our sight. When I first thought of this address, I had prepared a copion list of titles to present your highness, as an undisputed argument for what I affirm. The originals were posted fresh upon all gates and corners of streets; but, returning in a very few hours to take a review, they were all too down, and fresh ones in their places. I enquised in them among readers and booksellers; but I enquired also morial of them was lost among men; their more to be found: and I was laughed to scorn and a pedant, without all taste and refinetersed in the course of present affairs, and thing of what had passed in the best comirt and town. So that I can only avow in our highness that we do abound in learning to fix upon particulars is a task too slippery r abilities. If I should venture in a windy to your highness that there is a large cloud zon, in the form of a bear; another in the he head of an ass; a third to the westward, ce a dragon; and your highness should in a think fit to examine the truth, it is certain Il be changed in figure and position; new rise, and all we could agree upon would be, iere were, but that I was grossly mistaken in r and topography of them.

overnor perhaps may still insist, and put the lat is then become of those immense bales in must needs have been employed in such looks? can these also be wholly annihilate, udden, as I pretend? What shall I say in invidious an objection? It ill befits the distribution your highness and me, to send you for tion to a jakes, or an oven; to the windows louse, or to a sordid lantern. Books, like hors, have no more than one way of coming i, but there are ten thousand to go out of it, linere.

your highness, in the integrity of my heart, m going to say is literally true this minute ; what revolutions may happen before it dy for your perusal, I can by no means rever. I beg you to accept it as a specimen ig, our politeness, and our wit. I do thereson the word of a sincere man, that there is in being a certain poet, called John Dryden, tion of Virgil was lately printed in a large and, and, if diligent search were made, for , is yet to be seen. There is another, called , who is ready to make outh that he has reams of verse to be published, whereof and his bookseller (if lawfully required) can inthentic copies, and therefore wonders why pleased to make such a secret of it. There own by the name of Tom Durfey, a poet of hension, a universal genius, and most prog. There are also one Mr Rymer, and one most profound critics. There is a person itley, who has written near a thousand pages radition, giving a full and true account of a ale, of wonderful importance, between himokseller: he is a writer of infinite wit and man rallies with a better grace, and in more s. Farther, I avow to your highness, that res I have beheld the person of William , who has written a good sizeable volume ad of your governor (from whom, alas! he e look for little favour), in a most gentleadorned with the utmost politeness and rte with discoveries equally valuable for and use, and embellished with traits of wit and so apposite that he is a worthy yoke rementioned friend.

I I go upon farther particulars, which might fill a volume with the just eulogies of my contemporary brethren? I shall bequeath this piece of justice to a larger work, wherein I intend to write a character of the present set of wits in our nation; their persons I shall describe particularly and at length, their genius and understandings in miniature.

In the meantime, I do here make bold to present your highness with a faithful abstract drawn from the universal body of all arts and sciences, intended wholly for your service and instruction: nor do I doubt in the least but your highness will peruse it as carefully and make as considerable improvements as other young princes have already done by the many volumes of late years written for a help to their studies.

That your highness may advance in wisdom and virtue, as well as years, and at last outshine all your royal ancestors, shall be the daily prayer of, Sir, your highness's most devoted, &c.

Clothes-religion and Clothes-philosophy.

About this time it happened a sect arose whose tenets obtained and spread very far, especially in the grand monde, and among everybody of good fashion. They worshipped a sort of idol, who, as their doctrine delivered, did daily create men by a kind of manufactory operation. This idol they placed in the highest part of the house, on an altar erected about three foot; he was shewn in the posture of a Persian emperor, sitting on a superficies, with his legs interwoven under him. This god had a goose for his ensign; whence it is that some learned men pretend to deduce his original from Jupiter Capitolinus. . . .

The worshippers of this deity had also a system of their belief, which seemed to turn upon the following fundamentals. They held the universe to be a large suit of clothes, which invests everything; that the earth is invested by the air, the air is invested by the stars. and the stars are invested by the primum mobile. Look on this globe of earth, you will find it to be a very complete and fashionable dress. What is that which some call land but a fine coat faced with green? or the sea, but a waistcoat of water-tabby? Proceed to the particular works of the creation, you will find how curious a journeyman Nature has been to trim up the vegetable beaux; observe how sparkish a periwig adorns the head of a beech, and what a fine doublet of white satin is worn by the hirch. To conclude from all, what is man himself but a micro-coat, or rather a complete suit of clothes with all its trammings? As to his body there can be no dispute; but examine even the acquirements of his mind, you will find them all contribute in their order towards furnishing out an exact dress. To instance no more, is not religion a cloak, honesty a pair of shoes worn out in the dirt, self-love a surtout, vanity a shirt, and conscience a pair of breeches? . . .

Characteristics of Modern Critics.

I shall conclude with three maxims, which may serve both as characteristics to distinguish a true modern critic from a pretender, and will be also of admirable use to those worthy spirits who engage in so useful and honourable an art. The first is, that criticism, contrary to all other faculties of the intellect, is ever held the truest and best when it is the very first result of the critic's mind; as fowlers reckon the first aim for the surest, and seldom fail of missing the mark if they stay for a second, Secondly, the true critics are known by their talent of swarming about the noblest writers, to which they are carried merely by instinct, as a rat to the best cheese, or as a wasp to the fairest fruit. So when the king is on horseback, he is sure to be the dirtiest person of the company; and they that make their court best are such as bespatter him most. Lastly, a true critic, in the perusal of a book, is like a dog at a feast, whose thoughts and stomach are wholly set upon what the guests fling away, and consequently is apt to snarl most when there are the fewest bones.

This single stick, which you now behold ingloriously lying in that neglected corner, I once knew in a flourishing state in a forest; it was full of sap, full of leaves, and full of boughs; but now in vain does the busy art of man pretend to vie with nature, by tying that withered bundle of twigs to its sapless trunk; it is now at best but the reverse of what it was, a tree turned upside down, the branches on the earth, and the root in the air; it is now handled by every dirty wench, condemned to do her drudgery, and, by a capricious kind of fate, destined to make her things clean, and be nasty itself; at length, worn out to the stumps in the service of the maids, it is either thrown out of doors, or condemned to the last use of kindling a When I beheld this I sighed, and said within myself: Surely man is a broomstick! nature sent him into the world strong and lusty, in a thriving condition, wearing his own hair on his head, the proper branches of this reasoning vegetable, until the axe of intemperance has lopped off his green boughs, and left him a withered trunk; he then flies to art, and puts on a periwig, valuing himself upon an unnatural bundle of hairs (all covered with powder) that never grew on his head; but now should this our broomstick pretend to enter the scene, proud of those birchen spoils it never bore, and all covered with dust, though the sweepings of the finest lady's chamber, we should be apt to ridicule and despise its vanity. Partial judges that we are of our own excellences, and other men's defaults!

But a broomstick, perhaps you will say, is an emblem of a tree standing on its head; and pray, what is man but a topsy-turvy creature, his animal faculties perpetually mounted on his rational, his head where his heels should be, grovelling on the earth! and yet, with all his faults, he sets up to be a universal reformer and corrector of abuses, a remover of grievances; rakes into every slut's corner of nature, bringing hidden corruptions to the light, and raises a mighty dust where there was none before, sharing deeply all the while in the very same pollutions he pretends to sweep away. His last days are spent in slavery to women, and generally the least deserving; till, worn to the stumps, like his brother-besom, he is either kicked out of doors, or made use of to kindle flames for others to warm themselves by.

One of the 'Miscellaneous Essays,' described as being 'according to the style and manner of the Hon. Robert Boyle's Meditations.'

Inconveniences likely to attend the Abolition of Christianity.

I am very sensible how much the gentlemen of wit and pleasure are apt to murmur and be shocked at the sight of so many daggled-tail parsons, who happen to fall in their way and offend their eyes; but at the same time, those wise reformers do not consider what an advantage and felicity it is for great wits to be always provided with objects of scorn and contempt, in order to exercise and improve their talents, and divert their spleen from on each other, or on themselves; especially 1 this may be done without the least imaginable to their persons. And to urge another argum parallel nature: if Christianity were once abolis' could the freethinkers, the strong reasoners, and of profound learning be able to find another s calculated in all points whereon to display their What wonderful productions of wit should we be of from those whose genius, by continual prac been wholly turned upon raillery and invective religion, and would, therefore, be never able to distinguish themselves on any other subject! daily complaining of the great decline of wit a and would we take away the greatest, perhaps topic we have left? Who would ever have Asgill for a wit, or Toland for a philosopher, exhaustible stock of Christianity had not been to provide them with materials? What other through all art or nature could have produced I a profound author, or furnished him with reade the wise choice of the subject that alone adorns tinguishes the writer. For had a hundred suc these been employed on the side of religion, tl immediately have sunk into silence and oblivior

Nor do I think it wholly groundless, or altogether imaginary, that the abolishing of Cl may perhaps bring the church in danger, or at the senate to the trouble of another securing desire I may not be misunderstood; I am far suming to affirm or think that the church is in present, or as things now stand, but we know soon it may be so, when the Christian religion is As plausible as this project seems, there n dangerous design lurking under it. Nothing ca notorious than that the atheists, deists, Socin trinitarians, and other subdivisions of freethi: persons of little zeal for the present ecclesiastical ment. Their declared opinion is for repealing mental test; they are very indifferent with ceremonies; nor do they hold the jus divinum pacy. Therefore this may be intended as one r towards altering the constitution of the church e and setting up presbytery in its stead; which be further considered by those at the helm. . .

And therefore if, notwithstanding all I hav shall still be thought necessary to have a bi in for repealing Christianity, I would humbl amendment, that, instead of the word Christia be put religion in general; which I conceive better answer all the good ends proposed by jectors of it. For as long as we leave in be and his Providence, with all the necessary con which curious and inquisitive men will be ar from such premises, we do not strike at the r evil, although we should ever so effectually the present scheme of the Gospel. For of w freedom of thought, if it will not produce ! action? which is the sole end, how remote appearance, of all objections against Christian therefore the freethinkers consider it a sort wherein all the parts have such a mutual depo each other, that if you happen to pull out nail, the whole fabric must fall to the ground.

The Spider and the Bee.

rere at this crisis, when a material accident for, upon the highest corner of a large window a certain spider, swollen up to the first magthe destruction of infinite numbers of flies, s lay scattered before the gates of his palace, bones before the cave of some giant. The his castle were guarded with tumpikes and all after the modern way of fortification, had passed several courts you came to the rein you might behold the constable himself lodgings, which had windows fronting to each

Thrice he endeavoured to force his I thrice the centre shook. The spider within, terrible convulsion, supposed at first that approaching to her final dissolution; or else sub with all his legions was come to revenge f many thousands of his subjects, whom his slain and devoured. However, he at length solved to issue forth and meet his fate. the bee had acquitted himself of his toils, securely at some distance, was employed his wings, and disengaging them from the ants of the cobweb. By this time the spider ured out, when, beholding the chasms, the dilapidations of his fortress, he was very wit's end; he stormed and swore like a nd swelled till he was ready to burst. At ng his eye upon the bee, and wisely gatherfrom events (for they knew each other by lague split you, said he, for a giddy son ; is it you, with a vengeance, that have itter here? could not you look before you, a'd? do you think I have nothing else to devil's name) but to mend and repair after Good words, friend, said the bee (having himself, and being disposed to droll), I'll y hand and word to come near your kennel was never in such a confounded pickle born. Sirrah, replied the spider, if it were king an old custom in our family, never to against an enemy, I should come and teach nanners. I pray have patience, said the bee. end your substance, and, for aught I see, and in need of it all, toward the repair ise. Rogue, rogue, replied the spider, yet u should have more respect to a person, e world allows to be so much your betters. , said the bee, the comparison will amount pood jest; and you will do me a favour know the reasons that all the world is ise in so hopeful a dispute. At this the ig swelled himself into the size and posture it, began his argument in the true spirit of with resolution to be heartily scurrilous to urge on his own reasons without the least regard to the answers or objections of his opposite, and fully predetermined in his mind against all conviction.

Not to disparage myself, said he, by the comparison with such a rascal, what art thou but a vagabond without house or home, without stock or inheritance? born to no possession of your own, but a pair of wings and a drone-pipe. Your livelihood is a universal plunder upon nature; a freebooter over fields and gardens; and, for the sake of stealing, will rob a nettle as easily as a violet. Whereas I am a domestic animal, furnished with a native stock within myself. This large castle (to show my improvements in the mathematics) is all built with my own hands, and the materials extracted altogether out of my own person.

I am glad, answered the bee, to hear you grant at least that I am come honestly by my wings and my voice; for then, it seems, I am obliged to Heaven alone for my flights and my music; and Providence would never have bestowed on me two such gifts without designing them for the noblest ends. I visit indeed all the flowers and blossoms of the field and garden; but whatever I collect thence enriches myself, without the least injury to their beauty, their smell, or their taste. Now, for you and your skill in architecture, and other mathematics, I have little to say: in that building of yours there might, for aught I know, have been labour and method enough; but by woeful experience for us both, it is plain the materials are naught; and I hope you will henceforth take warning, and consider duration and matter, as well as method and art. You boast indeed of being obliged to no other creature, but of drawing and spinning out all from yourself; that is to say, if we may judge of the liquor in the vessel by what issues out, you possess a good plentiful store of dirt and poison in your breast; and though I would by no means lessen or disparage your genuine stock of either, yet I doubt you are somewhat obliged, for an increase of both, to a little foreign assistance. Your inherent portion of dirt does not fail of acquisitions by sweepings exhaled from below; and one insect furnishes you with a share of poison to destroy another. So that in short the question comes all to this; whether is the nobler being of the two, that which by a lazy contemplation of four inches round, by an overweening pride, feeding and engendering on itself, turns all into excrement and venom, producing nothing at all but flybane and a cobweb; or that which by a universal range, with long search, much study, true judgment, and distinction of things, brings home honey and wax.

This dispute was managed with such eagerness, clamour, and warmth, that the two parties of books, in arms below, stood silent a while, waiting in suspense what would be the issue; which was not long undetermined: for the bee, grown impatient at so much loss of time, fled straight away to a bed of roses, without looking for a reply; and left the spider, like an orator, collected in himself, and just prepared to burst out.

Refinement of Style.

The following letter has laid before me many great and manifest evils in the world of letters, which I had overlooked; but it opens to me a very busy scene, and it will require no small care and application to amend errors, which are become so universal. The affectation of politeness is exposed in this epistle with a great deal of wit and discernment; so that, whatever discourses I may fall into hereafter upon the subject the writer treats of, I shall at present lay the matter before the world without the least alteration from the words of my correspondent.

To Isaac Bickerstaff, Esq.

SIR,-There are some abuses among us of great consequence, the reformation of which is properly your province; although, as far as I have been conversant in your papers, you have not yet considered them. These are, the deplorable ignorance that for some years had reigned among our Engliah writers, the great depravity of our taste, and the continual corruption of our style. I say nothing here of those who handle particular sciences, divinity, law, physic, and the like; I mean the traders in history and politics and the belles lettres, together with those by whom books are not translated, but (as the common expressions are) done out of French, Latin, or other languages, and made English. I cannot but observe to you that until of late years a Grub-street book was always bound in sheepskin, with suitable print and paper, the price never above a shilling, and taken off wholly by common tradesmen or country pedlars; but now they appear in all sizes and shapes and in all places: they are handed about from lapfuls in every coffeehouse to persons of quality; are shown in Westminster-hall and the Court of Requests; you may see them gilt, and in royal paper, of five or six hundred pages, and rated accordingly. I would engage to furnish you with a catalogue of English books, published within the compass of seven years past, which at the first hand would cost you a hundred pounds, wherein you shall not be able to find ten lines together of common grammar or common sense.

These two evils, ignorance and want of taste, have produced a third, I mean the continual corruption of our English tongue, which without some timely remedy will suffer more by the false refinements of twenty years past than it has been improved in the foregoing hundred. And this is what I design chiefly to enlarge upon, leaving the former evils to your animadversion.

But instead of giving you a list of the late refinements crept into our language, I here send you a copy of a letter I received some time ago from a most accomplished person in this way of writing, upon which I shall make some remarks. It is in these terms:

'SIR,-I cou'dn't get the things you sent for all about town.-I tho't to ha' come down myself, and then I'd ha' bro't um; but ha'nt don't, and I believe I can't do't, that's pozz.—Tom begins to g'imself airs, because he's going with the plenipo's.—'Tis said the French king will bamboozle us agen, which causes many specu-The Jacks, and others of that kidney, are lations. verry uppish and alert upon't, as you may see by their phizz's.-Will Hazard has got the hipps, having lost to the tune of five hundr'd pound, tho' he understands play very well, nobody better. He has promis't me upon rep to leave off play; but you know 'tis a weakness he's too apt to give into, tho' he has as much wit as any man, nobody more: he has lain incog ever since.—The mobb's very quiet with us now.—I believe you tho't I banter'd you in my last like a country put.—I shan't leave town this month, &c.'

This letter is, in every point, an admirable pattern of the present polite way of writing; nor is it of less authority for being an epistle: you may gather every flower of it, with a thousand more of equal sweetness, from the books, pamphlets, and single papers offered us every day in the coffee-houses. And these are the beauties introduced to supply the want of wit, sense, humour, and learning, which formerly were looked upon as qualifications for a writer. If a man of wit who died forty years ago were to rise from the grave on purpose, how would he be able to read this letter? and after he had gone through that difficulty, how would he be able to understand it? The first thing that strikes your eye is the breaks at the end of almost every sentence; of which I know not the use, only that it is a refinement, and very frequently practised. Then you will observe the abbreviations and elisions, by which consonants of most obdurate sounds are joined together without one softening vowel to intervene: and all this only to make one syllable of two, directly contrary to the example of the Greeks and Romans: altogether of the Gothic strain, and of a natural tendency towards relapsing into barbarity, which delights in monosyllables, and uniting of mute consonants, as it is observable in all the northern languages. And this is still more visible in the next refinement, which consists in pronouncing the first syllable in a word that has many, and dismissing the rest; such as phiss, hips, mobb, pozz, rep, and many more; when we are already overloaded with monosyllables, which are the disgrace of our language. Thus we cram one syllable, and cut off the rest; as the owl fattened her mice after she had bit off their legs, to prevent them from running away; and if ours be the same reason for maining words, it will certainly answer the end; for I am sare no other nation will desire to borrow them. Some words are hitherto but fairly split, and therefore only in their way to perfection, as incog and plenipo; but in a short time, it is to be hoped, they will be farther docked to inc and plen. This reflection has made me of late years very impatient for a peace, which I believe would save the lives of many brave words as well as men. The war has introduced abundance of polysyllables, which will never be able to live many more campaigns. Speculations, operations, preliminaries, ambassadors, palisadoes, communications, circumvallations, battalions, as numerous as they are, if they attack us too frequently in our coffeehouses, we shall certainly put them to flight, and cut off the rear.

The third refinement observable in the letter I send you consists in the choice of certain words invented by some pretty fellows, such as banter, bamboozle, country put, and kidney, as it is there applied; some of which are now struggling for the vogue, and others are in possession of it. I have done my utmost for some years past to stop the progress of mob and banter, but have been plainly borne down by numbers, and betrayed by those who promised to assist me.

In the last place, you are to take notice of certain choice phrases scattered through the letter; some of them tolerable enough, till they were worn to rags by servile imitators. You might easily find them, although they were not in a different print, and therefore I need not disturb them.

These are the false refinements in our style, which you ought to correct: first, by arguments and fair means;

out if those fail, I think you are to make use of your authority as censor, and by an annual index expurgaorius expunge all words and phrases that are offensive o good sense, and condemn those barbarous mutilations of vowels and syllables. In this last point the usual pretence is, that they spell as they speak: a noble standard for language! to depend upon the caprice of every coxcomb, who, because words are the clothing of our thoughts, cuts them out, and shapes them as he pleases, and changes them oftener than his dress. I believe all reasonable people would be content that such refiners were more sparing of their words and liberal in their syllables. On this head I should be glad you would bestow some advice upon several young readers in our churches, who, coming up from the university full fraught with admiration of our town politeness, will needs correct the style of our prayerbooks. In reading the absolution, they are very careful to say 'Pardons and absolves;' and in the prayer for the royal samily it must be endue'um, enrich'um, prosper'um, and bring'um; then in their sermons they use all the modern terms of art, sham, banter, mob, bubble, bully, cutting, skuffling, and palming; all which, and many more of the like stamp, as I have heard them often in the pulpit from some young sophisters, so I have read them in some of those sermons that have made a great noise of late. The design, it seems, is to avoid the dreadful imputation of pedantry; to show us that they know the town, understand men and manners, and have not been poring upon old unfashionable books in the university.

I should be glad to see you the instrument of introducing into our style that simplicity which is the best and truest ornament of most things in human life; which the politer ages always aimed at in their building and dress (simplex munditiis) as well as their productions of wit. It is manifest that all new affected modes of speech, whether borrowed from the court, the town, or the theatre, are the first perishing parts in any language, and, as I could prove by many hundred instances, have been so in ours. The writings of Hooker, who was a country clergyman, and of Parsons the Jesuit, both in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, are in a style that, with very few allowances, would not offend any present reader; much more clear and intelligible than those of Sir Henry Wotton, Sir Robert Naunton, Osborn, Daniel the historian, and several others who writ later; but being men of the court, and affecting the phrases then in fashion, they are often either not to be understood, or appear perfectly

What remedies are to be applied to these evils I have not room to consider, having, I fear, already taken ap most of your paper: besides, I think it is our office only to represent abuses, and yours to redress them.

—I am, with great respect, Sir, yours, &c.

Diversions of the Court of Lilliput.

The emperor had a mind one day to entertain me with several of the country shows, wherein they exceed all nations I have known, both for dexterity and magnificence. I was diverted with none so much as that of the rope-dancers, performed with a slender white thread extended about two feet, and twelve inches from the ground. Upon which I shall desire liberty, with the reader's patience, to enlarge a little.

This diversion is only practised by those persons who are candidates for great employments and high favour at court. They are trained in this art from their youth, and are not always of noble birth or liberal education. When a great office is vacant, either by death or disgrace (which often happens), five or six of those candidates petition the emperor to entertain his majesty and the court with a dance on the rope; and whoever jumps the highest, without falling, succeeds in the office. Very often the chief ministers themselves are commanded to shew their skill, and to convince the emperor that they have not lost their faculty. Flimnap, the treasurer, is allowed to cut a caper on the straight rope at least an inch higher than any other lord in the whole empire. I have seen him do the summerset several times together upon a trencher fixed on a rope which is no thicker than a common packthread in England. My friend Reldresal, principal secretary for private affairs, is, in my opinion, if I am not partial, the second after the treasurer; the rest of the great officers are much upon a par.

These diversions are often attended with fatal accidents, whereof great numbers are on record. I myself have seen two or three candidates break a limb. But the danger is much greater when the ministers themselves are commanded to shew their dexterity; for, by contending to excel themselves and their fellows, they strain so far that there is hardly one of them who has not received a fall, and some of them two or three. I was assured that, a year or two before my arrival, Flimnap would infallibly have broke his neck if one of the king's cushions that accidentally lay on the ground had not weakened the force of his fall.

There is likewise another diversion, which is only shewn before the emperor and empress and first minister, upon particular occasions. The emperor lays on the table three fine silken threads, of six inches long; one is blue, the other red, and the third green. These threads are proposed as prizes for those persons whom the emperor has a mind to distinguish by a peculiar mark of his favour. The ceremony is performed in his majesty's great chamber of state, where the candidates are to undergo a trial of dexterity, very different from the former, and such as I have not observed the least resemblance of in any other country of the new or old world. The emperor holds a stick in his hands, both ends parallel to the horizon, while the candidates, advancing one by one, sometimes leap over the stick, sometimes creep under it, backward and forward, several times, according as the stick is advanced or depressed. Sometimes the emperor holds one end of the stick, and his first minister the other; sometimes the minister has it entirely to himself. Whoever performs his part with most agility, and holds out the longest in leaping and creeping, is rewarded with the blue-coloured silk; the red is given to the next, and the green to the third, which they all wear girt twice round about the middle, and you see few great persons about this court who are not adorned with one of these girdles.

(From Gulliver's Travels.)

The Treasurer was doubtless Sir Robert Walpole, then Prime Minister, dismissed in 1717 through the intrigues of Sunderland and Stanhope. The cushion was probably Sir Robert's interest with the Duchess of Kendal, the mistress of George I. Walpole held both the orders of the Garter and the Bath, here ridiculed.

The Projectors in the Academy of Lagado.

I was received very kindly by the warden, and went for many days to the academy. Every room has in it one or more projectors, and I believe I could not be in fewer than five hundred rooms.

The first man I saw was of a meagre aspect, with sooty hands and face, his hair and beard long, ragged, and singed in several places. His clothes, shirt, and skin were all of the same colour. He had been eight years upon a project for extracting sunbeams out of cucumbers, which were to be put into phials hermetically sealed, and let out to warm the air in raw inclement summers. He told me he did not doubt in eight years more that he should be able to supply the governor's gardens with sunshine at a reasonable rate; but he complained that his stock was low, and entreated me 'to give him something as an encouragement to ingenuity, especially since this had been a very dear season for cucumbers.' I made him a small present, for my lord had furnished me with money on purpose, because he knew their practice of begging from all who go to see them. . . .

I saw another at work to calcine ice into gunpowder, who likewise shewed me a treatise he had written concerning the malleability of fire, which he intended to publish.

There was a most ingenious architect, who had contrived a new method for building houses, by beginning at the roof, and working downwards to the foundation; which he justified to me by the like practice of those two prudent insects, the bee and the spider. . . .

There was an astronomer who had undertaken to place a sun-dial upon the great weather-cock on the town-house, by adjusting the annual and diurnal motions of the earth and sun, so as to answer and coincide with all accidental turnings of the wind. . . .

We crossed a walk to the other part of the academy, where, as I have already said, the projectors in speculative learning resided.

The first professor I saw was in a very large room, with forty pupils about him. After salutation, observing me to look earnestly upon a frame which took up the greatest part of both the length and breadth of the room, he said, perhaps I might wonder to see him employed in a project for improving speculative knowledge by practical and mechanical operations. But the world would soon be sensible of its usefulness, and he flattered himself that a more noble, exalted thought never sprang in any other man's head. Every one knew how laborious the usual method is of attaining to arts and sciences; whereas by his contrivance, the most ignorant person, at a reasonable charge, and with a little bodily labour, may write books in philosophy, poetry, politics, law, mathematics, and theology, without the least assistance from genius or study. He then led me to the frame, about the sides whereof all his pupils stood in ranks. It was twenty feet square, placed in the middle of the room. The superficies was composed of several bits of wood, about the bigness of a die, but some larger than others. They were all linked together by slender wires. These bits of wood were covered on every square with paper pasted on them; and on these papers were written all the words of their language in their several moods, tenses, and declensions, but without any order. The professor then desired me to observe, for he was going to set his engine at work.

The pupils, at his command, took each of them hold of an iron handle, whereof there were forty fixed round the edges of the frame, and giving them a sudden turn, the whole disposition of the words was entirely changed. He then commanded six-and-thirty of the lads to read the several lines softly as they appeared upon the frame; and where they found three or four words together that might make part of a sentence, they dictated to the four remaining boys, who were scribes. This work was repeated three or four times, and at every turn the engine was so contrived that the words shifted into new places as the square bits of wood moved upside down. Six hours a day the young students were employed in this labour; and the professor shewed me several volumes in large folio, already collected, of broken sentences, which he intended to piece together, and out of those rich materials to give the world a complete body of all arts and sciences. . . .

We next went to the school of languages, where three professors sat in consultation upon improving that of their own country.

The first project was to shorten discourse by cutting polysyllables into one, and leaving out verbs and participles; because, in reality, all things imaginable are but nouns. The other was a scheme for entirely abolishing all words whatsoever; and this was urged as a great advantage in point of health as well as brevity; for it is plain that every word we speak is in some degree a diminution of our lungs by corrosion, and consequently contributes to the shortening of our lives. An expedient was therefore offered, that since words are only names for things, it would be more convenient for all men to carry about them such things as were necessary to express the particular business they are to discourse on. And this invention would certainly have taken place, to the great ease as well as health of the subject, if the women, in conjunction with the vulgar and illiterate, had not threatened to raise a rebellion, unless they might be allowed the liberty to speak with their tongues, after the manner of their forefathers; such constant irreconcilable enemies to science are the common people. . . .

Another great advantage proposed by this invention was, that it would serve as a universal language to be understood in all civilised nations, whose goods and utensils are generally of the same kind, or nearly resembling, so that their uses might easily be comprehended. And thus ambassadors would be qualified to treat with foreign princes or ministers of state, to whose tongues they were utter strangers.

I was at the mathematical school, where the master taught his pupils after a method scarce imaginable to us in Europe. The proposition and demonstration were fairly written on a thin waser, with ink composed of a cephalic tincture. This the student was to swallow upon a fasting stomach, and for three days following eat nothing but bread and water. As the waser digested, the tincture mounted to his brain, bearing the proposition along with it. But the success hath not hitherto been answerable, partly by some error in the quantum or composition, and partly by the perverseness of lads, to whom this bolus is so nauseous that they generally steal aside, and discharge it upwards before it can operate: neither have they been yet persuaded to use so long an abstinence as the prescription requires.

he school of political projectors I was but ill ned, the professors appearing in my judgment out of their senses, which is a scene that never make me melancholy. These unhappy people proposing schemes for persuading monarchs to favourites upon the score of their wisdom, y, and virtue; of teaching ministers to consult blic good; of rewarding merit, great abilities, ninent services; of instructing princes to know rue interest, by placing it on the same foundaith that of their people; of choosing for ements persons qualified to exercise them; with other wild impossible chimeras, that never entered into the heart of man to conceive, and confirmed the old observation, that there is nothing so gant and irrational which some philosophers have intained for truth.

however, I shall so far do justice to this part academy as to acknowledge that all of them 10t so visionary. There was a most ingenious who seemed to be perfectly versed in the whole and system of government. This illustrious person ry usefully employed his studies in finding out il remedies for all diseases and corruptions to the several kinds of public administration are , by the vices or infirmities of those who govern, l as by the licentiousness of those who are to For instance, whereas all writers and reasoners greed that there is a strict universal resemblance n the natural and political body, can there be ig more evident than that the health of both e preserved, and the diseases cured, by the same ptions? . . . This doctor therefore proposed that he meeting of a senate, certain physicians should at the three first days of their sitting, and at se of each day's debate feel the pulses of every ; after which, having maturely considered and ed upon the nature of the several maladies, and ethods of cure, they should on the fourth day to the senate-house, attended by their apothecaries with proper medicines, and, before the members lminister to each of them lenitives, aperitives, ives, corrosives, restringents, palliatives, laxatives, ılgics, icterics, apophlegmatics, acoustics, as their cases required; and, according as these medicines operate, repeat, alter, or omit them at the next g. . . .

likewise directed that every senator in the great of a nation, after he had delivered his opinion, gued in the defence of it, should be obliged to is vote directly contrary; because, if that were the result would infallibly terminate in the good public.

in parties in a state are violent, he offered a rful contrivance to reconcile them. The method: You take a hundred leaders of each party; ispose them into couples of such whose heads arest of a size; then let two nice operators saw: occiput of each couple at the same time, in nanner that the brain may be equally divided. e occiputs thus cut off be interchanged, applying o the head of his opposite party-man. It seems to be a work that requireth some exactness; e professor assured us that if it were dexterously ned, the cure would be infallible. For he argued that the two half brains being left to debate the matter between themselves within the space of one skull, would soon come to a good understanding, and produce that moderation, as well as regularity of thinking, so much to be wished for in the heads of those who imagine they come into the world only to watch and govern its motion: and as to the difference of brains in quantity or quality, among those who are directors in faction, the doctor assured us, from his own knowledge, that it was a perfect trifle.

From 'Journal to Stella.'

Did the bishop of London die in Wexford? poor gentleman! did he drink the waters? were you at his burial? was it a great funeral? so far from his friends! But he was very old: we shall all follow. And yet it was a pity, if God pleased. He was a good man; not very learned: I believe he died but poor. Did he leave any charity legacies? who held up his pall? was there a great sight of clergy? do they design a tomb for him? are you sure it was the bishop of London? because there is an elderly gentleman here that we give the same title to: or did you fancy all this in your water, as others do strange things in their wine? they say, these waters trouble the head, and make people imagine what never came to pass. Do you make no more of killing a bishop? are these your Whiggish tricks?—Yes, yes, I see you are in a fret. O faith, says you, saucy Presto, I'll break your head; what, can't one report what one hears without being made a jest and a laughing-stock? are these your English tricks, with a murrain?—and Sacheverell will be the next bishop? . . .

I was with the secretary this morning, who was in a mighty hurry, and went to Windsor in a chariot with lord-keeper; so I was not invited, and am forced to stay at home; but not at all against my will; for I could have gone, and would not. I dined in the city with one of my printers, for whom I got the Gazette, and am come home early; and have nothing to say to you more, but finish this letter, and not send it by the bellman. Days grow short, and the weather grows bad, and the town is splenetic, and things are so oddly contrived that I cannot be absent; otherwise I would go for a few days to Oxford, as I promised. They say, 'tis certain that Prior has been in France; nobody doubts it: I had not time to ask the secretary, he was in such haste. Well, I will take my leave of dearest MD for a while; for I must begin my next. letter to-night: consider that, young women; and pray be merry, and good girls, and love Presto. There is now but one business the ministry wants me for; and when that is done, I will take my leave of them. I never got a penny from them, nor expect it. In my opinion, some things stand very ticklish; I dare say nothing at this distance. Farewell, dear sirrahs, dearest lives: there is peace and quiet with MD, and nowhere else. They have not leisure here to think of small things, which may ruin them; and I have been forward enough. Farewell again, dearest rogues: I am never happy but when I write or think of MD. I have enough of courts and ministers, and wish I were at Laracor: and if I could with honour come away this moment, I would. Bernage came to see me to-day; he is just landed from Portugal, and come to raise recruits: he looks very well, and seems pleased with his station and manner of life: he never saw London nor England before; he is ravished with Kent, which was his first prospect when he landed. Farewell again, &c. &c. (Dated 24th and 25th August 1711.)

From 'Polite Conversation.'

It was in the year 1695, and the sixth of his late majesty King William the Third, of ever glorious and immortal memory, who rescued three kingdoms from popery and slavery, when, being about the age of sixand-thirty, my judgment mature, of good reputation in the world, and well acquainted with the best families in town, I determined to spend five mornings, to dine four times, pass three afternoons and six evenings every week, in the houses of the most polite families, of which I would confine myself to fifty; only changing as the masters or ladies died, or left the town, or grew out of vogue, or sunk in their fortunes, or (which to me was of the highest moment) became disaffected to the government; which practice I have followed ever since to this very day; except when I happened to be sick, or in the spleen upon cloudy weather, and except when I entertained four of each sex at my own lodgings once in a month, by way of retaliation.

I always kept a large table-book in my pocket; and as soon as I left the company I immediately entered the choicest expressions that passed during the visit: which, returning home, I transcribed in a fair hand, but somewhat enlarged; and had made the greatest part of my collection in twelve years, but not digested into any method, for this I found was a work of infinite labour, and what required the nicest judgment, and consequently could not be brought to any degree of perfection in less than sixteen years more.

Herein I resolved to exceed the advice of Horace, a Roman poet, which I have read in Mr Creech's admirable translation, that an author should keep his works nine years in his closet before he ventured to publish them: and, finding that I still received some additional flowers of wit and language, although in a very small number, I determined to defer the publication, to pursue my design, and exhaust (if possible) the whole subject, that I might present a complete system to the world: for I am convinced by long experience that the critics will be as severe as their old envy against me can make them: I foresee they will object that I have inserted many answers and replies which are neither witty, humorous, polite, nor authentic; and have omitted others that would have been highly useful as well as entertaining. But let them come to particulars, and I will boldly engage to confute their malice.

For these last six or seven years I have not been able to add above nine valuable sentences to enrich my collection: from whence I conclude that what remains will amount only to a trifle. However, if after the publication of this work, any lady or gentleman, when they have read it, shall find the least thing of importance omitted, I desire they will please to supply my defects by communicating to me their discoveries; and their letters may be directed to Simon Wagstaff, Esq., at his lodgings next door to the Gloucester-head in St James's-street, paying the postage. In return of which favour, I shall make honourable mention of their names in a short preface to the second edition.

In the mean time, I cannot but with some pride, and much pleasure, congratulate with my dear country, which has outdone all the nations of Europe in advancing the whole art of conversation to the greatest height it is capable of reaching; and therefore, being entirely convinced that the collection I now offer to the public is fall and complete, I may at the same time boldly affirm, that the whole genius, humour, politeness, and eloquence of England are summed up in it; nor is the treasure small, wherein are to be found at least a thousand shining questions, answers, repartees, replies, and rejoinden, fitted to adorn every kind of discourse that an assembly of English ladies and gentlemen, met together for their mutual entertainment, can possibly want: especially when the several flowers shall be set off and improved by the speakers, with every circumstance of preface and circumlocution, in proper terms, and attended with praise, laughter, or admiration.

From 'Thoughts on Various Subjects.'

We have just religion enough to make us hate, but not enough to make us love one another.

When we desire or solicit anything, our minds run wholly on the good side or circumstances of it; when it is obtained, our mind runs only on the bad ones.

When a true genius appeareth in the world, you may know him by this infallible sign, that the dunces are all in confederacy against him.

I am apt to think that, in the day of judgment, there will be small allowance given to the wise for their want of morals, or to the ignorant for their want of faith, because both are without excuse. This renders the advantages equal of ignorance and knowledge. But some scruples in the wise, and some vices in the ignorant, will perhaps be forgiven upon the strength of temptation to each.

It is pleasant to observe how free the present age is in laying taxes on the next: 'Future ages shall talk of this; this shall be famous to all posterity:' whereas their time and thoughts will be taken up about present things, as ours are now.

It is in disputes as in armies, where the weaker side setteth up false lights, and maketh a great noise, that the enemy may believe them to be more numerous and strong than they really are.

I have known some men possessed of good qualities, which were very serviceable to others, but useless to themselves; like a sun-dial on the front of a house, to inform the neighbours and passengers, but not the owner within.

If a man would register all his opinions upon love, politics, religion, learning, &c. beginning from his youth, and so go on to old age, what a bundle of inconsistencies and contradictions would appear at last!

The stoical scheme of supplying our wants by lopping off our desires, is like cutting off our feet when we want shoes.

The reason why so few marriages are happy, is because young ladies spend their time in making nets, not in making cages.

Censure is the tax a man payeth to the public for being eminent.

No wise man ever wished to be younger.

An idle reason lessens the weight of the good ones you gave before.

Complaint is the largest tribute Heaven receives, and the sincerest part of our devotion.

The common fluency of speech in many men and most women is owing to a scarcity of matter and scarcity of words: for whoever is a master of language, and hath a mind full of ideas, will be apt, in speaking, to hesitate upon the choice of both; whereas common speakers have only one set of ideas, and one set of words to clothe them in, and these are always ready at the mouth. So people come faster out of a church when it is almost empty than when a crowd is at the door.

To be vain is rather a mark of humility than pride. Vain men delight in telling what honours have been done them, what great company they have kept, and the like; by which they plainly confess that these honours were more than their due, and such as their friends would not believe if they had not been told: whereas a man truly proud thinks the greatest honours below his merit, and consequently scorns to boast. I therefore deliver it as a maxim, that whoever desires the character of a proud man ought to conceal his vanity.

Every man desireth to live long, but no man would be old.

If books and laws continue to increase as they have done for fifty years past, I am in some concern for future ages, how any man will be learned, or any man a lawyer.

A nice man is a man of nasty ideas.

If a man makes me keep my distance, the comfort is, he keeps his at the same time.

Very few men, properly speaking, live at present, but are providing to live another time.

Princes in their infancy, childhood, and youth are said to discover prodigious parts and wit, to speak things that surprise and astonish: strange, so many hopeful princes, so many shameful kings! If they happen to die young, they would have been prodigies of wisdom and virtue: if they live, they are often prodigies indeed, but of another sort.

As universal a practice as lying is, and as easy a one as it seems, I do not remember to have heard three good lies in all my conversation, even from those who were most celebrated in that faculty.

Sir Walter Scott's edition of Swist's Works (19 vols. 1814; and ed. 1824) includes most of what was valuable in the editions of Hawkesworth and Sheridan; a new edition by Temple Scott, with biographical introduction by Mr Lecky, began in 1897 (vol. viii. 1899). Selections are by Traill (1884-85), Lewin (1886), H. Morley (1889-90), and Craik (1892). John Forster published vol. i. of a Life in 1875; and there are Lives by Craik (1882), Leslie Stephen (1882), Moriarty (1893), and Churton Collins (1893). See also Swist in Ireland, by R. Ashe King (1896), and Mr Herbert Paul's Men and Letters (1901).

GEORGE SAINTSBURY.

John Arbuthnot, or Arbuthnott (1667-1735), the friend of Pope, Swift, Gay, and Prior, shared with his brother-wits—mostly keen Tories—in many humorous publications called forth chiefly by political events. His father was Episcopal parish minister of Arbuthnott in Kincardineshire, and was ejected after the Revolution; one of his brothers fought under Dundee at Killiecrankie, another in Mar's rebellion in 1715; and John himself was, according to Chesterfield, 'a Jacobite by prejudice, a republican by reflection and reasoning.' Having studied at Aberdeen and University College, Oxford, he took a degree in medicine at St Andrews (1696); and, settling in London, where before this he had taught mathematics, he became known as a wit and as author of an Examination of Dr Woodward's Account of the Deluge, and an Essay on the Usefulness of Mathematical Learning (1700). Happening to be at Epsom when Prince George was taken ill there, Arbuthnot treated the case so successfully that he was made the prince's regular physician. In 1705 he was appointed physician to the queen. In 1715 Pope and he assisted Gay in the unlucky farce, Three Hours after Marriage. The satirical Memoirs of the Extraordinary Life, Works, and Discoveries of Martinus Scriblerus, published in Pope's works (1741), was chiefly, if not wholly, written by Arbuthnot. The design of this work, as expounded by Pope, was to ridicule all the false tastes in learning, under the character of a man of capacity who had dipped into every art and science, but injudiciously in each. Cervantes was the model; but though the witty authors copied his grave irony with success, the fine humanity and genial imagination of the Spanish novelist are wholly wanting in Scriblerus. It is highly probable that the character of Cornelius Scriblerus suggested to Sterne the idea of Walter Shandy. His oddities and absurdities about the education of his son-in describing which Arbuthnot displays extensive and curious learning are worthy of Sterne. Useful hints are thrown out amidst the ridicule and pedantry of Scriblerus; and one might almost think the author was poking fun at 'object lessons' when we read that 'the old gentleman so contrived it, to make everything contribute to the improvement of his knowledge, even to his very dress. He invented for him a geographical suit of clothes, which might give him some hints of that science, and likewise some knowledge of the commerce of different nations. He had a French hat with an African feather, Holland shirts and Flanders lace, English cloth lined with Indian silk; his gloves were Italian, and his shoes were Spanish. He was made to observe this, and daily catechised thereupon, which his father was wont to call "travelling at home." He never gave him a fig or an orange but he obliged him to give an account from what country it came.'

Another monument of Arbuthnot's wit and humour is his History of John Bull (1712), designed to ridicule the Duke of Marlborough and turn the nation against the French war. The allegory is well sustained, and the satirical allusions wonderfully happy, though the political disputes of that time have largely lost their interest. In the like ironical vein are his Treatise concerning the Altercation or Scolding of the Ancients and his Art of Political Lying. His wit, always pointed, is seldom acrimonious, and never without strong reasons personally offensive. Of his serious works, the most notable, besides medical treatises, was a series of dissertations on ancient coins, weights, and measures. He was singularly careless of his literary fame, published his best things anonymously, and let his friends edit and alter them at will; accordingly some things quite unworthy of him were falsely attributed to him. After the death of Queen Anne all court functionaries were changed, and Arbuthnot removed from St James's to Dover Street. Swift affirmed he knew his art but not his trade, and declared, 'He has more wit than we all have, and more humanity than wit.' Arbuthnot, though displaced at court, still had a good practice in great houses, and to the end maintained his unaffected cheerfulness and good nature. From 1723 he was in ill-health, and bore with dignity bereavement and suffering. His severest utterance is his epitaph on Colonel Charteris, the most notorious blackguard of the day:

Here continueth to rot the body of FRANCIS CHARTRES, who, with an inflexible constancy, and mimitable uniformity of life, persisted, in spite of age and infirmities, in the practice of every human vice, excepting prodigality and hypocrisy; his insatiable avarice exempted him from the first, his matchless impudence from the second. Nor was he more singular in the undeviating pravity of his manners than successful in accumulating wealth; for, without trade or profession, without trust of public money, and without bribeworthy service, he acquired, or more properly created, a ministerial estate. He was the only person of his time who could cheat with the mask of honesty, retain his primeval meanness when possessed of ten thousand a year, and having daily deserved the gibbet for what he did, was at last condemned to it for what he could not do. Oh, indignant reader! think not his life maless to mankind. Providence connived at his exemble designs, to give to after ages a conspicuous proof and example of how small estimation is exorbitant weak in the sight of God, by his bestowing it on the not unworthy of all mortals.

John Bull (the English), Nic. Frog (the Dutch), mi Hocus (the Duke of Marlborough).

Bull, in the main, was an honest plain-dealing fellow, choleric, bold, and of a very unconstant temper; he dreaded not old Lewis either at backsword, single falchion, or cudgel-play; but then he was very apt to quarrel with his best friends, especially if they pretended to govern him; if you flattered him, you might led him like a child. John's temper depended very and upon the air; his spirits rose and fell with the weatherglass. John was quick, and understood his besites very well; but no man alive was more careles in looking into his accompts, or more cheated by partner, apprentices, and servants. This was occasioned by is being a boon-companion, loving his bottle and his diversion; for to say truth, no man kept a better hour than John, nor spent his money more generously. By plain and fair dealing, John had acquired some plus, and might have kept them, had it not been for his mhappy lawsuit.

Nic. Frog was a cunning sty whoreson, quite the reverse of John in many particulars; covetons, fright; minded domestic affairs; would pinch his belly to save his pocket; never lost a farthing by careless servants or bad debtors. He did not care much for any sort of diversions, except tricks of high German artists, and legerdemain; no man exceeded Nic. in these; yet it must be owned that Nic. was a fair dealer, and in that way acquired immense riches.

Hocus was an old cunning attorney; and though this was the first considerable suit that ever he was engaged in, he showed himself superior in address to most of his profession; he kept always good clerks; he loved money, was smooth-tongued, gave good words, and scidom lost his temper; he was not worse than an infidel, for he provided plentifully for his family; but he loved himself better than them all: the neighbours reported that he was henpecked, which was impossible by such a mild-spirited woman as his wife was.

The Duchess of Marlborough was a termagant. The Tory was charged the great duke with peculation as commander-in-chief, and with prolonging the war on that account.

John Bull's Mother (the Church of England).

John had a mother whom he loved and honoured extremely; a discreet, grave, sober, good-conditioned, cleanly old gentlewoman as ever lived; she was none of your cross-grained termagant, scolding jades, that one had as good be hanged as live in the house with, such as are always censuring the conduct and telling scandalous stories of their neighbours, extolling their own good qualities, and undervaluing those of others. On the contrary, she was of a meck spirit, and, as she was strictly virtuous herself, so she always put the best construction upon the words and actions of her neighbours, except where they were irreconcilable to the rules of honesty and decency. She was neither one of your precise prudes, nor one of your fantastical old belles, that dress themselves like girls of fifteen; as she neither wore a ruff, forehead cloth, nor high-crowned hat, so she had laid aside feathers, flowers, and crimpt ribbons in her head-dress, fur-below scarfs, and hooped petticoats. She scorned to patch and paint, yet she loved to keep her hands and her face clean. Though she wore no flaunting laced ruffles, she would not keep herself in a constant sweat with greasy flannel; though her hair was not stuck with jewels, she was not ashamed of a diamond cross: she was not, like some ladies, hung about with toys and trinkets, tweezer-cases, pocket-glasses, and essence-bottles; she used only a gold watch and an almanac, to mark the hours and the holidays.

Her furniture was neat and genteel, well fancied, with a bon gout. As she affected not the grandeur of a state with a canopy, she thought there was no offence in an elbow-chair; she had laid aside your carving, gilding, and japan work as being too apt to gather dirt; but she never could be prevailed upon to part with plain wainscot and clean hangings. There are some ladies that affect to smell a stink in everything; they are always highly perfumed, and continually burning frankincense in their rooms; she was above such affectation, yet she never would lay aside the use of brooms and scrubbing-brushes, and scrupled not to lay her linen in fresh lavender. She was no less genteel in her behaviour, well-bred, without affectation, in the due mean between one of your affected courtesying pieces of formality, and your romps that have no regard to the common rules of civility. There are some ladies that affect a mighty regard for their relations: we must not eat to-day for my uncle Tom; or my cousin Betty died this time ten years; let's have a ball to-night, it is my neighbour such-a-one's birthday. She looked upon all this as grimace, yet she constantly observed her husband's birthday, her wedding-day, and some few more. Though she was a truly good woman, and had a sincere motherly love for her son John, yet there wanted not those who endeavoured to create a misunderstanding between them, and they had so far prevailed with him once that he turned her out of doors [i.e. in 1643-60], to his great sorrow, as he found afterwards, for his affairs went on at sixes and sevens.

She was no less judicious in the turn of her conversation and choice of her studies, in which she far exceeded all her sex; your rakes that hate the company of all sober grave gentlewomen would bear hers; and she would, by her handsome manner of proceeding, sooner reclaim them than some that were more sour and reserved. She was a zealous preacher up of chastity and conjugal fidelity in wives, and by no means a friend to the newfangled doctrine of the indispensable duty of cuckoldom; though she advanced her opinions with a becoming assurance, yet she never ushered them in, as some positive creatures will do, with dogmatical assertions—this is infallible, I cannot be mistaken, none but a rogue can deny it. It has been observed that such people are oftener in the wrong than anybody. Though she had a thousand good qualities, she was not without her faults, amongst which one might perhaps reckon too great lenity to her servants, to whom she always gave good counsel, but often too gentle correction.

Bull's Sister Peg (the Scottish Nation and Church).

John had a sister, a poor girl that had been starved at nurse; anybody would have guessed miss to have been bred up under the influence of a cruel stepdame, and John to be the fondling of a tender mother. John looked ruddy and plump, with a pair of cheeks like a trumpeter; miss looked pale and wan, as if she had the green-sickness; and no wonder, for John was the darling; he had all the good bits, was crammed with good pullet, chicken, pig, goose, and capon, while miss had only a little oatmeal and water, or a dry crust without butter. John had his golden pippins, peaches, and nectarines; poor miss a crab-apple, sloe, or a blackberry. Master lay in the best apartment, with his bed-chamber towards the south sun; miss lodged in a garret, exposed to the north wind, which shrivelled her countenance. However, this usage, though it stunted the girl in her growth, gave her a hardy constitution; she had life and spirit in abundance, and knew when she was ill-used: now and then she would seize upon John's commons, snatch a leg of a pullet, or a bit of good beef, for which they were sure to go to fisticusts. Master was indeed too strong for her; but miss would not yield in the least point, but even when master had got her down, she would scratch and bite like a tiger; when he gave her a cuff on the ear, she would prick him with her knitting-needle. John brought a great chain one day to tie her to the bed-post, for which affront miss aimed a penknife at his heart. In short, these quarrels grew up to rooted aversions; they gave one another nicknames; she called him Gundyguts, and he called her Lousy Peg, though the girl was a tight clever wench as any was; and through her pale looks you might discern spirit and vivacity, which made her not, indeed, a perfect beauty, but something that was agreeable. It was barbarous in parents not to take notice of these early quarrels, and make them live better together, such domestic feuds proving afterwards the occasion of misfortunes to them both. Peg had, indeed, some odd humours and comical antipathy, for which John would jeer her. 'What think you of my sister Peg,' says he, 'that faints at the sound of an organ, and yet will dance and frisk at the noise of a bagpipe?' 'What's that to you, Gundy-guts?' quoth Peg; 'everybody's to choose their own music.' Then Peg had taken a fancy not to say her paternoster, which made people imagine strange things of her. Of the three brothers that have made such a clutter in the world, Lord Peter, Martin, and Jack [the Pope, Luther, and Calvin], Jack had of late been her inclination: Lord Peter she detested; nor did Martin stand much better in her good graces; but Jack had found the way to her heart.

The Celerity and Duration of Lies.

As to the celerity of their motion, the author says it is almost incredible. He gives several instances of lies that have gone faster than a man can ride post. Your terrifying lies travel at a prodigious rate, above ten miles an hour. Your whispers move in a narrow vortex, but very swiftly. The author says it is impossible to explain several phenomena in relation to the celerity of lies, without the supposition of synchronism and combination. As to the duration of lies, he says there are of all sorts, from hours and days to ages; that there are some which, like insects, die and revive again in a different form; that good artists, like people who build upon a short lease, will calculate the duration of a lie surely to answer their purpose; to last just as long, and no longer, than the turn is served. . . .

The properest contradiction to a lie is another lie. For example, if it should be reported that the Pretender was in London, one would not contradict it by saying he never was in England; but you must prove by eye-witnesses that he came no further than Greenwich, and then went back again. Thus, if it be spread about that a great person were dying of some disease, you must not say the truth, that they are in health and never had such a disease, but that they are slowly recovering of it. So there was not long ago a gentleman who affirmed that the treaty with France, for bringing popery and slavery into England, was signed the 15th of September; to which another answered very judiciously, not by opposing truth to his lie, that there was no such treaty; but that to his certain knowledge there were many things in that treaty not yet adjusted.

Letter to Pape.

I little doubt of your kind concern for me, nor of that of my Lord Bathurst. I have nothing to repay my friends with at present but prayers and good wishes. I have the satisfaction to find that I am as officiously served by my friends as he that has thousands to leave in legacies, besides the assurance of their amcerity. God Almighty has made my bodily disease as easy as a thing of that nature can be. I have found relief sometimes from the air of this place; my nights are bad, but many poor creatures are worse. As for you, my good friend, I think since our first acquaintance there has not been any of those little suspicions or jealousies which often affect the sincerest friendship, I am sure not on my side. I must be so sincere as to own that though I could not help valuing you for those talents which the world praises, yet they were not the foundation of my friendship: They were quite of another sort; nor will I at present offend you by enumerating them. And I make it my last request, that you will continue that noble disdain and abhorrence of vice which you seem naturally endued with, but still with regard to your own safety, and study more to reform than chastise, though the one cannot be effected without the other.

Lord Bathurst I have always honoured for every good quality that a person of his rank ought to have. Pray give my respects and kindest wishes to the family. My venison stomach is gone, but I have those about me, and often with me, who will be very glad of his present. If it is left at my house, it will be transmitted safe to me.

A recovery in my case, and at my age, is impossible: The kindest wishes of my friends is an Euthanasia. Living or dying I shall be Yours.

Arbuthnot's Miscellaneous Works were, with a Life, published in 1770. Phere is a good Life of him by G. A Airken (1892). John Bull and The Art of Political Lying are included in the earlier collected editions of Swift.

John Strype (1643-1737), the son of John van Strijp, a religious refugee from Brabant, was born in London, was educated at St Paul's School and Cambridge, and became incumbent of Low Leyton, Essex, but was known to the world as an ecclesiastical historian and biographer. His proba and illarranged, but honest and invaluable, works (27 vols., Clar. Press ed., 1821-43) include Memorials of Cranmer (1694); Lives of Sir Thomas Smith (1698), Bishop Aylmer (1701), Sir John Cheke (1705), Archbishop Grindal (1710), Archbishop Parker (1711), and Archbishop Whitgift (1718); Annals of the Reformation (1709-31); and the Ecclesiastical Memorials, 1513-58 (1721) has best work. He also edited Stow's Survey of London (1720). The following letter to his mother from Cambridge sets the life of a university man about that period in a vivid light:

Good Mother,

Yours of the 24th instant I gladly received, expecting indeed one a week before, but I understand both by Waterson and yourself of your indisposednesse then to write. The reason you receive this no sooner is, because I had a mind (knowing of this honest woman's setting out so suddenly for London from hence, and her business laying so neer to Petticote Lane) that she should deliver it into your hands, that so you may the better and more fully heare of me, and know how it fareth with me. She is my laundresse; make her welcome, and tell her how you would have my linen washed, as you were saying in your letter. I am very glad to hear that you and my brother Johnson do agree so well, that I believe you account an unusual courtesie that he should have you out to the cake-house. However, pray mother, be careful of yourself and do not over-walke yourself, for that is wont to bring you upon a sick bed. I hear also my brother Sayer is often a visitor: truly I am glad of it. I hope your children may be comforts to you now you are growing old. Remember me back again most kindly to my brother Sayer.

Concerning the taking up of my things, 'tis true I gave one shilling too much in the hundred: but why I gave so much, I thought indeed I had given you an account in that same letter: but it seems I have not. The only reason is, because they were a scholar's goods: it is common to make them pay one shilling more than the town's people. Dr Pearson himself payed so, and several other lads in this college: and my tutor told me they would expect so much of me, being a scholar: and I found it so.

Do not wonder so much at our commons: they are more than many colleges have. Trinity itself (where Herring and Davies are), which is the famousest college in the University, have but three half-pence. We have roast meat, dinner and supper, throughout the weeke; and such meate as you know I not use to care for; and that is yeal; but now I have learnt to eat it. Sometimes, neverthelesse, we have boiled meat, with pottage; and beef and mutton, which I am glad of; except Fridays and Saturdays, and sometimes Wednesdays; which days we have fish at dinner, and tansy or pudding for supper. Our parts then are slender enough. But there is this remedy; we may retire unto the butteries, and there take a half-penny loafe and butter or cheese; or else to the kitchen, and take there what the cook hath. But, for my part, I am sure, I never visited the kitchen yet, since I have been here, and the butteries but seldom after meak; unlesse for a ciza, that is for a farthing-worth of smallbeer, so that lesse than a peny in beer doth serve mea whole day. Neverthelesse sometimes we have exceedings: then we have two or three dishes (but that is very rare); otherwise never but one; so that a cake and a e would be very welcome to me; and a neat's e, or some such thing, if it would not require too money. If you do intend to send me any thing, do and it yet, until you hear further of me : for I have things to send for, which may all, I hope, be put hat box you have at home: but what they are, I give you an account of hereafter, when I would have sent : and that is, when I have got me a chamber : yet, I am in a chamber that doth not at all please I have thoughts of one, which is a very handsome and one pair of stairs high, and that looketh into the r's garden. The price is but 20s, per annum, ten of a knight's son, and lately admitted into this je, doth pay: though he did not come till about immer, so that I shall have but tos. to pay a year: es my income, which may be about 40s, or theres. Mother, I kindly thank you for your orange pills ent me. If you are not too straight of money, send one such thing by the woman, and a pound or two nonds and raisons. But first ask her if she will them, or if they be not too much trouble to her, much approve of your agreeing with the carrier erly: he was indeed telling me of it, that you had d with him for it; and I think he means both yours tine. Make your bargain sure with him.

nderstand by your letter that you are very inquisitive ow how things stand with me here. I believe you se well enough satisfied by the woman. My breakout are now all gone. Indeed I was afraid at my coming it would have proved the itch: but I am red on it : but I fear I shall get it, let me do what is for there are many here that have it emelly of them take strong purges that would kill a horse, ; together for it, to get it away, and yet are hardly it. At my first coming I laid alone: but since, tor desired me to let a very clear lad lay with me, n alderman's son of Colchester, which I could not being newly come: he hath laid with me now for t a fortnight, and will do till he can provide himself 1 chamber. I have been with all my acquaintance, have entreated me very courteously, especially han Houghton. I went to his chamber the Friday I first came, and there he made me stay and sup him, and would have had me laid with him that and was extraordinary kind to me. Since, we been together pretty often. He excused himselfe e did not come to see me before he went, and that I not write to me since he had been come. He hath or is about obtaining, £10 more from the college.

go twice a day to Chapel; in the morning about 7, 1 the evening about 5. After we come from Chapel morning, which is towards 8, we go to the butteries it breakfast, which usually is five farthings; an enny loaf and butter, and a cize of beer. But imes I go to an honest house near the college, and a pint of milk boiled for my breakfast.

If I was much troubled to hear that my letter for d is not yet gone. I wish if Mr Jones is not yet that it might be sent some other way. Indeed I I could see my cousin James Bonnell here within or four years: for I believe our University is less to observe lads that do not in every point conforme heirs at Dublin: though ours be bad enough. Pray aber me to my uncle, and all my friends there, when rite. Remember me to my cousin James Knox. I lad he is recovered from his dangerous sickness, whatsoever it is; for I cannot make any thing of it, as you have written it. And thus, for want of paper, I end, desiring heartily to be remembered to all my friends. Excuse me to my brother and sister that they have not heard from me yet. Next week I hope to write to them both. Excuse my length, I thought I would answer your letter to the full. I remaine your dutiful son,

J. STRIJP.

Daniel Defoe.

the author of Robinson Crusoe, was born towards the close of 1659 in the London parish of St Giles, Cripplegate. His father, James Foe, was a butcher there; his grandfather was a yeoman of Etton near Peterborough; and the change to De Foe or Defoe was made by Daniel about 1697. He was educated for the Nonconformist ministry at a Stoke Newington academy, learning Latin, Greek, French, Italian, Spanish, and, above all, English; but by 1683 he was in business as a hose-factor. He was apparently out with Monmouth, joined King William at Henley in 1688, travelled in Scotland, France, and Spain, and went bankrupt in 1692; his debts he scrupulously paid up later. He next became accountant to the glass-duty commissioners and secretary and owner of a Tilbury tile factory. His Essay upon Projects appeared in 1698, and he became noted as an able pamphleteer in support of the king's policy-e.g. in his vigorous poem, The True-born Englishman (1701). Its success was prodigious; eighty thousand copies sold upon the streets. Defoe was no poet, but he could reason in verse, and had an unlimited command of homely, forcible language. The satire opens with a paraphrase of Burton (see Vol. 1. p. 440):

> Wherever God erects a house of prayer, The devil always builds a chapel there; And 'twill be found upon examination, The latter has the larger congregation.

Defoe's restless pen was active throughout the bitter struggle under Anne between the High-Church party and the Dissenters; and his famous treatise, The Shortest Way with the Dissenters . (1703), first deceived and then infuriated his opponents. The House of Commons ordered the pamphlet to be burned; and, when tried at the Old Bailey in July, he was sentenced to pay a fine of 200 marks, to stand thrice in the pillory, to find sureties for his good behaviour during seven years, and to be imprisoned during the queen's pleasure. On the first day he suffered appeared his Hymn to the Pillory, and that portion of his penalty was converted into a Whig triumph. During his imprisonment in Newgate he continued an incessant literary activity upon 'occasional conformity' and other controversies, and started his Review (February 1704-June 1713), at first a weekly, then a bi-weekly, and finally a tri-weekly newspaper. This was his largest, if not his most important, work, embracing in over five thousand pages essays on almost every branch of human knowledge. During the same nine years he published eighty distinct works, with 4727 pages. His 'Scandal Club' was the forerunner of the Tatlers and Spectators.

In August 1704 Defoe was released from prison through Harley, who further procured him employment. Giving Alms no Charity (1704) was a masterly denunciation of indiscriminate charity and national workshops. In 1705 appeared The Consolidator: or Memoirs of Sundry Transactions from the World in the Moon, a political satire, which perhaps supplied a hint for Gulliver's Travels; and in 1706 The True Relation of the Apparition of one Mrs Veal, which Mr Aitken has proved to be founded on fact or supposed fact. Jure Divino was a tedious political satire in twelve books of poor verse. In 1705 Defoe was sent by Harley on a secret mission to the west of England; in 1706-7 he was in Scotland as a secret agent to promote the Union. His History of the Union appeared in 1709. After Harley's fall (1708) he found himself able to be a staunch Whig under Godolphin; but on Harley's return to power (1710) he once more supported a Tory Ministry. In 1713 Defoe again tried his hand at political irony, and issued three pamphlets — Reasons against the Succession of the House of Hanover; What if the Pretender should Come? and What if the Queen should Die? Neither Whig nor Tory could understand Defoe's ironical writings. He was taken into custody, and had to find bail, himself in £800, and two friends in £400 each, to answer for the alleged libels. Through the influence, however, of Harley, now Lord Oxford, Defoe obtained a pardon under the Great Seal, confuting the charges brought against him, and exempting him from any consequences thereafter on account of those publications. In his Review he had striven in vain to preserve the semblance of consistency; and, playing a dubious part in the intrigues that preceded and attended the accession of the House of Hanover, he found himself in a general discredit which his Appeal to Honour and Justice (1715) did not remove. In 1718 he was in equivocal government service, too ingeniously sub-editing Jacobite and High-Church organs. Defoe was not scrupulous in his point of honour; snl, it is certain he never was a Tory, but always at heart devoted to the glorious Revolution and the Protestant succession. None the less, it is amazing to fiel Mr Thomas Wright thus vindicating his con-duct: 'If it is dishonourable to be a spy, Defoe's conduct cannot be defended; if it is not dishonourable, let no stones be cast at him." in 1715 appeared the first volume of the Family Instructor, and on 25th April 1719 the first volume of the immortal Robinson Crusor, founded partly on Dampier's Voyage (see page 103 above), but mainly on the adventures of Alexander Selkirk, which were described at length in Woodes Rogers's Cruising Voyage round the World and Captain Cooke's Voyage (both published in 1712), and were made more accessible in Steele's Englishman (see the article on Steele in this volume) in 1713, from Selkirk's own narration. Perhaps no man in the whole history of literature ever devised at fifty-nine a more splendid masterpiece of creative imagination. The same year appeared the second volume, and in 1720 the unreadable Serious Reflections during the Lift and Surprising Adventures of Robinson Crusoe, we cording to which the original story was an allegory of the novelist's own life. In this his most prolific year he also gave to the world the Life and Advenzures of Duncan Campbell; the famous Memoirs of a Cavalier; and Captain Singleton, a book of great brilliancy. In 1722 he issued Moll Flanders, a marvel of the novelistic art; The Journal of the Plague Year, better known by the title in the second edition, A History of the Plague, a fresh masterpiece of verisimilitude; and the History of Colonel Jacque, which, unequal throughout and actually feeble towards its close, is in parts the most charming of all his books. Later works were Roxana (1724), a weaker Moll Flanders; A Tour through Great Britain (1724-26); A New Voyage round the World (1725); The Complete English Tradesman (1725-27), a glorification of moneygetting; and The Political History of the Devil (1726), which may be grouped with his System of Magic (1726) and the Essay on the Reality of Apparitions (1727). Other works are his rather ignoble Religious Courtship (1722) and The Use and Abuse of the Marriage Bed (1727). Everybody's Business is Nobody's Business (1725) is an amusing diatribe upon the insolence of domestic servants, in which he recommends for London shoeblacks the drastic discipline proposed by Fletcher of Saltoun (Vol. I. p. 828) for Scots vagabonds: 'Under the notion of cleaning our shoes, above ten thousand wicked, idle, pilfering vagrants are permitted to patrol about the city and suburbs. . . . I therefore humbly propose that these vagabonds should be put immediately under such taskmasters as the government shall appoint, and that they be employed, punished, or rewarded according to their capacities and demerits; that is to say, the industrious and docible to woolcombing, . . . as also to husbandry and other parts of agriculture.'

Meantime Defoe had built himself 'a very handsome house' at Stoke Newington, where he had 'a very genteel way of living' and amused himself with gardening and the company of his three But about 1729 his affairs seem to daughters. have fallen into confusion, one of his sons had behaved undutifully, and he was under apprehensions of trouble. He died in Ropemakers' Alley, Moorfields, 26th April 1731, and was buried in Bunhill Fields. In his last preserved letter, from some place where he was hiding near Greenwich, he writes: 'I am so near my journey's end, and am hastening to the place where the weary are at rest, and where the wicked cease to trouble; be it that the passage is rough, and the day stormy, by what way soever He please to bring me to the end of it, I desire to finish life with this temper of soul in all cases—Te Deum Laudamus.'

As a novelist Defoe was the father of Richardson, and partly of Fielding; as an essayist he suggested the Tatler and Spectator. His imagination had no visions of surpassing loveliness, nor any rich combinations of humour and eccentricity; yet he is equally at home in the plain scenes of English life, in the wars of the cavaliers, in the haunts of dissipation and infamy, in the roving adventures of the buccaneers, and in the appalling visitation of the plague. In scenes of diablerie and witchcraft he preserves the same unmoved and truth-like demeanour. Taste or circumstances led him mostly into low life, and his characters often are such as we cannot sympathise with. The whole arcana of roguery and villainy seem to have been open to him; his experiences of Newgate were not without their use. It might be thought that the good taste which led Defoe to write in a style of such pure and unpretending English, instead of the inflated manner of vulgar writers, would have dictated a nicer selection of his subjects, and kept him from wandering so frequently into the low and disgusting purlieus of vice. But he seems to have selected the adventures of pirates, pickpockets, demireps, and the like worthless characters for the simple reason that they would sell best; of course he nowhere holds them up for imitation. He evidently felt most at home where he had to descend, not to rise, to his subject. Robinson Crusoe's experiences, his shipwreck and sojourn in the solitary island, invest that incomparable tale with more romance than any of his other works. 'Pathos,' said Sir Walter Scott, 'is not Defoe's general characteristic; he had too little delicacy of mind. When it comes, it comes uncalled, and is created by the circumstances, not sought for by the author. The excess, for instance, of the natural longing for human society which Crusoe manifests while on board of the stranded Spanish vessel, by falling into a sort of agony as he repeated the words: "Oh, that but one man had been saved!--oh, that there had been but one!" is in the highest degree pathetic. The agonising reflections of the solitary, when he is in danger of being driven to sea, in his rash attempt to circumnavigate his island, are also affecting.' To these may be added Crusoe's sensations on finding the footprint on the sand-an incident conceived in the spirit of poetry. The great success of this novel induced the author to write a continuation to it, in which Crusoe is again brought among the busy haunts of men; the attempt was hazardous, and it proved a The once solitary island, peopled by failure. mariners and traders, is disenchanted, and becomes tame, vulgar, and commonplace.

The relation of adventures, not the delineation of character and passion, was the forte of Defoe. His invention of common incidents and situations seems to have been unbounded; and those minute references and descriptions 'immediately lead us,' as was pointed out by Dunlop in his History of Fiction, 'to give credit to the whole narrative, since we think they would hardly have been mentioned unless they had been true. The same circumstantial detail of facts is remarkable in Gulliver's Travels, and we are led on by them to a partial belief in the most improbable narrations.' The power of Defoe in feigning reality, or 'forging the handwriting of nature,' as it has been forcibly termed, may be seen in the narrative of Mrs Veal's apparition. It was prefixed to a religious book, Drelincourt on Death, and had the effect of drawing attention to an otherwise unsaleable and neglected work. The imposition was a bold one-perhaps the least defensible of all his inventions. Defoe is more natural even than Swift; and his style, though inferior in directness and energy, is more copious. He was strictly an original writer, with strong, clear conceptions ever rising up in his mind, which he was able to embody in language equally perspicuous and forcible. He had both read and seen much, and treasured up an amount of knowledge and observation certainly not equalled by the store of any writer of that day. When we consider Defoe's misfortunes and sufferings; if we remember that his spirit had been broken and his means wasted by prosecutions, that his health was broken by apoplexy, and that he was verging on sixty, his invention of Robinson Crusoe and the long train of fiction which succeeded it seems a marvellous triumph of native genius, self-reliance, and energy.

Defoe's irony was often too subtle and obscure for popular apprehension, but the following is as obvious as it is ingenious:

From 'What if the Pretender should Come?'

Give us leave, O people of Great Britain, to lay before you a little sketch of your future felicity, under the auspicious reign of such a glorious prince as we all hope and believe the Pretender to be. First, you are to allow that by such a just and righteous shutting up of the Exchequer in about seven years' time, he may be supposed to have received about forty millions sterling from his people, which not being to be found in specie in the kingdom, will for the benefit of circulation enable him to treasure up infinite funds of wealth in foreign banks, a prodigious mass of foreign bullion, gold, jewels, and plate, to be ready in the Tower or elsewhere, to be issued upon future emergency, as occasion may allow. This prodigious wealth will necessarily have these happy events, to the infinite satisfaction and advantage of the whole nation, and the benefit of which I hope none will be so unjust or ungrateful to deny. I. It will for ever after deliver this nation from the burden, the expense, the formality, and the tyranny of parliaments. No one can perhaps at the first view be rightly sensible of the many advantages of this article, and from how many mischiefs it will deliver this nation. How the country gentlemen will be no longer harassed to come, at the command of every court occasion, and upon every summons by the prince's proclamation, from their families and other occasions, whether they can be spared from their wives, &c. or no, or whether they can trust their wives behind them or no; nay, whether they can spare money or no for the journey, or whether they must come carriage paid or no; then they will no more be unnecessarily exposed to long and hazardous journeys in the depth of winter, from the remotest corners of the island, to come to London, just to give away the country's money and go home again; all this will be dispensed with by the kind and gracious management of the Pretender, when he, God bless us, shall be our most gracious sovereigu. 2. In the happy consequence of the demise of parliaments, the country will be eased of that intolerable burden of travelling to elections, sometimes in the middle of their harvest, whenever the writs of elections arbitrarily summon then 3. And with them the poor gentlemen will be eased of that abominable grievance of the nation, viz. the expense of elections, by which so many gentlemen of estates have been ruined, so many innocent people, of honest prisciples before, have been debauched and made mercenary, partial, perjured, and been blinded with bribes to sell their country and liberties to who bids most. It is well known how often, and yet how in vain, this distemper has been the constant concern of parliament for many ages to cure and to provide sufficient remedies for. Now if ever the effectual remedy for this is found out, to the inexpressible advantage of the whole nation; and this perhaps is the only cure for it that the nature of the disease will admit of; what terrible havoc has this kind of trade made among the estates of the gentry and the morals of the common people! How has it kept alive the factions and divisions of the country people, keeping them in a constant agitation, and in triennial commotions! so that, what with forming new interests and cultivating old, the heats and animosities never cease among the people. But once set the Pretender upon the throne, and let the funds be but happily stopped, and paid into his hands, that he may be in no more need of a parliament, and all these distempers will be cured as effectually as a fever is cured by cutting off the head, or as a halter cures the bleeding at the nose.

From the 'History of the Plague.'

Much about the same time I walked out into the fields towards Bow, for I had a great mind to see how things were managed in the river and among the ships; and as I had some concern in shipping, I had a notion that it had been one of the best ways of securing one's self from the infection to have retired into a ship; and away over the fields, from Bow to Bromley, and down to Blackwall, to the stairs that are there for landing or taking water.

Here I saw a poor man walking on the bank or seawall, as they call it, by himself. I walked a while also about, seeing the houses all shut up; at last I fell into some talk, at a distance, with this poor man. First I asked him how people did thereabouts. 'Alas! sir,' says he, 'almost desolate; all dead or sick. Here are very few families in this part, or in that village' (pointing at Poplar), 'where half of them are dead already, and the rest sick.' Then he, pointing to one house: 'There they are all dead,' said he, 'and the house stands open; nobody dares go into it. A poor thief,' says be, ventured in to steal something, but he paid dear for his theft, for he was carried to the churchyard too last night.' Then he pointed to several other houses. 'There,' says he, 'they are all dead, the man and his wife and five children. There,' says he, 'they are shut up; you see a watchman at the door; and so of other houses.' 'Why,' says I, 'what do you here all alone?' 'Why,' says he, 'I am a poor desolate man: it hath pleased God I am not yet visited, though my family is, and one of my children dead.' 'How do you mean then,' said I, 'that you are not visited?' 'Why,' says he, 'that is my house' (pointing to a very little low-boarded house), 'and there my poor wife and two children live,' said he, 'if they may be said to live; for my wife and one of the children are visited, but I do not come at them.' And with that word I saw the tears run very plentifully down his face; and so they did down mine too, I assure you.

'But,' said I, 'why do you not come at them? How can you abandon your own flesh and blood?' 'O, sir,' says he, 'the Lord forbid. I do not abandon them: I work for them as much as I am able; and blessed be the Lord, I keep them from want.' And with that I observed he lifted up his eyes to heaven with a countenance that presently told me I had happened on a man that was no hypocrite, but a serious, religious, good man; and his ejaculation was an expression of thankfulness that, in such a condition as he was in, he should be able to say his family did not want. 'Well,' says I, 'honest man, that is a great mercy, as things go now with the But how do you live then, and how are you kept from the dreadful calamity that is now upon us all?' 'Why, sir,' says he, 'I am a waterman, and there is my boat,' says he; 'and the boat serves me for a house: I work in it in the day, and I sleep in it in the night; and what I get I lay it down upon that stone,' says he, shewing me a broad stone on the other side of the street, a good way from his house; 'and then,' says he, 'I halloo and call to them till I make them hear, and they come and fetch it.'

'Well, friend,' says I, 'but how can you get money as a waterman? Does anybody go by water these times?' 'Yes, sir,' says he, 'in the way I am employed, there does. Do you see there,' says he, 'five ships lie at anchor?' (pointing down the river a good way below the town), 'and do you see,' says he, 'eight or ten ships lie at the chain there, and at anchor yonder?' (pointing above the town). 'All those ships have families on board, of their merchants and owners, and such like, who have locked themselves up, and live on board, close shut in, for fear of the infection; and I tend on them to fetch things for them, carry letters, and do what is absolutely necessary, that they may not be obliged to come on shore; and every night I fasten my boat on board one of the ship's boats, and there I sleep by myself; and blessed be God, I am preserved hitherto.'

'Well,' said I, 'friend, but will they let you come on board after you have been on shore here, when this has been such a terrible place, and so infected as it is?'

'Why, as to that,' said he, 'I very seldom go up the ship-side, but deliver what I bring to their boat, or lie by the side, and they hoist it on board. If I did, I think they are in no danger from me, for I never go into any house on shore, or touch anybody, no not of my own family; but I fetch provisions for them.'

'Nay,' says I, 'but that may be worse, for you must have those provisions of somebody or other; and since all this part of the town is so infected, it is dangerous so much as to speak with anybody; for the village,' said I, 'is, as it were, the beginning of London, though it be at some distance from it.'

'That is true,' added he, 'but you do not understand me right. I do not buy provisions for them here; I row up to Greenwich, and buy fresh meat there, and sometimes I row down the river to Woolwich, and buy there; then I go to single farmhouses on the Kentish side, where I am known, and buy fowls, and eggs, and butter, and bring to the ships, as they direct me, sometimes one, sometimes the other. I seldom come on shore here; and I came only now to call my wife, and hear how my little family do, and give them a little money which I received last night.'

'Poor man!' said I, 'and how much hast thou gotten for them?'

'I have gotten four shillings,' said he, 'which is a great sum, as things go now with poor men; but they have given me a bag of bread too, and a salt fish and some flesh; so all helps out.'

'Well,' said I, 'and have you given it them yet?'

'No,' said he, 'but I have called, and my wise has answered that she cannot come out yet; but in half an hour she hopes to come, and I am waiting for her. Poor woman!' says he, 'she is brought sadly down; she has had a swelling, and it is broke, and I hope she will recover, but I fear the child will die; but it is the Lord'—— Here he stopped, and wept very much.

'Well, honest friend,' said I, 'thou hast a sure comforter, if thou hast brought thyself to be resigned to the will of God; He is dealing with us all in judgment.'

'O sir,' says he, 'it is infinite mercy if any of us are spared; and who am I to repine!'

'Say'st thou so,' said I; 'and how much less is my faith than thine!' And here my heart smote me, suggesting how much better this poor man's foundation was on which he staid in the danger than mine; that he had nowhere to fly; that he had a family to bind him to attendance, which I had not; and mine was mere presumption, his a true dependence and a courage resting on God; and yet that he used all possible caution for his safety.

I turned a little way from the man while these thoughts engaged me; for indeed I could no more refrain from tears than he.

At length, after some further talk, the poor woman opened the door, and called 'Robert, Robert.' He answered, and bid her stay a few moments and he would come; so he ran down the common stairs to his boat, and fetched up a sack in which was the provisions he had brought from the ships; and when he returned, he hallooed again. Then he went to the great stone which he shewed me, and emptied the sack, and laid all out, everything by themselves, and then retired; and his wife came with a little boy to fetch them away; and he called and said such a captain had sent such a thing, and such a captain such a thing; and at the end adds: 'God has sent it all; give thanks to Him.' When the poor woman had taken up all, she was so weak, she could not carry it at once in, though the weight was not much neither; so she left the biscuit, which was in a little bag, and left a little boy to watch it till she came again.

'Well, but,' says I to him, 'did you leave her the four shillings too, which you said was your week's pay?'

'Yes, yes,' says he; 'you shall hear her own it.' So he calls again: 'Rachel, Rachel,' which it seems was her name, 'did you take up the money?' 'Yes,' said she. 'How much was it?' said he. 'Four shillings and a groat,' said she. 'Well, well,' says he, 'the Lord keep you all;' and so he turned to go away.

As I could not refrain contributing tears to this man's story, so neither could I refrain my charity for his assistance; so I called him. 'Hark thee, friend,' said I, 'come hither, for I believe thou art in health, that I may venture thee;' so I pulled out my hand, which was in my pocket before. 'Here,' says I, 'go and call thy Rachel once more, and give her a little more comfort from me; God will never forsake a family that trust in Him as thou dost:' so I gave him four other shillings, and bid him go lay them on the stone, and call his wife.

I have not words to express the poor man's thankfulness, neither could he express it himself but by tears running down his face. He called his wife, and told her God had moved the heart of a stranger, upon hearing their condition, to give them all that money; and a great deal more such as that he said to her. The woman, too, made signs of the like thankfulness, as well to Heaven as to me, and joyfully picked it up; and I parted with no money all that year that I thought better bestowed.

The Troubles of a Young Thief.

I have often thought since that, and with some mirth too, how I had really more wealth than I knew what to do with [five pounds, his share of the plunder from a stolen pocket-book]; for lodging I had none, nor any box or drawer to hide my money in, nor had I any pocket, but such as I say was full of holes; I knew nobody in the world that I could go and desire them to lay it up for me; for being a poor, naked, ragged boy, they would presently say I had robbed somebody, and perhaps lay hold of me, and my money would be my crime, as they say it often is in foreign countries. And now, as I was full of wealth, behold I was full of care, for what to do to secure my money I could not tell; and this held me so long, and was so vexatious to me the next day, that I truly sat down and cried.

Nothing could be more perplexing than this money was to me all that night. I carried it in my hand a good while, for it was in gold all but 14s.; and that is to say, it was in four guineas, and that 14s. was more difficult to carry than the four guineas. At last I sat down and pulled off one of my shoes, and put the four guineas into that; but after I had gone awhile, my shoe hurt me so I could not go, so I was fain to sit down again, and take it out of my shoe, and carry it in my hand. Then I found a dirty linen rag in the street, and I took that up, and wrapped it all together, and carried it in that a good way. I have often since heard people say, when they have been talking of money that they could not get in, 'I wish I had it in a foul clout:' in truth, I had mine in a foul clout; for it was foul, according to the letter of that saying, but it served me till I came to a convenient place, and then I sat down and washed the cloth in the kennel, and so then put my money in again.

Well, I carried it home with me to my lodging in the glass-house, and when I went to go to sleep, I knew not what to do with it. If I had let any of the black crew I was with know of it, I should have been smothered in the ashes for it; so I knew not what to do, but lay with it in my hand, and my hand in my bosom; but then sleep went from my eyes. Oh, the weight of human care! I, a poor beggar-boy, could not sleep, so soon as I had but a little money to keep, who before that could have slept upon a heap of brickbats, or stones, or cinders, or anywhere, as sound as a rich man does on his down bed, and sounder too.

Every now and then dropping asleep, I should dream that my money was lost, and start like one frighted; then, finding it fast in my hand, try to go to sleep again, but could not for a long while; then drop and start again. At last a fancy came into my head, that if I fell asleep, I should dream of the money, and talk of it in my sleep, and tell that I had money; which if I should do, and one of the rogues should hear me, they would pick it out of my bosom, and of my hand too, without waking me; and after that thought I could not sleep a wink more; so I passed that night over in care and anxiety enough, and this, I may safely say, was the first night's rest that I lost by the cares of this life and the deceitfulness of ricks.

As soon as it was day, I got out of the hole we lay in, and rambled abroad in the fields towards Stepney, and there I mused and considered what I should do with this money, and many a time I wished that I had not had it; for after all my ruminating upon it, and what course I should take with it, or where I should put it, I could not hit upon any one thing, or any possible method to secure it; and it perplexed me so that at last, as I said just now, I sat down and cried heartily.

When my crying was over, the case was the same; I had the money still, and what to do with it I could not tell. At last it came into my head that I should look out for some hole in a tree, and seek to hide it there till I should have occasion for it. Big with this discovery, as I then thought it, I began to look about me for a tree; but there were no trees in the fields about Stepney or Mile-end that looked fit for my purpose; and if there were any that I began to look narrowly at, the fields were so full of people that they would see if I went to hide anything there, and I thought the people eyed me as it was, and that two men in particular followed me to see what I intended to do.

This drove me farther off, and I crossed the road at Mile-end, and in the middle of the town went down a lane that goes away to the Blind Beggar's at Bethnal Green. When I came a little way in the lane, I found a footpath over the fields, and in those fields several trees for my turn, as I thought. At last, one tree had a little hole in it pretty high out of my reach, and I climbed up the tree to get it, and when I came there, I put my hand in and found (as I thought) a place very fit, so I placed my treasure there, and was mighty well satisfied with it; but, behold, putting my hand in again, to lay it more commodiously, as I thought, of a sudden it slipped away from me, and I found the tree was hollow, and my little parcel was fallen in out of my reach, and how far it might go in I knew not; so that, in a word, my money was quite gone, irrecoverably lost. There could be no room so much as to hope ever to see it again, for it was a vast great tree.

As young as I was, I was now sensible what a fool I was before, that I could not think of ways to keep my money, but I must come thus far to throw it into a hole where I could not reach it. Well, I thrust my hand quite up to my elbow; but no bottom was to be found, nor any end of the hole or cavity. I got a stick of the tree, and thrust it in a great way, but all was one. Then I cried, nay roared out, I was in such a passion. Then I got down the tree again, then up again, and thrust in my hand again till I scratched my arm and made it bleed, and cried all the while most violently. Then I began to think I had not so much as a halfpenny of it left for a halfpenny roll, and I was hungry, and then I cried again. Then I came away in despair, crying and roaring like a little boy that had been whipped; then I went back again to the tree, and up the tree again, and this I did several times.

The last time I had gotten up the tree, I happened to wn not on the same side that I went up and wn before, but on the other side of the tree, and her side of the bank also; and, behold, the tree eat open place in the side of it close to the as old hollow trees often have; and looking in place, to my inexpressible joy there lay my ad my linen rag, all wrapped up just as I had o the hole: for the tree being hollow all the way : had been some moss or light stuff, which I had ment enough to know was not firm, that had y when it came to drop out of my hand, and so pped quite down at once.

but a child, and I rejoiced like a child, for I quite out loud when I saw it; then I ran to it ched it up, hugged and kissed the dirty rag ed times; then danced and jumped about, ran end of the field to the other, and, in short, I t what; much less do I know now what I did, I shall never forget the thing, either what a rief it was to my heart when I thought I had : what a flood of joy overwhelmed me when I it again.

I was in the first transport of my joy, as I have an about and knew not what I did; but when over, I sat down, opened the foul clout the as in, looked at it, told it, found it was all there, I fell a-crying as violently as I did before, when t I had lost it. . . .

When he gave it me he bade me hold and, and he told the money into my hand; and had done he asked me if it was right. I said know, but I believed it was. 'Why,' says he, ou tell it?' 'Indeed, sir, I did not steal them,' said I, and cried

This is a very clever boy,' says he to the other gentleman, 'and yet very ignorant and honest; 'tis pity some care should not be taken of him, and something done for him. 'Well,' says he, 'what wilt thou do with this money

'Yes,' said I, 'my pocket is whole.'

'And where will you put it when you get home?'

'I have no home,' said I, and cried again.

'Poor child!' said he. 'Then what dost thou do for thy living?'

'I go of errands,' said I, 'for the folks in Rosemary Lane.

'And what dost thou do for a lodging at night?'

'I lie at the glass-house,' said I, 'at night.'

'How, lie at the glass-house! Have they any beds there?' says he.

'I never lay in a bed in my life,' said I, 'as I remember.'

'Why,' says he, 'what do you lie on at the glass-

'Well, but hark ye, Jacque,' says the first gentleman, 'do they give you no money when they send you of errands?

'They give me victuals,' said I, 'and that's better.'

'But what,' says he, 'do you do for clothes?'

'They give me sometimes old things,' said I, 'such as they have to spare.'

'Why, you have never a shirt on, I believe,' said he, 'have you?'

'No; I never had a shirt,' said I, 'since my nurse died.'

'How long ago is that?' said he.

'Six winters, when this is out,' said I.

'Why, how old are you?' said he.

'I can't tell,' said I.

'Well,' says the gentleman, 'now you have this money, won't you buy some clothes and a shirt with some of it?'

'Yes,' said I, 'I would buy some clothes.'

'And what will you do with the rest?'

'I can't tell,' said I, and cried.

'What dost cry for, Jacque?' said he.

'I am afraid,' said I, and cried still.

'What art afraid of?'

'They will know I have money.'

'Well, and what then?'

'Then I must sleep no more in the warm glass-house, and I shall be starved with cold. They will take away my money.'

'But why must you sleep there no more?'

Here the gentlemen observed to one another how naturally anxiety and perplexity attend those that have money. 'I warrant you,' says the clerk, 'when this poor boy had no money he slept all night in the straw, or on the warm ashes in the glass-house, as soundly and as void of care as it would be possible for any creature to do; but now, as soon as he has gotten money, the care of preserving it brings tears into his eyes and fear into his heart.'

They asked me a great many questions more, to which I answered in my childish way as well as I could, but so as pleased them well enough. At last I was going away with a heavy pocket, and I assure you not a light heart, for I was so frighted with having so much money that I knew not what in the earth to do with myself. I went away, however, and walked a little way, but I could not tell what to do; so, after rambling two hours or thereabout, I went back again, and sat down at the gentleman's door, and there I cried as long as I had any moisture in my head to make tears of, but never knocked at the door.

I had not sat long, I suppose, but somebody belonging to the family got knowledge of it, and a maid came and talked to me, but I said little to her, only cried still. At length it came to the gentleman's ears. As for the merchant, he was gone. When the gentleman heard of me he called me in, and began to talk with me again, and asked me what I stayed for.

I told him I had not stayed there all that while, for I had been gone a great while, and was come again.

'Well,' says he, 'but what did you come again for?'

'I can't tell, says I.

'And what do you cry so for?' said he. 'I hope you have not lost your money, have you?'

No, I told him, I had not lost it yet, but was afraid I should.

'And does that make you cry?' says he.

I told him yes, for I knew I should not be able to keep it, but they would cheat me of it, or they would kill me and take it away from me too.

'They?' says he. 'Who? What sort of gangs of people art thou with?'

I told him they were all boys, but very wicked boys; 'thieves and pickpockets,' said I, 'such as stole this letter-case—a sad pack; I can't abide them.'

'Well, Jacque,' said he, 'what shall be done for thee? Will you leave it with me? Shall I keep it for you?'

'Yes,' said I, 'with all my heart, if you please.'

'Come, then,' says he, 'give it me; and that you may be sure that I have it, and you shall have it honestly again, I'll give you a bill for it, and for the interest of it, and that you may keep safe enough. Nay,' added he, 'and if you lose it, or anybody takes it from you, none shall receive the money but yourself, or any part of it.'

I presently pulled out all the money, and gave it to him, only keeping about 15s. for myself to buy some clothes; and thus ended the conference between us on the first occasion, at least for the first time. Having thus secured my money to my full satisfaction, I was then perfectly easy, and accordingly the sad thoughts that afflicted my mind before began to vanish away.

Crusoe's Wonderful Escape.

And now our case was very dismal indeed; for we all saw plainly that the sea went so high that the boat could not live, and that we should be inevitably drowned. As to making sail, we had none, nor, if we had, could we have done anything with it; so we worked at the oar towards the land, though with heavy hearts, like men going to execution; for we all knew that, when the boat came nearer the shore, she would be dashed in a thousand pieces by the breach of the sea. However, we committed our souls to God in the most earnest manner; and the wind driving us towards the shore, we hastened our destruction with our own hands, pulling as well as we could towards land.

What the shore was, whether rock or sand, whether steep or shoal, we knew not; the only hope that could rationally give us the least shadow of expectation was if we might happen into some bay or gulf, or the mouth of some river, where, by great chance, we might have run our boat in, or got under the lee of the land, and perhaps made smooth water. But there was nothing of this appeared; but, as we made nearer and nearer the shore, the land looked more frightful than the sea.

After we had rowed, or rather driven, about a league and a half, as we reckoned it, a raging wave, mountain-like, came rolling astern of us, and plainly bade us expect a watery grave. In a word, it took us with such a fury that it overset the boat at once, and, separating us as well from the boat as from one another, gave us not time hardly to say 'Oh God!' for we were all swallowed up in a moment.

Nothing can describe the confusion of thought which I felt when I sank into the water; for though I swam very well, yet I could not deliver myself from the waves so as to draw breath, till that wave having driven me, or rather carried me, a vast way on towards the shore, and, having spent itself, went back, and left me upon the land almost dry, but half dead with the water I took in. I had so much presence of mind, as well as breath left, that, seeing myself nearer the mainland than I expected, I got upon my feet, and endeavoured to make on towards the land as fast as I could, before another wave should return and take me up again. But I soon found it was impossible to avoid it; for I saw the sea come after me as high as a great hill, and as furious as an enemy, which I had no means or strength to contend with-my business was to hold my breath, and raise myself upon the water, if I could; and so, by swimming, to preserve my breathing, and pilot myself towards the shore, if possible -my greatest concern now being, that the sea, as it would carry me a great way towards the shore when it came on, might not carry me back again with it when it gave back towards the sea.

The wave that came upon me again, buried me at once twenty or thirty feet deep in its own body; and I could feel myself carried with a mighty force and swiftness towards the shore a very great way; but I held my breath, and assisted myself to swim still forward with all my might. I was ready to burst with holding my breath, when, as I felt myself rising up, so, to my immediate relief, I found my head and hands shoot out above the surface of the water; and though it was not two seconds of time that I could keep myself so, yet it relieved me greatly, gave me breath and new courage. I was covered again with water a good while, but not so long but I held it out; and, finding the water had spent itself and began to return, I struck forward against the return of the waves, and felt ground again with my feet. I stood still a few moments to recover breath, and till the water went from me, and then took to my heels, and ran with what strength I had farther towards the shore. But neither would this deliver me from the fury of the sea, which came pouring in after me again; and twice more I was lifted up by the waves and carried forwards as before, the shore being very flat.

The last time of these two had well near been fatal to zne; for the sea, having hurried me along as before, landed me, or rather dashed me, against a piece of a rock, and that with such force as it left me senseless, and indeed helpless, as to my own deliverance; for the blow taking my side and breast, beat the breath, as it were, quite out of my body, and, had it returned again immediately, I must have been strangled in the water; but I recovered a little before the return of the waves, and, seeing I should be covered again with the water, I resolved to hold fast by a piece of the rock, and so to hold my breath, if possible, till the wave went back. Now, as the waves were not so high as at first, being near land, I held my hold till the wave abated and then fetched another run, which brought me so near the shore that the next wave, though it went over me, yet did not so swallow me up as to carry me away; and the next run I took I got to the mainland, where to my great comfort I clambered up the cliffs of the shore, and sat me down upon the grass, free from danger, and quite out of the reach of the water. I was now landed and safe on shore, and began to look up and thank God that my life was saved, in a case wherein there was, some minutes before, scarce any room to hope. (From Robinson Crusoe.)

Friday.

He was a comely, handsome fellow, perfectly well made, with straight strong limbs, not too large, tall and well-shaped, and, as I reckon, about twenty-six years of age. He had a very good countenance, not a fierce and surly aspect, but seemed to have something very manly in his face; and yet he had all the sweetness and softness of an European in his countenance too, especially when he smiled. His hair was long and black, not curled like wool; his forehead very high and large; and a great vivacity and sparkling sharpness in his eyes. The colour of his skin was not quite black, but very tawny; and yet not of an ugly, yellow, nauseous tawny, as the Brazilians and Virginians, and other natives of America are, but of a bright kind of a dun olive colour, that had in it something very agreeable, though not very easy to describe. His face was round and plump; his nose small, not flat like the negroes; a very good mouth, thin lips, and his fine teeth well set, and white as ivory.

After he had slumbered, rather than slept, about halfan-hour, he waked again, and comes out of the cave to me, for I had been milking my goats, which I had in the enclosure just by. When he espied me, he came running to me, laying himself down again upon the ground, with all the possible signs of an humble, thankful disposition, making a many antic gestures to show it. At last he lays his head flat upon the ground, close to my foot, and sets my other foot upon his head, as he had done before, and after this made all the signs to me of subjection, servitude, and submission imaginable, to let me know how he would serve me as long as he lived. I understood him in many things, and let him know I was very well pleased with him. In a little time I began to speak to him, and teach him to speak to me; and, first, I made him know his name should be Friday, which was the day I saved his life. I called him so for the memory of the time. I likewise taught him to say master, and then let him know that was to be my name. I likewise taught him to say Yes and No, and to know the meaning of them. I gave him some milk in an earthen pot, and let him see me drink it before him, and sop my bread in it; and I gave him a cake of bread to do the like, which he quickly complied with, and made signs that it was very good for him.

I kept there with him all that night; but as soon as it was day, I beckoned to him to come with me, and let him know I would give him some clothes; at which he seemed very glad, for he was stark naked. As we went by the place where he had buried the two men, he pointed exactly to the place, and showed me the marks that he had made to find them again, making signs to me that we should dig them up again, and eat them. At this I appeared very angry, expressed my abhorrence of it, made as if I would vomit at the thoughts of it, and beckoned with my hand to him to come away; which he did immediately, with great submission. I then led him up to the top of the hill, to see if his enemies were gone; and pulling out my glass, I looked, and saw plainly the place where they had been, but no appearance of them or their canoes; so that it was plain that they were gone, and had left their two comrades behind them, without any search after them. . . .

When we had done this we came back to our castle, and there I fell to work for my man Friday; and first of all I gave him a pair of linen drawers, which I had out of the poor gunner's chest I mentioned, and which I found in the wreck; and which with a little alteration fitted him very well. Then I made him a jerkin of goat's-skin, as well as my skill would allow, and I was now grown a tolerable good tailor; and I gave him a cap, which I had made of a hare-skin, very convenient and fashionable enough; and thus he was clothed for the present tolerably well, and was mighty well pleased to see himself almost as well clothed as his master. It is true he went awkwardly in these things at first; wearing the drawers was very awkward to him, and the sleeves of the waistcoat galled his shoulders, and the inside of his arms; but a little easing them where he complained they hurt him, and using himself to them, at length he took to them very well.

The next day after I came home to my hutch with him, I began to consider where I should lodge him. And that I might do well for him, and yet be perfectly easy myself, I made a little tent for him in the vacant place between my two fortifications, in the inside of the last and in the outside of the first; and as there was a door or entrance there into my cave, I made a formal framed door-case, and a door to it of boards, and set it up in the passage, a little within the entrance; and causing the door to open on the inside, I barred it up in the night, taking in my ladders too; so that Friday could no way come at me in the inside of my innermost wall without making so much noise in getting over, that it must needs waken me; for my first wall had now a complete roof over it of long poles, covering all my tent, and leaning up to the side of the hill, which was again laid cross with smaller sticks instead of laths, and then thatched over a great thickness with the rice-straw, which was strong, like reeds; and at the hole or place which was left to go in or out by the ladder, I had placed a kind of trap-door, which, if it had been attempted on the outside, would not have opened at all, but would have fallen down, and made a great noise; and as to weapons, I took them all into my side every night.

But I needed none of all this precaution; for never man had a more faithful, loving, sincere servant than Friday was to me; without passions, sullenness, or designs, perfectly obliged and engaged; his very affections were tied to me, like those of a child to a father; and I dare say he would have sacrificed his life for the saving mine, upon any occasion whatsoever. The many testimonies he gave me of this put it out of doubt, and soon convinced me that I needed to use no precautions as to my safety on his account.

Francis Atterbury (1662-1732), Bishop of Rochester, was born at Milton-Keynes, near Newport-Pagnell, and educated at Westminster and Christ Church, Oxford. In 1687 he answered a pseudonymous attack on Protestantism, and, taking orders, won reputation as a preacher in a succession of charges and a royal chaplainry. Charles Boyle's Examination of Bentley's Dissertations on the Epistles of Phalaris (1698), clever but shallow, was really by Atterbury, who had been Boyle's tutor at Christ Church; his defence (1700) of Convocation won him the archdeaconry of Totnes and a canonry of Exeter. In 1704 he was promoted to the deanery of Carlisle, in 1712 became Dean of Christ Church, and in 1713 was inade Bishop of Rochester and Dean of Westminster. His reputation as the best preacher of his day is commemorated in the Tatler, where Steele, after reference to the apathetic pulpit manner of most of the London clergy, goes on to praise the 'dean' who 'is an orator.' To Atterbury is ascribed, with great likeliood, Dr Sacheverel's famous defence (1710) before the Lords; and he was author of the scarcely less famous Representation of the State of Religion (1711). The death of Queen Anne extinguished his hopes of the primacy. His Jacobite leanings secured the disfavour of the new king. In 1715 he refused to sign the bishops' declaration of fidelity, and in 1722 he was committed to the Tower. A bill of pains and penalties deprived him of all his offices and banished him for ever. In 1723 he quitted England, and after a short stay at Brussels, settled in Paris, where he died; he was afterwards laid in a nameless grave in Westminster Abbey. works comprise sermons, and letters to Pope, Swift, Bolingbroke, and others of his friends. Macaulay's famous article is still an authority; in 1869 Williams published two volumes of Atterbury's

DEAR SIR-I thank you for all the instances of your friendship, both before and since my misfortunes. A little time will complete them, and separate you and me for ever. But in what part of the world soever I am, I wil live mindful of your sincere kindness to me; and will please myself with the thought that I still live in your esteen and affection as much as ever I did, and that no accident of life, no distance of time or place, will alter you in that respect. It never can me, who have loved and valued you ever since I knew you, and shall not fail to do it when I am not allowed to tell you so, as the case will soon be. Give my faithful services to Dr Arbuthnot, and thanks for what he sent me, which was much to the purpose, if anything can be said to be to the purpose in a case that is already determined. Let him know my defence will be such, that neither my friends need blush for me, nor will my enemies have great occasion to triumph, though sure of the victory. I shall want his advice before I go abroad in many things. But I question whether I shall be permitted to see him or anybody but such as are absolutely necessary towards the dispatch of my private affairs. If so, God bless you both! and may no part of the ill-fortune that attends me ever pursue either of you I know not but I may call upon you at my hearing, to say somewhat about my way of spending my time at the deanery, which did not seem calculated towards managing plots and conspiracies. But of that I shall consider. You and I have spent many hours together upon much pleasanter subjects; and, that I may preserve the old custom, I shall not part with you now till I have closed this letter with three lines of Milton, which you will, I know, readily, and not without some degree of concern, apply to your ever-affectionate, &c.

'Some natural tears he dropped, but wiped them som; The world was all before him where to choose His place of rest, and Providence his guide.'

William Whiston (1667-1752), an accomplished but eccentric theologian, born at Norton rectory in Leicestershire, became successively a Fellow of Clare College, Cambridge (1693), chaplain to the Bishop of Norwich, and (1698) rector of Lowestoft. He was ere this known as a zealous exponent of Newton's system. His Theory of the Earth (1696), meant to supersede Thomas Burnet's, brought him reputation, and in 1703 he was appointed Newton's successor as Lucasian professor of mathematics at Cambridge. But for Arianism (Eusebianism he frankly professed) he was in 1710 deprived of his professorship and expelled from the university. His Primitive Christianity Revived (1711-12) included the famous heretical essay on the Apostolic Constitutions, first sketched in a paper in 1708, which maintained that this work was the most sacred of the canonical books of the New Testament, and that the doctrine of the Trinity was unscriptural. Whiston spent the remainder of his life in London, incessantly employed in writing, controversy, scientific crotchets, lectures, and the services of a 'Primitive Christian' congregation. Though an Arian he was a strong supernaturalist, even anointing the sick and touching for the king's evil, and wrote vigorously against the deists, with whom he was in the popular mind associated. He was a transparently honest and sincere man, conscientious and outspoken, but full of scrupulosities, fads, and vagaries, who would unhesitatingly quarrel with his bread and butter for the merest trifles, and cheerfully confute his dearest friend. He was much taken up with the fulfilment of prophecy, the identification of the lost tribes with the Tartars, the approach of the millennium, and the restoration of the Jews. But it should be remembered that he was one of the very first to illustrate his lectures (on astronomy, earthquakes, and a great variety of subjects) with experiments. Whiston may have been in Goldsmith's mind when he was depicting the simple-minded vagaries of Dr Primrose. Mr Leslie Stephen has recorded fifty-two publications by Whiston. Of his standard (though far from impeccable) translation of Josephus (1737) there is a good edition by Shilleto (1890), his Life of Samuel Clarke (1730) was admirable, and the Primitive New Testament (1745) is a curiosity. His autobiographical Memoirs (1749; new ed. 1753) truly reflect, even in their pragmatical and at times tedious detail, his attractive character as well as his foibles. The following is a fragment:

The Discovery of the Newtonian Philosophy.

After I had taken holy orders, I returned to the college, and went on with my own studies there, particularly the mathematics and the Cartesian philosophy, which was alone in vogue with us at that time. But it was not long before I, with immense pains but no assistance, set myself with the utmost zeal to the study of Sir Isaac Newton's wonderful discoveries in his Philosophia Naturalis Principia Mathematica, one or two of which lectures I had heard him read in the public schools, though I understood them not at all at that time; being indeed greatly excited thereto by a paper of Dr Gregory's when he was professor in Scotland, wherein he had given the most prodigious commendations to that work, as not only right in all things, but in a manner the effect of a plainly divine genius, and had already caused several of his scholars to keep acts, as we call them, upon several branches of the Newtonian philosophy; while we at Cambridge, poor wretches, were ignominiously studying the fictitious hypotheses of the Cartesian, which Sir Isaac Newton had also himself done formerly, as I have heard him say. What the occasion of Sir Isaac Newton's leaving the Cartesian philosophy, and of discovering his amazing theory of gravity, was, I have heard him long ago, soon after my first acquaintance with him, which was 1694, thus relate, and of which Dr Pemberton gives the like account, and somewhat more fully, in the preface to his explication of his philosophy: It was this. inclination came into Sir Isaac's mind to try whether the same power did not keep the moon in her orbit, notwithstanding her projectile velocity, which he knew always tended to go along a straight line the tangent of that orbit, which makes stones and all heavy bodies with us fall downward, and which we call gravity;

taking this postulatum, which had been thought of before, that such power might decrease in a duplicate proportion of the distances from the earth's centre. Upon Sir Isaac's first trial, when he took a degree of a great circle on the earth's surface, whence a degree at the distance of the moon was to be determined also, to be sixty measured miles only, according to the gross measures then in use, he was in some degree disappointed; and the power that restrained the moon in her orbit, measured by the versed sines of that orbit, appeared not to be quite the same that was to be expected had it been the power of gravity alone by which the moon was there influenced. Upon this disappointment, which made Sir Isaac suspect that this power was partly that of gravity and partly that of Cartesius's vortices, he threw aside the paper of his calculation, and went to other studies. However, some time afterward, when Monsieur Picart had much more exactly measured the earth, and found that a degree of a great circle was sixty-nine and a half such miles, Sir Isaac, in turning over some of his former papers, lighted upon this old imperfect calculation, and, correcting his former error, discovered that this power, at the true correct distance of the moon from the earth, not only tended to the earth's center, as did the common power of gravity with us, but was exactly of the right quantity; and that if a stone was carried up to the moon, or to sixty semidiameters of the earth, and let fall downward by its gravity, and the moon's own menstrual [monthly] motion was stopped, and she was let fall by that power which before retained her in her orbit, they would exactly fall towards the same point, and with the same velocity; which was therefore no other power than that of gravity. And since that power appeared to extend as far as the moon, at the distance of 240,000 miles, it was but natural, or rather necessary, to suppose it might reach twice, thrice, four times, &c., the same distance, with the same diminution, according to the squares of such distances perpetually: which noble discovery proved the happy occasion of the invention of the wonderful Newtonian philosophy.

Samuel Clarke (1675-1729), born at Norwich, was the son of the M.P. for the town, and at Caius College, Cambridge, studied physics, philosophy, and theology. The Cartesian system then held almost universal sway, but Clarke adopted the views of Newton, and expounded them in his edition of Rohault's Physics. He took orders in 1698. Chaplain from 1698 to Bishop Moore of Norwich, in 1706 he became chaplain to Queen Anne, and in 1709 rector of St James's, Westminster. By his work on the Trinity (1712), in which he denied that that doctrine was held by the early Church, he raised the controversy in which Waterland was his chief opponent. His own views seem to have a distinctly Arian character or tendency; and when he was charged with heresy, the form in which he stated his adherence to orthodoxy was held by some to be a conscious evasion. He recanted nothing, but promised not to write more on the subject, and escaped the fate that had befallen Whiston four years earlier. Clarke was a vigorous antagonist of the deists; he wrote against materialism, empiricism, and necessitarianism, and maintained the essential immortality of the soul. He taught that the fundamental truths of morals were as absolutely certain as the truths of mathematics; space and time he held to be attributes of an infinite and immaterial being. His famous Discourse concerning the Being and Attributes of God, originally the Boyle Lectures of 1704-5. was in answer to Hobbes, Spinoza, Blount, and the freethinkers, and contained the famous demonstration of the existence of God, often, but inaccurately, called an a priori argument. He expressly says of some points in his argument that they are not easily proved a priori, and as expressly proves them a posteriori, using these terms. The main propositions in this celebrated argument as given in summary by Clarke himself

(1) That something has existed from eternity; (2) That there has existed from eternity some one immutable and independent being; (3) That that immutable and independent being, which has existed from eternity, without any external cause of its existence, must be self-existent, that is, necessarily existing; (4) What the substance or essence of that being, which is self-existent or necessarily existing, is we have no idea, neither is it at all possible for us to comprehend it; (5) That though the substance or essence of the self-existent being is itself absolutely incomprehensible to us, yet many of the essential attributes of his nature are strictly demonstrable, as well as his existence, and, in the first place, that he must be of necessity eternal; (6) That the self-existent being must of necessity be infinite and omnipresent, (7) Must be but one, (8) Must be an intelligent being, (9) Must be not a necessary agent, but a being indued with liberty and choice, (10) Must of necessity have infinite power, (11) Must be infinitely wise, and (12) Must of necessity be a being of infinite goodness, justice, and truth, and all other moral perfections, such as become the supreme governor and judge of the world.

Clarke, who was after Locke the most notable English philosopher of the day, was opposed to Locke in the whole attitude of his mind, and might in contrast to Locke be described as an a priori philosopher. He was more decidedly a metaphysician, more inclined to speculation, more given to drawing large conclusions from abstract postulates and propositions, an intuitionalist in ethics, metaphysics, and theology. He was rather admirably skilful in the controversial handling of philosophical commonplaces than an original thinker, a keen and powerful dialectician than a profound theologian or philosopher. But though without any gift of style other than the power of making himself as clear as the argument permitted, he was for many years the most conspicuous English writer in the domain of philosophy and theology, and in morals he ranks as founder of the intellectual school of which Wollaston and Price were exponents, affirming that the nature of good and evil, the obligation to virtue, are evident from the principles of reason, and that immorality means a perversity or obtuseness of intelligence. Pope assailed his 'high priori road' in the Duncial; Bolingbroke often attacked his views. and other latitudinarian Churchmen were devoted disciples; Butler, Berkeley, Hutcheson, were carrespondents. Clarke's keen correspondence with Leibnitz (published in 1717) dealt with space and time and their relations to God, and with moral freedom. He wrote as forcibly on the proportion of force to velocity as on the being of God, translated Newton's Optics into Lain for him, and published editions of Cæsar and of the Iliad, the latter with a Latin version mainly original, though the notes were compiled from various quarters. The following (from the great Discourse, Part II.) is a statement by Clarke on the Essential Difference between Right and Wrong.

The principal thing that can with any colour of reason seem to countenance the opinion of those who deny the natural and eternal difference of good and evil . . . is the difficulty there may sometimes be to define exactly the bounds of right and wrong; the variety of opinious that have obtained even among understanding and learned men concerning certain questions of just and unjust, especially in political matters; and the many contrary laws that have been made in divers ages and in different countries concerning these matters. But as in painting two very different colours, by diluting each other very slowly and gradually, may, from the highest intenseness in either extreme, terminate in the midst insensibly, and so run one into the other that it shall not be possible even for a skilful eye to determine exactly where the one ends and the other begins; and yet the colours may really differ as much as can be, not in degree only but entirely in kind, as red and blue, or white and black: so though it may perhaps be very difficult in some nice and perplexed cases (which yet are very far from occurring frequently) to define exactly the bounds of right and wrong, just and unjust-and there may be some latitude in the judgment of different men, and the laws of divers nations-yet right and wrong are nevertheless in themselves totally and essentially different; even altogether as much as white and black, light and darkness. The Spartan law, perhaps, which permitted their youth to steal, may, as absurd as it was, bear much dispute whether it was absolutely unjust or no; because, every man having an absolute right in his own goods, it may seem that the members of any society may agree to transfer or alter their own properties upon what conditions they shall think ft. But if it could be supposed that a law had been made at Sparta, or at Rome, or in India, or in any other part of the world, whereby it had been commanded or allowed that every man might rob by violence, and murder whomsoever he met with, or that no faith should be kept with any man, nor any equitable compacts performed, no man, with any tolerable use of his reason, whatever diversity of judgment might be among them in other matters, would have thought that such a law could have authorised or excused, much less have justified such actions, and have made them become good: because 'tis plainly not in men's power to make

d be truth, though they may alter the property goods as they please. Now if in flagrant cases and and essential difference between good and ht and wrong, cannot but be confessed to be and undeniably evident, the difference between st be also essential and unalterable in all, even lest and nicest and most intricate cases, though it so easy to be discerned and accurately distin-

For if, from the difficulty of determining the bounds of right and wrong in many perises, it could truly be concluded that just and were not essentially different by nature, but positive constitution and custom, it would equally that they were not really, essentially, ilterably different, even in the most flagrant at can be supposed. Which is an assertion so surd that Mr Hobbes himself could hardly vent out blushing, and discovering plainly, by his expressions, his secret self-condemnation. There refore certain necessary and eternal differences is, and certain fitnesses or unfitnesses of the ion of different things, or different relations one ier, or depending on any positive constitutions, ided unchangeably in the nature and reason of and unavoidably arising from the difference of gs themselves.

: Life by Hoadly prefixed to his collected works (4 vols. that by Whiston (1741), and a German one by R. Zimmerenna, 1870).

Toland (1669–1722) was born of c parents near the village of Redcastle in Londonderry. He entered the University gow in 1687, but removing to Edinburgh, ned the Roman Catholic faith and passed n 1690. At Leyden, where he spent two he studied theology under Spanheim, and he acquaintance of the famous Le Clerc, st and most accomplished of the 'advanced' ians of Europe, and distinctly 'unsound' on piration of the Scriptures. He resided for a Oxford, and in the Bodleian collected the .ls of more than one of his later publications. istianity not Mysterious (1696) he expressly I to accept all the essentials of Christianity, intained that the value of religion could not ny unintelligible element, and that no part ruth could be contrary to reason. He chose with evident reference to Locke's Reasons of Christianity (1695), and professed to t heart the defence of revelation against ind atheists. But the anti-supernatural and 1king tendency-and disguised intention-of rk was obvious; it greatly perturbed the rical world, began the 'deistical controversy' ccupied so much of the early eighteenth , and led to several replies (as by Stilling-Locke somewhat anxiously sought to disommunity of thought. Prosecuted in Middleland withdrew to Ireland; but when by vote Irish House of Commons his book was publicly by the common hangman, and a ition decided on, he fled back to London. noyed Shaftesbury by surreptitiously pubhis Inquiry in 1699.

In Amyntor (1699) and other works he fairly raised the question as to the comparative evidence for the canonical and apocryphal scriptures, with professed candour but unmistakably mischievous intent. A pamphlet entitled Anglia Libera, on the succession of the House of Brunswick, led to his being received with favour by the Princess Sophia when he accompanied the English ambassador to the court of Hanover; and from 1707 to 1710 he lived in Berlin and various Continental towns. His after-life was that of a literary adventurer, and fills a painful chapter in D'Israeli's Calamities of Authors. He was apparently employed as an agent by Harley, and he did some political pamphleteering-latterly against Jacobitism and High-Church views. In Nazarenus (1720) he insisted, somewhat on the lines developed by Semler and the Tübingen school, that there were two distinctly opposed parties in the early Christian Church-one Judaistic (which he identified with the Ebionites), and one Pauline or liberal. His Pantheisticon, a pantheistic liturgy for a hypothetical society of new light philosophers, was regarded as an offensive parody of the Anglican Prayer-book. He resided from the year 1718 at Putney, and there he died.

Besides the works named, and various defences, apologies, and pamphlets, he wrote a Life of Milton, prefixed to an edition of the prose works (1698), which gave room for criticisms of Church polity and implicit commendation of unorthodoxy; an Account of Prussia and Hanover (1705); Adeisidamon (1709); Origines Judaica (1709); and a History of the Druids. Hodegus explains that the pillar of cloud and fire was not meant by the author of the Pentateuch to be taken as miraculous, but was a portable fire or ambulatory beacon carried on a proper machine on a pole, such as we know were used by the ancient Persians; and in the twenty-two short chapters of Hypatia, written when Whiston was suffering for his heresies, he finds plenty of room for assailing the pride, malice, cruelty, and unscrupulousness of the Churchmen of all ages.

He was an acute and audacious pioneer of freethought, versatile but vain, unseasonably aggressive in diffusing his new light, and widely read rather than really learned; and he wrote with point and vigour. His grasp of some of the problems of early Christian history was really remarkable, and seems to have had some influence on German rationalism. His precarious life cut him off from the chance of scholarly research, but he was quite unjustly despised by the orthodox. Defoe-not himself a model character-reflects the general attitude towards deists. Reporting the death of 'the late eminent or rather notorious Mr Toland,' he was sadly scandalised at Toland's character and history, 'how he has for many years employed the best parts and a great stock of reading to the worst purposes, namely, to shock the faith of Christians in the glorious person and divinity of their Redeemer, and to sap and undermine the principles of the orthodox faith.' And he held that the premature death of one 'who has been so great an enemy of revealed religion, so open an opposer of orthodox principles, and had so often blasphemed the divinity of our blessed Redeemer,' confirms his own observation that 'he never knew an open blasphemer of God live to be an old man."

From the Life of Milton.

He was never very healthy, nor too sickly; and the distemper that troubled him most of any other was the gout, of which he dyed without much pain in the year from the birth of Christ 1674, and in the six-and-sixtieth of his age. All his learned and great friends in London, not without a friendly concourse of the vulgar, accompanied his body to the church of St Giles near Cripplegate, where he has buried in the chancel; and where the piety of his admirers will shortly erect a monument becoming his worth, and the incouragement of letters in king William's reign,

Thus lived and died John Milton, a person of the best accomplishments, the happiest genius, and the vastest learning which this nation, so renowned for producing excellent writers, could ever yet shew: esteemed indeed at home, but much more honoured abroad, where almost in his childhood he made a considerable figure, and continues to be still reputed one of the brightest luminaries of the sciences. He was middle-sized and well proportioned, his deportment erect and manly, his hair of a light brown, his features exactly regular, his complexion wonderfully fair when a youth, and ruddy to the very last. He was affable in conversation, of an equal and cheerful temper, and highly delighted with all sorts of music, in which he was himself not meanly skilled. He was extraordinary temperat in his diet, which was any thing most in season or the easiest procured, and was no friend to sharp or strong liquors. His recreations, before his sight was gone, consisted much in feats of activity, particularly in the exercise of his arms, which he could handle with dexterity; but when blindness and age confined him, he played much upon an organ he kept in the house, and had a pully to swing and keep him in motion. But the love of books exceeded all his other passions. In summer he would be stirring at four in the morning, and in winter at five; but at night he used to go to bed by nine, partly attributing the loss of his eys to his late watching when he was a student, and looking on this custom as very permicious to health at any time: but when he was not disposed to rise at his usual hours, he always had one to read to him by his bedside. As he looked upon true and absolute freedom to be the greatest happiness of this life, whether to societies or single persons; so he thought constraint of any sort to be the utmost misery: for which reason he used to tell those about him the intire satisfaction of his mind, that he had constantly imployed his strength and faculties in the defence of liberty, and in a direct opposition to slavery. He ever exprest the profoundest reverence to the Deity as well in deeds as words; and would say to his friends, that the divine properties of goodness, justice, and mercy were the adequate rule of human actions, nor less the object of imitation for privat advantages, than of admiration or respect for their own excellence and perfection. In his early days he was a favorer of those Protestants then opprobriously called by the name of Puritans: h his middle years he was best pleased with the Independents and Anabaptists, as allowing of more liberty than others, and coming nearest in his opinion to the primitive practice: but in the latter part of his life he was not a profest member of any particular sect among Christians, he frequented none of their assemblies, nor made use of their particular rites in his family. Whether this proceeded from a dislike of their uncharitable ad endless disputes, and that love of dominion, or inclintion to persecution, which, he said, was a piece of Popery inseparable from all churches; or whether ke thought one might be a good man without subscribing to any party, and that they had all in some thmp corrupted the institutions of Jesus Christ, I will by no means adventure to determine: for conjectures on sade occasions are very uncertain, and I never met will any of his acquaintance who could be positive in anigning the true reasons of his conduct.

I shall now conclude this discourse with a character given of him by a man of unparalleled diligence and industry, who has disabliged all sides merely for telling the truth either intirely or without disguise, and who, since most men have the frailty of ingaging in factions, cannot be suspected of partiality in favor of Milton. He was a person, says Anthony Wood in the first volume of his Athena Oxonienses, of wonderful parts, of a very sharp, biting, and satyrical wit; he was a good philosopher and historian; an excellent poet, Latinist, Grecian, and Hebrician; a good mathematician and musician; and so rarely endowed by nature, that had he bin but honestly principled, he might have bin highly useful to that party against which he all along appeared with much malice and bitterness.

There is a Lafe by Des Matteaux prefixed to two yols, of Teland's postbumous works (1741), and a monograph by Berthold, Tale Toland und der Montanus der Gegenwart (Neidelb. 1876). For Toland's partial anticipation of Semler and Baur, see an article is the Theological Review, 1877.

Matthew Tindal (1656-1733), deistical write, born at Beerferris rectory, South Devon, was clected a Fellow of All Souls College, Oxford. A Roman Catholic under James II., he reverted to Protestantism of a freethinking type, and wrote An Essay of Obedience to the Supreme Powers (1693) and Rights of the Christian Church assertal against the Romish and all other Priests (1706). The latter raised a storm of opposition; but even a prosecution failed to prevent a fourth edition is 1709. In 1730 Tindal published his Christianity as old as the Creation, which was soon known as 'The Deist's Bible;' its aim is not merely to state the case in favour of natural religion, but, less directly, to infer the superfluousness of any other. He seems to admit an actual revelation confirming natural religion, but, seeing that in this cast there was nothing new revealed, the result is to eliminate the supernatural element from Christianity, and to prove that its morality is its only claim to the reverence of mankind. 'Answers' were innumerable, and the deistical controversy was an outstanding topic of interest to all educated men, to laymen as much as to those theologically educated. The note of the deistical writers was their reliance on common-sense argument rather han on theological learning, though they freely availed themselves of all arguments they had access to. And they addressed not theologians but the general public. The form of the argument is a dialogue between A and B; it is plainly a very one-sided discussion.

From 'The Deist's Bible.'

A. I desire no more than to be allowed, that there's a religion of nature and reason written in the hearts of every one of us from the first creation; by which all mankind must judge of the truth of any instituted religion whatever; and if it varies from the religion of wature and reason in any one particular, nay, in the minutest circumstance, that alone is an argument which makes all things else that can be said for its support totally ineffectual. If so, must not natural religion and external revelation, like two tallies, exactly answer one another; without any other difference between them but as to the manner of their being delivered? And how can it be otherwise? Can laws be imperfect, where a legislator is absolutely perfect? Can time discover any thing to him which he did not foresee from eternity? And as his wisdom is always the same, so is his goodness; and consequently from the consideration of both these, his laws must always be the same. - Is it not from the infinite wisdom and goodness of God, that you suppose the gospel a most perfect law, incapable of being repealed, or altered, or of having additions; and must not you own the law of nature as perfect a law, except you will say, that God did not arrive to the perfection of wisdom and goodness till about seventeen hundred years since?

To plead that the gospel is incapable of any additions, because the will of God is immutable, and his law too perfect to need them, is an argument, was Christianity a new religion, which destroys itself; since from the time it commenced, you must own God is mutable; and that such additions have been made to the all-perfect laws of infinite wisdom as constitute a new religion. The reason why the law of nature is immutable is because it is founded on the unalterable reason of things; but if God is an arbitrary Being, and can command things meerly from will and pleasure; some things to-day, and others to-morrow; there is nothing either in the nature of God or in the things themselves to hinder him from perpetually changing his mind. If he once commanded things without reason, there can be no reason why he may not endlessly change such commands.

Anthony Collins (1676-1729), deist, born near Hounslow, passed from Eton to King's College, Cambridge, and became the disciple and friend of John Locke. In 1707 he published his Essay concerning the Use of Reason; in 1709 Priestcraft in Perfection. In Holland he made the friendship of Le Clerc; in 1713 his Discourse on Free-thinking, that to which Bentley replied in his famous Remarks, attracted much attention, and explicitly insisted on the value and necessity of unprejudiced inquiry in religious matters. One great argument for it is the mutually destructive dogmas of priests throughout the world, in all faiths and Churches. While there is no direct polemic against the truths of revealed religion, the way the 'ever blessed Trinity' is referred to manifestly does not suggest faith in it; and there is an obvious aim to shake confidence in the canon of Scripture and its infallibility. In his Grounds and Reasons of the Christian Religion, published in 1724, Collins argues that Christianity is founded on Judaism, and that its main support is the argument for the fulfilment of the prophecies. And yet no interpretation of them will stand a strict and non-allegorical fulfilment in the New Testament. The inference is not directly drawn, but is patent enough. In the course of the book he gives most of the arguments now held to prove that Daniel deals with past or contemporaneous events and dates from the Maccabean period.

From the 'Discourse on Free-thinking.'

The priests throughout the world differ about Scriptures, and the authority of Scriptures. The Bramins have a book of Scripture called the Shasters. Persees have their Zundavastaw [Zend-avesta]. Bonzes of China have books written by the disciples of Fo-he [Buddha], whom they call the God and Saviour of the world, who was born to teach the way of salvation, and to give satisfaction for all mens sins. The Talapoins of Siam have a book of Scripture written by Sommonocodom [Sakya-muni, Buddha], who, the Siamese say, was born of a virgin, and was the God expected by the universe. Dervizes have their Alchoran. The rabbis among the Samaritans, who now live at Sichem in Palestine, receive the five books of Moses (the copy whereof is very different from ours) as their Scripture; together with a Chronicon, or history of themselves from Moses's time, quite different from that contained in the historical books of the Old Testament. This Chronicon is lodged in the publick library of Leyden, and has never been published in print. The rabbis among the common herd of Jews received for Scripture the fourand-twenty books of the Old Testament. The priests of the Roman Church, of the English and other Protestant Churches, receive for Scripture the four-and-twenty books of the Old Testament, and all the books of the New Testament: but the Roman receives several other books, called Apocrypha, as canonical, which all the Protestant churches utterly reject, except the Church of England, which differently from all other Christian churches, receives them as half canonical, reading some parts of them in their churches, and thereby excluding some chapters of canonical Scripture from being read. . . . The priests of all Christian churches differ among themselves in each church about the copies of the same books of Scripture; some reading them according to one manuscript, and others according to another. But the great dispute of all is concerning the Hebrew and Septuagint, between which two there is a great difference; (the latter making the world 1500 years older than the former:) to name no other differences of greater or less importance.

Lastly, As the most ancient Christian churches and priests received several gospels and books of Scripture which are now lost, such as the Gospel according to the Hebrews, the Gospel according to the Egyptians, the Traditions of Matthias, &c., and as not one father in the two first centuries (whose works now remain) but received books of Scripture which are either lost to us, or that we reject as Apocryphal: so the several sects of Christians in the East and in Africa receive at this day some books of Scripture, which are so far lost to us, that we know only their names, and others which we have and reject. As for instance, the Reverend Dr Grabe tells us of a book received by the Copticks, called the Secrets of Peter, of which we have no copy; and Ludolphus tells us that the Abyssinian Christians receive the Apostolick Constitutions; and Postellus brought from the East, where it was in use, the Gospel of James: both which we reject as Apocryphal.

The same books of Scripture have, among those priests who receive them, a very different digree of authority; some attributing more, and others less authority to them. The Popish priests contend that the text of Scripture is so corrupted, precarious, and unintelligible, that we are to depend on the authority of their church for the true particulars of the Christian religion. Others, who contend for a greater perfection in the text of Scripture, differ about the inspiration of those books; some contending that every thought and word are inspired; some that the thoughts are inspired, and not the words; some that those thoughts only are inspired which relate to fundamentals; and others that the books were written by honest men with great care and faithfulness, without any inspiration either with respect to the thoughts or words. In like manner, the Bramins, Persees, Bonzes, Talapoins, Dervizes, Rabbis, and all other priests who build their religion on books, must from the nature of things vary about books in the same religion, about the inspiration, and copies of those books.

The priests differ about the sense and meaning of those books they receive as sacred. This is evident from the great number of sects in each religion, founded on the diversity of senses put on their several Scriptures. And tho the books of the Old and New Testament are the immediate dictates of God himself, and all other Scriptures are the books of imposters; yet are the priests of the Christian church (like the priests of all other churches) not only divided into numberless sects, on account of their different interpretations of them, but even the priests of the same sect differ endlessly in opinion about their sense and meaning.

To set this matter before you in the clearest manner, and to possess you with the justest idea of the differences among priests about the sense and meaning of their Scriptures, and to make my argument the stronger for the duty and necessity of free-thinking; I will confine myself to the most divine of all books, and by consequence the best adapted of any to prevent diversity of opinion; and will take the following method. First, I will give you an idea of the nature of our holy books; whereby you'll see the foundation therein laid for a diversity of opinions among the priests of the Christian church. And, Secondly, I will give you a specimen of the diversity of opinions among the priests of the Church of England, pretended to be deduced from them: for all their differences are too great to be enumerated. From whence you'll easily infer, that there must be an infinite number of opinions among all other sorts of priests as to the meaning of their Scriptures; since the most divine of all books lays such a foundation for difference of opinion, that priests of the same sect are not able to agree, tho neither art, nor force, nor interest are wanting to compel them to an agreement of opinion.

Thomas Woolston (1669-1731), the son of a Northampton currier, became a Fellow of Sidney Sussex, Cambridge, took orders, and was in 1697 elected ecclesiastical lecturer in the university. An enthusiastic student of Origen, in 1705 be published the Old Apology for the Truth of the Christian Religion, affirming that the Mosaic story was allegorical, a prophetic parable of Christ. But from being a sound and dignified scholar and a popular preacher, he became gradually so aggressive in his criticism on the clergy and those who abode by the literal interpretation of Scripture that his friends thought him a little crazed The Moderator between the Infidel and the Apostel (developed in a second series, 1721-23) was to show that the gospel miracles could not prove Christ to be the Messiah; he disputed the reality of the incarnation in a virgin and of the resurrection, and developed a facetious vein that was as offensive as his thesis; and in 1721 his college deprived him of his fellowship. In his famous six Discourses on the Miracles of Christ (1727-29, with two Defences) he maintained that the gospel narratives taken literally were a tissue of absurdities. Sixty answers were made to the Discourses; and an indictment for blasphemy was brought against Woolston. He was sentenced to a year's imprisonment and a fine of £100; and unable to pay so considerable a sum, this partial anticipator of the mythical theory of Strauss died, a martyr to his convictions, within the rules of King's Bench. His works were collected in 1733 with a Life.

From the 'Defence.'

I have promised the world, what, by the assistance of God, and the leave of the Government, shall be published, a Discourse on the mischiefs and inconveniencies of sa hired and established priesthood: in which it shall be shewn (I.) That the preachers of Christianity in the first ages of the church (when the gospel was far and near spread, and triumphed over all opposition of Jews and Gentiles) neither received nor insisted on any wages for their pains, but were against preaching for hire; and, as if they had been endewed with the spirit of prophecy, before an hireling priesthood was established, predicted their abolition and ejection out of Christ's church; (II.) That since the establishment of an hire for the presthood, the progress of Christianity has not only been stopt, but lost ground; the avarice, ambition, and power of the clergy having been of such unspeakable mischief to the world, as is enough to make a man's heart ake to think, read, or write of; (III.) That upon an abolition of our present established priesthood, and on God's call of his own ministers, the profession of the gospel will again spread; and virtue, religion, and learning will more than ever flourish and abound. The clergy are forewarned of my design to publish such a Discourse; and this is the secret reason, whatever openly they may pretend, of their accusations against me for blasphemy and infidelity. Their zeal and industry will be never wanting to prevent the publication of this Discourse; neither need I doubt of persecution, if they can excite the Government to it, to that end.

In my first Discourse on Miracles, I happened to treat on that of Jesus's driving the buyers and sellers out of the Temple; which, upon the authority of the Fathers, I shewed to be a figure of his future ejection of bishops, priests, and deacons out of his church for making amerchandise of the gospel. The Bishop has taken me and that miracle to task; and if ever any man smiled at another's impertinence, I then heartily laughed when I read him. I begged of the Bishop before-hand not to meddle with that miracle, because it was a hot one, and would burn his fingers. But for all my caution, he has been so fool-hardy as to venture upon it, but has really touched and handled it as if it was a burning coal. He takes it up, and as soon drops it again to blow his fingers; then endeavours to throw a little water on this and that part of it to cool it, but all would not do. The enost fiery part of it, viz. that of its being a type of Jesus's future ejection of mercenary preachers out of the church, he has not, I may say it, at all touched, except by calling it my allegorical invective against the Maintenance of the Clergy; which is such a piece of Corinthian effrontery in the Bishop, that was he not resolved to lye and defame at all rates, for the support of their interests, he could never have had the face to have uttered. If the Bishop had proved that that miracle (which literally was such a ----, as I dare not now call it) neither was nor could be a shadow and resemblance of Jesus's ejection of hired priests out of the church at his second Advent, and that the Fathers were not of this opinion, he had knocked me down at once. As he has done nothing of this, so he might have spared his pains in support of the letter of this story. But I shall have a great deal of diversion with the Bishop when I come, in a proper place, to defend my exposition of that miracle. In the mean time, as the Bishop has published one of the Articles of my Christian Faith, thinking to render me odious for it; so here I will insert another, viz. * I believe upon the authority of the Fathers, that the spirit and power of Jesus will soon enter the church, and expel hireling priests, who make merchandise of the gospel, out of her, after the manner he is supposed to have driven the buyers and sellers out of the Temple."

Thomas Chubb (1679-1747), deist, was born at East-Harnham near Salisbury. His father, a maltster, died early, so that the children were poorly educated and early sent to work. Thomas was first apprenticed to a glover in Salisbury, but his eyesight failing, in 1705 he became a tallow-chandler. He had already contrived to do a good deal of reading, when a perusal of the 'historical preface' to Whiston's Primitive Christianity Revived impelled him to write his own tract, The Supremacy of the Father Asserted, which Whiston helped him to publish in 1715. Encouraged by several patrons, one of whom sent him suits of clothes which had been little worn, while another gave him a money subsidy, the 'wonderful phenomenon of Wiltshire,' as Pope called him, continued to write; and a quarto volume of his tracts, published in 1730, made his name widely known. Enquiries concerning sin, justification, prayer, the justice of God; A Discourse concerning Reason; and The True Gospel of Jesus Christ Asserted, were among his principal publications. His opinions drifted from Arianism of Clarke's type nearer and nearer to deism, yet he went regularly to church, and regarded the mission of Jesus as divine, though he did not regard Christ as God. Most of his views were common to him and the other deists. He attacks the common theory of inspiration, though his own view, quoted below, does not go far beyond what is held consistent with modern orthodoxy-as is the case with many of the contentions once accounted alarmingly deistical. He denounces such Old Testament stories as the proposed human sacrifice by Abraham, insists on the sufficiency of reason and the needlessness of miracles, and argues that the true gospel of Christ consisted mainly in the necessity of morality and repentance for sin to secure the mercy of God here and hereafter. He was a modest and estimable man.

From 'Remarks on the Scriptures.'

Amongst the many complaints made against me, occasioned by the publication of my dissertations, this I apprehend to be the principal; namely, that I have fallen foul of the Bible, and have not paid it the deference which I ought; and that, in consequence thereof, I have dug up foundations, and greatly unsettled the minds of men. So that the present questions are, how, or in what respect, have I fallen foul of the Bible? What foundations have I dig up? And what minds have I unsettled thereby? And first, how, or in what respect, have I fallen foul of the Bible? And wherein have I fallen short of paying it the deference it has a right to claim? Why, truly, I have taken the liberty to enquire into the conduct and behaviour of some of our Old-Testament saints, which stand upon record in it. I have also withheld my assent from such facts therein related, and from such propositions therein contained, as have the marks of incredibility upon them, when having no other evidence to support them than the bare authority of the writer. And is this all? To which it may, perhaps, be thought sufficient to answer, that this ministers just ground for complaint. Upon which I observe, that the Bible is held forth, and recommended to us, as a proper guide, by way of example, doctrine, and precept, to our understandings, our affections and actions; and therefore, most assuredly, the Bible of all other books ought strictly to be examined, and most carefully to be enquired into; and we ought to lend each other all the assistance we can in making the inquisition, because otherwise we are in great danger of being misled. As I am required to follow the examples of those who through faith and patience inherit the promises, and as the characters of those I am required to imitate are compounded of good actions and bad; so the very nature of the thing calls upon me and obliges me diligently to examine, and carefully to distinguish and separate those men's virtues from their vices; because otherwise I am in danger of following them, as well in their bad deeds as in their good; which must render the case, without such inquisition, most hazardous to me, and to all others who have the Bible put into their hands. The Bible is a collection of bo ks, wrote at different, and, some parts of it, at very distant times, by a variety of persons, upon many sublects; whose authors, as they plainly appear to have had very different sentiments, and sometimes, perhaps, to have differed from themselves, so it is not unlikely but they may have had very different views, as that has been pretty much the case of writers at all times; and therefore, I think, it is not doing justice to the Deity to call it, in the gross, the revealed will and word of God, whatever some parts of it may be conceived to be. The Bible is such a composition as that the most opposite tenets are extracted from it, as the many controversies that now, and at all times past, have subsisted in the Christian church do plainly demonstrate; and by this means it has been the groundwork of most of the heresies and schisms that have taken place in Christendom, and has occasioned great confusion, each one appealing to the Bible as the standard which their pretensions are to be tryed by. And tho' the various denominations of Christians have racked their inventions or conceiving powers in order to reconcile its most disagreeing parts, yet, alas! it is as easy to make the two pole-stars meet in a point as fairly to make all the parts of this composition center in any one of the many systems that have been grounded upon it. This collection of writings has been the parent of doctrines most dishonourable to God and most injurious to men, such as the doctrines of absolute unconditional election and reprobation, of religious persecution, and the like. This being the case, it furnishes out a reason, more than sufficient, to engage every considerate man, who would see with his own eyes, would follow the guidance of his own understanding, and thereby would act consonant to his intelligent nature, carefully to read, and attentively to consider what he reads in the Bible, thereby to prevent his being misled; and this, I presume, is a sufficient apology for my doing as I have done with relation thereto.

Besides, this book, called the holy Bible, contains many things that are greatly below and unworthy of the Supreme Deity. That God should specially interpose to acquaint men with, and to transmit to posterity, such trifling observations as that two are better than one, that which is crooked cannot be made streight, that which is wanting cannot be numbered, and the like; or that he should spirit men with, approve of, or countenance such malevolent desires as these: Let his children be fatherless and his wife a widow; let his children be continually vagabonds, and beg; let them also seek their bread out of their desolate places; let the extortioner catch all that he hath, and let the stranger spoil his labour; let there be none to extend mercy to him, neither let there be any to favour his fatherless children; let his posterity be cut off, and in the generation following let their name be blotted out. I say that such trifling observations, and such malevolent desires as these, should be considered as the offering of God is playing at hazard indeed. That the travels and adventures of Naomy and her two sons, Mahlon and Chilion, into the country of Moab (as in the book of Ruth) is true, perhaps, may not be disputed; but that God should specially interpose to transmit such an insignificant relation to posterity, when we have nothing to ground the supposition upon, seems to me to be taking too great a liberty with the character and conduct of the Deity. There are many things contained in that collection of writings commonly called the Bible that are much below and unworthy of the most perfect intelligence and boundless goodness; that these should be made the act of the Supreme Deity, should be declared to be a revelation from and the very word of God, without so much as a seeming reason or ground for so doing, any otherwise than to support the religious systems men have imbibed, or, perhaps, the schemes of worldly policy they are engaged in; this, surely, is not acting properly, nor even justly, by the common and kind parent of the universe. For men thus to father upon God whatever they please is taking such a liberty with the character and conduct of the supreme Deity as no honest upright man would take with that of his neighbour: and if such practising should not come under the denomination of blasphemy, which it scarcely falls short of; yet it must, at least, be a very strange kind of piety. Yea, such is the extraordinary piety of this age (like that of doing honour and service to God by killing his servants), that if a man, in conscience of that duty he owes to his maker, takes upon him to vindicate the moral character of the Deity in opposition to the religious system in vogue, or what passes for current orthodoxy, he may be sure to fall under the imputation of being a free-thinker, a Deist (those terms being used in a bad sense), or, perhaps, an Atheist.

And as to the preceptive parts of the Bible, there is a difficulty attends them that is unsurmountable to me; viz. what is required to be done at one time, and under one dispensation, is forbid to be done under another, whilst human nature continues the same, and men's relations, and dependencies, and the obligations that arise from them, continue the same also. The Deity cannot but perceive things as they really are, at all times, whatever colouring or shading men may draw over them; and therefore, to suppose that he commands and forbids the same thing, whilst the natures, the relations, and the circumstances of men and things continue the same; this, I say, is to me an unsurmountable difficulty. Matthew v. 38: Ye have heard that it hath been said; or ye have read, Exodus xxi. 23, 24, 25, Life for life, eye for eye, tooth for tooth, hand for hand, foot for foot, burning for burning, wound for wound, stripe for stripe. Upon which I observe, if such a retaliation of injuries as this is, in its own nature, proper to restrain men's viciated appetites and passions, and therefore was appointed under the dispensation of Moses; then, for the same reason, it ought to be appointed and executed under all dispensations, because mankind are the same, they have the same appetites and passions, and are liable to indulge them to excess at all times and under all dispensations. Whereas, Jesus Christ reversed the aforesaid law of retaliation, ver 39: But I say unto ye, that ye resist not evil; but whosoever shall smite thee on thy right cheek, turn to him the other also. Here, we see, Christ hath not only forbid all resistance of evil, but he also requires the patient, when he has sustained a first injury, to be a volunteer with regard to a second, and to meet it half-way.

William Nicolson (1655-1727), successively Bishop of Carlyle and Londonderry, and Archbishop of Cashel, was a learned antiquary and historical writer; his Historical Libraries of England, Scotland, and Ireland (1696-1724) being detailed catalogues or lists of books and manuscripts referring to the history of each nation. He also wrote An Essay on the Border Laws, A Treatise on the Laws of the Anglo-Saxons, A Description of Poland and Denmark, a preface to Chamberlayne's Polyglot of the Lord's Prayer, and some able pamphlets on the Bangorian Controversy; and left many interesting letters.

Earl of Shaftesbury.

Anthony Ashley Cooper (1671-1713), third Earl of Shaftesbury, was born in London, son of the second Earl satirised by Dryden as a 'shapeless lump,' and grandson of the brilliant, eloquent, unconscionable first Earl, the Ashley of the Cabal. Locke superintended his early education at Clapham; and he spent three years at Winchester and three more in travel. On his three visits to Holland he formed friendships with Bayle and Le Clerc. A zealous Whig, he sat for Poole in 1695-98, but ill-health drove him from politics to literature. He succeeded to the earldom in 1699, and spoke frequently and well in the House of Lords. Toland published, without leave, in 1699 his boyish Inquiry Concerning Merit and Virtue, which contained many of the views expounded in his later works. His (anonymous) Letter on Enthusiasm (1708) was prompted by the extravagance of the 'French prophets,' the Huguenot refugees who revived in England the visionary claims to the gift of prophecy asserted by the persecuted Camisards. What he meant by 'enthusiasm' was fanaticism or extravagance; he would have professed himself an enthusiast in our sense for truth, beauty, and goodness. Disapproving equally the fanatic and the persecutor, he pled for 'good humour' in religious controversy.

In 1709 appeared his Moralists, a Philosophical Rhapsody, which is inaptly described as a dialogue, since it contains long disquisitions by a third interlocutor; only towards the end does it become a rhapsody and an impassioned hymn to nature, which reads like a prose version of a poem. treatise has less to do with the principles of morals than with the method and order of the universe as an argument for a God, the origin of evil, a future life, and the nature of human society. In the survey of nature in the third part there is an outpouring-surely remarkable in the early eighteenth century-on the beauty and terror, the majesty and mystery, of lofty mountain scenery. And there is an amusing passage levelled against what is now called psychical research; against 'the sort of people who are always on the hot scent of some new prodigy or apparition, some upstart revelation or prophecy,' against 'rambling in blind corners of the world in ghostly company of spirit-hunters, witch-finders, and layers-out for hellish stories and diabolical transactions. There is no need of such intelligence from hell to prove the power of heaven and being of a God.' Sensus Communis (1709), an essay upon the freedom of wit and humour, vindicates the use of ridicule as a test of truth, a doctrine already set forth in the Letter on Enthusiasm; but Shaftesbury is quite misunderstood if he is supposed to mean that facetious or frivolous raillery should supersede serious argument. His argument was that irrational folly and superstition could better be met by a humorous reductio ad absurdum than by angry polemic, violence, or persecution. No sane person would ridicule the truth; but if truth is ridiculed, it suffers nothing, whereas hallucinations and impostures can be laughed out of court. In 1710 appeared his Soliloguy, or Advice to an Author. In 1711 he issued a collection of his works in three volumes, under the general title of Characteristics of Men, Manners, Opinions, and Times. Here appeared again his revised Inquiry Concerning Virtue; and the third volume contained Miscellaneous Reflections. The Characteristics were reissued in ten other editions before the end of the century, and were translated into French and German. Ill-health having compelled him to seek a warmer climate, this independent thinker died in Naples at the age of forty-two.

The style of Shaftesbury is studied and rhythmical, sometimes even artificial and affected; he too obviously bestowed great pains on the construction of his sentences. It was of purpose that he exchanged continuity, precision, and simplicity for artistic discursiveness; and in order to display the nobleman in the author, he assumes at times an air which suggests the superfineness and superficiality of the virtuoso, deliberately proposing 'to regulate his language by the standard of good company.' He was hostile to Locke's philosophy, was an ardent admirer of the ancients, imitated Plato, and preached Stoicism; his Askemata, published in 1901, are mainly texts, with comments, from Epictetus and Marcus Aurelius.

He was fiercely attacked as a deist; and his very vagueness on religious problems allies him with the deists, even if his sceptical or free-andeasy attitude towards Scripture, especially towards the Old Testament, were not plainly apparent. In his style and method of discussion he was unlike the bulk of the deists; he protested against those 'who pay handsome compliments to the Deity,' but 'explode devotion' and leave but little of zeal, affection, or warmth in what they call rational religion. He has more in common with those who later in Germany broke the power of self-complacent rationalism than with the rationalists properly so called. But by his effective, attractive style he influenced thousands untouched by such writers as Collins or Tindal, and greatly promoted the cause the deists had at heart. Like most of the deists, he was a theist, and denounced atheism, though his theism at times seems closely akin to pantheism. His work was, on the whole, a powerful plea for freedom in the search for truth, for frank speech, and for toleration.

Shaftesbury, though he borrowed much from the Greeks, from Cumberland, and from others, may rank as founder of the school of English moralists who, holding virtue and vice as naturally and fundamentally distinct, believe man to be endowed with a 'moral sense' by which these are discriminated and at once approved of or condemned, without reference to the self-interest of him who judges. In opposition to Hobbes, he maintains that the very nature of man leads to the exercise of benevolent and disinterested affections in the social state. Conscience he defines as the 'moral sense,' a phrase of which he is the author, and makes this sense akin to feeling, taste, and sentiment rather than to reason.

This doctrine, left by its founder in a somewhat unsystematic shape, was taken up and developed by Hutcheson, and influenced Hume and Adam Smith. Shaftesbury was attacked in his own time both by the followers of Clarke's 'intellectual system' and by the more thorough utilitarians. The gentle Berkeley railed at him, and the rugged Warburton dissented from his opinions, while warmly praising his character. Butler heartily admired Shaftesbury's support of the 'natural obligation of virtue;' and there is in all his work evidence of sincere, warm, carnest feeling, the outcome of a generous mind. Sidgwick regards the appearance of the Characteristics as a turningpoint in English ethical speculation, and treats its author as 'the first to make psychological experience the basis of ethics;' and Hettner sees in him a power in European thought. A pronounced optimist, Shaftesbury insisted that God should be loved without fear of reward or punishment, and argued that 'religion is still a discipline and the progress of the soul towards perfection,' a thought which, contemplating not merely the individual but the race, contains the germ of Lessing's famous Erziehung des Menschengeschrechtes, and may have suggested this theme to Lessing, who was a diligent student of the Characteristics. Moses Mendelssohn, Herder, and even Kant were influenced by the English per: Leibnitz and Diderot admired him; and so did Voltaire, though he caricatured his optimism in Candide. Gray, on the other hand, speaks scorefully of Shaftesbury's philosophy; and, oddy enough, Pope, who paraphrased Bolingbroke and was Shaftesbury's friend, told Warburton that' the Characteristics had done more harm to revealed religion in England than all the works of infidelity Yet it is impossible not to see that put together.' Shaftesbury's philosophy was the foundation of Bolingbroke's. Mackintosh, who rightly though Shaftesbury's ethical work had at first been admired beyond its literary or philosophical merits, and had next been too unsparingly condemned or still more unjustly neglected, somewhat extravaganty said of the first passage quoted below from The Moralists, 'that there is scarcely any composition in our language more lofty in its moral and religious sentiments, or more exquisitely elegant and musical in its diction.'

From 'Advice to an Author.'

One who aspires to the character of a man of breeding and politeness is careful to form his judgment of six and sciences upon right models of perfection. If he travels to Rome, he inquires which are the truest pieces of architecture, the best remains of statues, the best punitings of a Raphael or a Carache [Caracci]. However antiquated, rough, or dismal they may appear to him at first sight, he resolves to view them over and over, till be his brought himself to relish them, and finds their hidden graces and perfections. He takes particular care to turn his eye from every thing which is gaudy, luacious, and of a false taste. Nor is he less careful to turn his eye from every sort of musick besides that which is of the best manner and truest harmony.

"Twere to be wished we had the same regard to a right taste in hie and manners. What mortal being once convinced of a difference in inward character, and of a preference due to one kind above another, would not be concerned to make his own the best? If civility and humanity be a taste; if brutality, insolence, riot, be in the same manner a taste, who, if he could reflect, would not chuse to form himself on the amiable and agreeable rather than the othous and perverse model? Who would not endeavour to force nature as well in this respect as in what relates to a taste or judgment in other and and sciences? For in each place the force on nature is used only for its redress. If a natural good taste be not already formed in us, why should not we endeavour to form it, and become natural?

'I like! I fancy! I admire! How? By accident: or as I please. No. But I learn to fancy, to admire, to please, as the subjects themselves are deserving and can bear me out. Otherwise, I like at this hour, but dislike the next. I shall be weary of my pursuit, and, upon experience, find little pleasure in the main, if my choice and judgment in it be from no other rule than that single one, because I please. Grotesque and monstrous figures often please. Cruel spectacles and barbarities are also found to please, and, in some tempers, to please beyond all other subjects. But is this pleasure right? And shall I follow it if it presents? Not strive with it, or endeavour to prevent its growth or prevalency in my temper?—How stands the case in a more soft and flattering kind of pleasure?—Effeminacy pleases me. The Indian figures, the Japan-work, the en mel strikes my eye. The luscious colours and glossy paint gain upon my fancy. A French or Flemish style is highly liked by me, at first sight; and I pursue my liking. But what ensues?-Do I not for ever forfeit my good relish? How is it possible I should thus come to taste the beauties of an Italian master, or of a hand happily formed on nature and the antients? 'Tis not by wantonness and humour that I shall attain my end, and arrive at the enjoyment I propose. The art itself is severe: the rules rigid. And if I expect the knowledge should come to me by accident, or in play, I shall be grossly deluded, and prove myself, at best, a mock-virtuoso, or mere pedant of the kind.'

Here therefore we have once again exhibited our moral science in the same method and manner of soliloquy as above. To this correction of humour and formation of a taste, our reading, if it be of the right sort, must principally contribute. Whatever company we keep, or however polite and agreeable their characters may be with whom we converse or correspond, if the authors we read are of another kind, we shall find our palate strangely turned their way. We are the unhappier in this respect for being scholars if our studies be ill chosen. Nor can I, for this reason, think it proper to call a man well-read who reads many authors, since he must of nece-sity have more ill models than good, and be more stuffed with bombast, ill fancy, and wry thought, than filled with solid sense and just imagination.

But notwithstanding this hazard of our taste from a multiplicity of reading, we are not, it seems, the least scrupulous in our choice of subject. We read whatever comes next us. What was first put into our hand when we were young, serves us afterwards for serious study and wise research, when we are old. We are many of us, indeed, so grave as to continue this exercise of youth through our remaining life. The exercising authors of this kind have been above described, in the beginning of this treatise. The manner of exercise is called meditation, and is of a sort so solemn and profound, that we dare not so much as thorowly examine the subject on which we are bid to meditate. This is a sort of task-reading, in which a taste is not permitted. How little soever we take of this diet, 'tis sufficient to give full exercise to our grave humour, and allay the appetite towards further research and solid contemplation. The rest is holiday, diversion, play, and fancy. We reject all rule: as thinking it an injury to our diversions to have regard to truth or nature: without which, however, nothing can be truly agreeable or entertaining, much less instructive or improving. Through a certain surfeit taken in a wrong kind of serious reading, we apply ourselves, with full content, to the most ridiculous. The more remote our pattern is from any thing moral or profitable, the more freedom and satisfaction we find in it. We care not how Gothick or barbarous our models are; what illdesigned or monstrous figures we view; or what false proportions we trace, or see described in history, romance, or fiction. And thus our eye and ear is lost. Our relish or taste must of necessity grow barbarous whilst barbarian customs, savage manners, Indian wars, and wonders of the terra incognita employ our leisure hours, and are the chief materials to furnish out a library.

These are in our present days what books of chivalry were in those of our forefathers. I know not what faith our valiant ancestors may have had in the stories of their giants, their dragons, and St Georges. But for our faith indeed as well as our taste, in this other way of reading, I must confess I can't consider it without astonishment.

It must certainly be something else than incredulity which fashions the taste and judgment of many gentlemen, whom we hear censured as atheists for atte pting to philosophize after a newer manner than any known of late. For my own part, I have ever thought this sort of men to be in general more credulous, though after another manner, than the mere vulgar Besides what I have observed in conversation with the men of this character, I can produce many anathematized authors who, if they want a true Israelitish faith, can make amends by a Chinese or Indian one. If they are short in Syria or the Palestine, they have their full measure in America or Japin. Histories of Incas or Iroquois written by friars and missionaries, pirates and renegades, sea-captains and trusty travellers, pass for authentick records, and are canonical, with the virtuosos of this sort. Though Christian miracles may not so well satisfy them, they dwell with the highest contentment on the prodigies of Moorish and pagan countries. They have far more pleasure in hearing the monstrous accounts of monstrous men and manners, than the politest and best narrations of the affairs, the governments, and lives of the wisest and most polished people.

'Tis the same taste which makes us preser a Turkish history to a Grecian or a Roman, an Ariosto to a Virgil, and a romance or novel to an Iliad. We have no regard to the character or genius of our author: nor are so far curious as to observe how able he is in the judgment of facts, or how ingenious in the texture of his lies. For facts unably related, though with the greatest sincerity and good faith, may prove the worst sort of deceit: and mere lies, judiciously composed, can teach us the truth of things beyond any other manner. to amuse ourselves with such authors as neither know how to lie nor tell truth, discovers a taste which methinks one should not be apt to envy. Yet so enchanted we are with the travelling memoirs of any casual adventurer, that, be his character or genius what it will, we have no sooner turned over a page or two than we begin to interest curselves highly in his affairs. No sooner has he taken shipping at the mouth of the Thames, or sent his baggage before him to Gravesend or buoy in the Nore, than strait our attention is earnestly taken up. If in order to his more distant travels he takes some part of Europe in his way, we can with patience hear of inns and ordinaries, passage-boats and ferries, foul and fair weather; with all the particulars of the author's diet, habit of body, his personal dangers and mischances on land and sea. And thus full of desire and hope we accompany him till he enters on his great scene of action, and begins by the description of some enormous fish or beast. From monstrous brutes he proceeds to yet more monstrous men. For in this race of authors he is ever completest and of the first rank who is able to speak of things the most unnatural and monstrous.

This humour our old tragick poet seems to have discovered. He hit our taste in giving us a Moorish hero, full fraught with prodigy: a wondrous story-teller! But for the attentive part, the poet chose to give it to woman-kind. What passionate reader of travels or student in the prodigious sciences can refuse to pity that fair lady who fell in love with the miraculous Moor; especially considering with what suitable grace such a lover could relate the most monstrous adventures and satisfy the wondering appetite with the most wondrous tales; wherein (says the hero-traveller):

'Of antres vast and deserts idle . . .

It was my hint to speak . . .

And of the cannibals that each other eat.

The anthropophags and men whose heads

Do grow beneath their shoulders. This to hear

Would Desdemona seriously incline.'

Seriously, 'twas a woful tale ! unfit, one would think, to win a tender fair-one. It's true, the poet sufficiently condemns her fancy, and makes her (poor lady!) pay clearly for it in the end. But why, amongst his Greek names, he should have chosen one which denoted the lady superstitious [deiridaimonia in Greek means superstition] I can't imagine: unless, as poets are sometimes prophets too, he should figuratively, under this dark type, have represented to us that about a hundred years after his time, the fair sex of this island should. by other monstrous tales, be so seduced as to turn their favour chiefly on the persons of the tale-tellers, and change their natural inclination for fair, candid, and courteous knights into a passion for a mysterious race of black enchanters, such as of old were said to creep into houses and lead captive silly women.

'Tis certain there is a very great affinity between the passion of superstation and that of tales. The love of Strange narrations and the ardent appetite towards unnatural objects has a near alliance with the like appetite towards the supernatural kind, such as are called prodigious and of dire omen. For so the mind forebodes on every such unusual sight or hearing. Fate, destiny, or the anger of Heaven seems denoted and as it were delineated by the monstrous birth, the horrid fact, or dire event. For this reason the very persons of such relators or tale-tellers, with a small help of dismal habit, suitable countenance and tone, become sacred and tremendous in the eyes of mortals who are thus addicted from their youth. The tender virgins, losing their natural softness, assume this tragick passion, of which they are highly susceptible, especially when a suitable kind of eloquence and action attends the character of the narrator. A thousand Desdemona's are then ready to present themselves, and would frankly resign fathers, relations, countrymen, and country itself to follow the fortunes of a hero of the black tribe.

But whatever monstrous zeal or superstitious passion the poet might foretell, either in the gentlemen, ladies, or common people of an after age, 'tis certain that as to books the same Moorish fancy in its plain and literal sense prevails strongly at this present time. Monsters and monsterlands were never more in request: And we may often see a philosopher or a wit run a talegathering in those idle deserts, as familiarly as the silliest woman or merest boy.

The Nobler Love.

'You shall find then, said I (taking a grave air), that it is possible for me to be serious, and that 'tis probable I am growing so, for good and all. Your over-seriousness awhile since, at such an unseasonable time, may have driven me perhaps into a contrary extreme, by opposition to your melancholy humour. But I have now a better idea of that melancholy you discovered; and notwithstanding the humorous turn you were pleased to great, I am persuaded it has a different foundation from any of those fantastical causes I then assigned to it. Low, doubtless, is at the bottom: but a nobler love than such as common beauties inspire.

Here in my turn I began to raise my voice, and imitate the solemn way you had been teaching me. 'Knowing as you are, continued I, well-knowing and experienced in all the degrees and orders of beauty, in all the mysterious charms of the particular forms, you rise to what is more general; and with a larger heart, and mind more comprehensive, you generously seek that which is highest in the kind. Not captivated by the lineaments of a fair face, or the well-drawn proportions of a human body, you view the life itself, and embrace rather the mind which adds the lustre, and renders chiefly amiable.

'Nor is the enjoyment of such a single beauty sufficient to satisfy such an aspiring soul. It seeks how to combine more beauties, and by what coalition of these to form a beautiful society. It views communities, friendships, relations, duties, and considers by what harmony of particular minds the general harmony is composed and commonweal established.

'Nor satisfied even with publick good in one community of men, it frames itself a nobler object, and with enlarged affection seeks the good of mankind. It dwells with pleasure amidst that reason and those orders on which this fair correspondence and goodly interest is established. Laws, constitutions, civil and religious rites; whatever civilizes or polishes rude mankind; the sciences and arts, philosophy, morals, virtue; the flourishing state of human affairs, and the perfection of human nature; these are its delightful prospects, and this the charm of beauty which attracts it.

'Still ardent in this pursuit (such is its love of order and perfection), it rests not here, nor satisfies itself with the beauty of a part; but extending further its communicative bounty, seeks the good of all, and affects the interest and prosperity of the whole. True to its native world and higher country, 'tis here it seeks order and perfection, wishing the best, and hoping still to find a just and wise administration.

'And since all hope of this were vain and idle if no universal mind presided, since without such a supreme intelligence and providential care the distracted universe must be condemned to suffer infinite calamities, 'tis here the generous mind labours to discover that healing cause by which the interest of the whole is securely established, the beauty of things, and the universal order happily sustained.

'This, Palemon, is the labour of your soul, and this immelancholy, when, unsuccessfully pursuing the supreme beauty, it meets with darkning clouds which intercept its sight. Monsters arise—not those from Lybian deserts, but from the heart of man more fertile—and with their horrid aspect cast an unseemly reflection upon nature. She, helpless (as she is thought) and working thus absurdly, is contemned, the government of the world arraigned, and Deity made void.

'Much is alledged in answer to shew why nature era, and how she came thus impotent and erring from an unerring hand. But I deny she errs; and when she seems most ignorant or perverse in her productions, I ter even then as wise and provident as in her it works. For 'tis not then that men complain vorld's order, or abhor the face of things, when various interests mixed and interfering; natures nate, of different kinds, opposed one to another, their different operations submitted, the higher ower. 'Tis, on the contrary, from this order of and superior things that we admire the world's founded thus on contrarieties: whilst from such and disagreeing principles a universal concord lished.

s in the several orders of terrestrial forms a ion is required, a sacrifice and mutual yielding of one to another. The vegetables by their death the animals; and animal bodies dissolved enrich th and raise again the vegetable world. The ns insects are reduced by the superior kinds of nd beasts: and these again are checked by man, his turn submits to other natures, and resigns his sacrifice in common to the rest of things. And tures so little exalted or pre-eminent above each ne sacrifice of interests can appear so just, how nore reasonably may all inferior natures be subp the superior nature of the world! That world, n, which even now transported you when the inting light gave way to these bright constelland left you this wide system to contemplate.

e are those laws which ought not, nor can submit hing below. The central powers, which hold the orbs in their just poize and movement, must not rouled to save a fleeting form, and rescue from tipice a puny animal, whose brittle frame, however al, must of itself so soon dissolve. The ambient inward vapours, the impending meteors, or whates is nutrimental or preservative of this earth, wrate in a natural course: and other constitutions ibmit to the good habit and constitution of the tining globe.

us not therefore wonder if by earthquakes, pestilential blasts, nether or upper fires, or the animal kinds are oft afflicted, and whole perhaps involved at once in common rain: but as let us account it strange if, either by outward or some interior wound from hostile matter, ar animals are deformed even in their first con, when the disease invades the seats of generation, ninal parts are injured and obstructed in their labours. 'Tis then alone that monstrous shapes: nature still working as before, and not perversely neously; not faintly, or with feeble endeavours; rpower'd by a superior rival, and by another justly conquering force.

need we wonder if the interior form, the soul nper, partakes of this occasional deformity, and hizes often with its close partner. Who is there ender either at the sicknesses of sense, or the ty of minds inclosed in such frail bodies, and ent on such pervertible organs?

re then is that solution you require, and hence reming blemishes cast upon nature. Nor is there in this beside what is natural and good. "Tis thich is predominant; and every corruptible and nature by its mortality and corruption yields only e better, and all in common to that best and nature, which is incorruptible and immortal."

(From Port 1. of The Maralutts.)

Of Dialogue.

This brings to my mind a reason I have often sought for, why we moderns, who abound so much in treatises and essays, are so sparing in the way of dialogue, which heretofore was found the politest and best way of managing even the graver subjects. The truth is, 'twould be an abominable falshood and belying of the age to put so much good sense together in any one conversation as might make it hold out steadily and with plain coherence for an hour's time, till any one subject had been rationally examined.

(From The Moralists.)

Of Temperance.

I own (said I) I am far from thinking temperance so disagreeable a character. As for this part of virtue, I think there is no need of taking it on any other terms to recommend it than the mere advantage of being sav'd from intemperance, and from the desire of things unnecessary.

How I said Theocles, are you thus far advanc'd? And can you carry this temperance so far as to estates and honours, by opposing it to avarice and ambition?—Nay, then truly, you may be said to have fairly embark'd your-self in this cause. You have pass'd the channel, and are more than half-seas over.

(From The Moralists.)

Religion a Discipline and Progress of the Soul.

Now whether our friend be unfeignedly and sincerely of this latter sort of real theologists, you will learn best from the consequences of his hypothesis. You will observe whether, instead of ending in mere speculation, it leads to practice: and you will then surely be satisfied, when you see such a structure raised as with the generality of the world must pass at least for high religion, and with some, in all likelihood, for no less than enthusiasm.

For I appeal to you, Philocles, whether there be any thing in divinity which you think has more the air of enthusiasm than that notion of divine love, such as separates from everything worldly, sensual, or meanly-interested? A love which is simple, pure, and unmixed; which has no other object than merely the excellency of that Being itself, nor admits of any other thought of happiness than in its single fruition. Now I dare presume you will take it as a substantial proof of my friend's being far enough from irreligion if it be shewn that he has espoused this notion, and thinks of making out this high point of divinity, from arguments familiar even to those who oppose religion.

According therefore to his hypothesis, he would in the first place, by way of prevention, declare to you, that though the disinterested love of God were the most excellent principle, yet he knew very well that by the indiscreet zeal of some devout well-meaning people it had been stretched too far, perhaps even to extravagance and enthusiasm; as formerly among the mysticks of the antient church, whom these of latter days have followed. On the other hand, that there were those who in opposition to this devout mystick way, and as professed enemies to what they call enthusiasm, had so far exploded everything of this eestatick kind as in a manner to have given up devotion, and in reality had left so little of zeal, affection, or warmth in what they call their rational religion as to make them much suspected of their sincertty in any. For though it be natural enough (he would tell you) for a mere political writer to ground his great argument for religion on the necessity of such a belief as that of a future reward and punishment; yet, if you will take his opinion, 'tis a very ill token of sincerity in religion, and in the Christian religion more especially, to reduce it to such a philsophy as will allow no room to that other principle of love, but treats all of that kind as enthusiasm, for so much as aiming at what is called disinterestedness, or teaching the love of God or virtue for God or virtue's sake.

Here then we have two sorts of people (according to my friend's account) who in these opposite extremes expose religion to the insults of its adversaries. For as on one hand 'twill be found difficult to defend the notion of that high-raised love espoused with so much warmth by those devout mysticks; so, on the other hand, 'twill be found as hard a task, upon the principles of these cooler men, to guard religion from the imputation of mercenariness and a slavish spirit. For how shall one deny that to serve God by compulsion, or for interest merely, is servile and mercenary? Is it not evident that the only true and liberal service paid either to that supreme Being, or to any other superior, is that 'which proceeds from an esteem or love of the person served, a sense of duty or gratitude, and a love of the dutiful and grateful part, as good and amiable in itself'? where is the injury to religion from such a concession as this? Or what detraction is it from the belief of an after-reward or punishment to own 'that the service caused by it is not equal to that which is voluntary and with inclination, but is rather disingenuous and of the slavish kind'? Is it not still for the good of mankind and of the world that obedience to the rule of right should some way or other be paid; if not in the better way, yet at least in this imperfect one? And is it not to be shewn, 'that although this service of fear be allowed ever so low or base, yet religion still being a discipline and progress of the soul towards perfection, the motive of reward and punishment is primary and of the highest moment with us; till, being capable of more sublime instruction, we are led from this servile state to the generous service of affection and love'?

To this it is that in our friend's opinion we ought all of us to aspire, so as to endeavour 'that the excellence of the object, not the reward or punishment, should be our motive: but that where, through the corruption of our nature, the former of these motives is found insufficient to excite to virtue, there the latter should be brought in aid, and on no account be undervalued or neglected.'

John Gay.

Italian opera and English pastorals were driven out of the field at this time by easy, indolent, good-humoured John Gay (1685-1732), most artless and best beloved of all the Pope and Swift circle of wits and poets. Gay was born at Barnstaple, younger son of an impoverished house. Both parents dying when he was about ten years old, he was, after receiving his education in the free grammar-school of his native town, put apprentice to a silk-mercer in London; but disliking this employment, he at length obtained his discharge from his master. In 1708 he published a poem in blank verse entitled Wine; in 1712 he became domestic secretary to the Duchess of Monmouth; and in 1713 appeared his Rural Sports, dedicated to Pope, in which we may trace his joy at emancipation from shopkeeping:

But I, who ne'er was blessed by Fortune's hand, Nor brightened ploughshares in paternal land; Long in the noisy town have been immured, Respired its smoke, and all its cares endured. . . . Fatigued at last, a calm retreat I chose, - And soothed my harassed mind with sweet repose, Where fields, and shades, and the refreshing clime Inspire the sylvan song, and prompt my rhyme.

A comedy, The Wife of Bath (1713), was not Then came a trivial poem in three successful. books entitled The Fan. The Shepherd's Week, in Six Pastorals (1714), was written to throw ridicule on those of Ambrose Philips, but contains so much genuine comic humour and such entertaining pictures of country-life that it became popular, not as satire, but as affording 'a prospect of his own country.' In an address to the 'courteous reader' Gay says: 'Thou wilt not find my shepherdesses idly piping on oaten reeds, but milking the kine, tying up the sheaves, or if the hogs are astray, driving them to their sties. My shepherd gathereth none other nosegays but what are the growth of our own fields; he sleepeth not under myrtle shades, but under a hedge; nor doth he vigilantly defend his flocks from wolves, This 'historical' view because there are none.' of rural life was imitated by Allan Ramsay, and was followed by Crabbe with a moral aim to which Gay never aspired. In February 1715 appeared The What d'ye Call It? a tragi-comi-pastoral farce, which the audience had 'not wit enough to take; ' and next year, assisted by hints from Swift, Gay produced his mock-heroic Trivia; or, the Art of Walking the Streets of London, in which he gives a graphic account of the dangers and impediments then encountered in traversing the narrow, crowded, ill-lighted, and vice-infested thoroughfares of the metropolis. His pictures of City-life are in the Dutch style, familiar but forcibly drawn. Here is

The Bookstall.

Volumes on sheltered stalls expanded lie,
And various science lures the learned eye;
The bending shelves with ponderous scholiasts groan,
And deep divines, to modern shops unknown;
Here, like the bee that on industrious wing
Collects the various odours of the spring,
Walkers at leisure learning's flowers may spoil,
Nor watch the wasting of the midnight oil;
May morals snatch from Plutarch's tattered page,
A mildewed Bacon, or Stagyra's sage:
Here sauntering 'prentices o'er Otway weep,
O'er Congreve smile, or over D'Urfey sleep;

Pleased sempstresses the Lock's famed Rape unfold;
And Squirts read Garth till apozems grow cold.

Squirt is the name of an apothecary's boy in Garth's Dispensary;

During the great frost in London in 1716 a fair was held on the river Thames:

O roving Muse! recall that wondrous year When winter reigned in bleak Britannia's air; When hoary Thames, with frosted osiers crowned, Was three long moons in icy fetters bound. The waterman, forlorn, along the shore, Pensive reclines upon his useless our: See harnessed steeds desert the stony town, And wander roads unstable, not their own, Wheels o'er the hardened waters smoothly glide. And raze with whitened tracks the slippery tide; Here the fat cook piles high the blazing fire, And scarce the spit can turn the steer entire; Booths sudden hide the Thames, long streets appear, And numerous games proclaim the crowded fair. So, when a general bids the martial train Spread their encampment o'er the spacious plain, Thick-rising tents a canvas city build, And the loud dice resound through all the field.

Gay was always sighing for public employment, for which he was eminently unfit, and in 1714 he had a glimpse of fancied happiness. He wrote with joy to Pope: 'Since you went out of the town, my Lord Clarendon was appointed envoy-extraordinary to Hanover, in the room of Lord Paget; and by making use of those friends which I entirely owe to you, he has accepted me for his secretary.' Quitting his situation with the Duchess of Monmouth, he accompanied Lord Clarendon on his embassy, but seems to have held the new post only for about two months; in the same year Pope welcomed him to his native soil, and counselled him, now that the queen was dead, to 'write something on the king, or prince, or princess.' The anxious expectant of court favour complied with Pope's request, and wrote a poem entitled An Epistle to a Lady [probably Mrs Howard]: Occasioned by the Arrival of Her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales, whom he had seen at Hanover]; and, as a consequence, the Princess and her husband went to see his play of The What d' ye Call It? Gay was stimulated to another dramatic attempt (1717), and produced Three Hours After Marriage, but some personal satire and indecent dialogue, together with the improbability of the plot, sealed its fate. It soon fell into disgrace; and its author, afraid that Pope and Arbuthnot would suffer from their connection with it, took all the blame on himself. Nevertheless the trio of friendly wits were attacked in two pamphlets, and Pope's quartel with Cibber originated in this unlucky drama. Gay was silent and dejected for some time; but in 1720 he published his poems by subscription, and realised £1000. He also received a present of South Sea stock, and was supposed to be worth £20,000, all of which he lost by the collapse of that famous delusion. This serious calamity almost overwhelmed a wit fond of finery and of luxurious living, but his friends were zealous, and he was prompted to further literary exertion. In 1724 he brought out another drama, The Captives, which was acted with moderate success; and in 1727 he wrote a volume of Fables. designed for the edification of the Duke of Cumberland (then a boy of six), who does not seem to have learnt mercy or humanity from them. The accession of the prince and princess to the throne seemed to augur well for Gay's fortunes; but he was only offered the situation of gentleman-usher to the little Princess Louisa, a child under three, and considering this an insult, he rejected it. In 1726 Swift had come to England, and lived two months with Pope at Twickenham. At this or some earlier date, the Dean had suggested to Gay the idea of a Newgate pastoral, in which the characters should be thieves and highwaymen; and The Beggar's Opera was the result. The two friends were doubtful of the success of the piece, but it was received with unbounded applause. The songs and music aided greatly its popularity, and there was also the recommendation of political satire; for the quarrel between Peachum and Lockit was accepted as an allusion to a personal collision between Walpole and his colleague, Lord Townshend. The spirit and variety of the piece, in which song and sentiment are cheerfully intermixed with vice and roguery, still render the Beggar's Opera a favourite with the public; but as Gay succeeded in making highwaymen agreeable and even attractive, it can hardly be commended for its moral tendency-a matter of little account with the epicurean playwright, who was, in Pope's words-

Of manners gentle, of affections mild; In wit a man, simplicity a child.

The opera had a run of sixty-two nights, became the rage of town and country, and had also the effect of giving rise to the English opera, a species of light comedy enlivened by songs and music, which for a time supplanted the Italian opera, with all its exotic and elaborate graces. By this successful opera Gay, as appears from the manager's account-book, cleared £693, 13s. 6d. besides what he derived from its publication. He tried a sequel to the Beggar's Opera, under the title of Polly; but as it was supposed to contain sarcasms on the court, the Lord Chamberlain prohibited its representation. The author had recourse to publication; and such was the zeal of his friends and the effect of party-spirit that Polly produced a profit of £1100 or £1200. Henrietta, Duchess of Marlborough, gave £100 as her subscription for a copy. Gay had now amassed £3000 by his writings, which he resolved to keep 'entire and sacred.' He was at the same time received into the house of his kind patrons the Duke and Duchess of Queensberry, with whom he spent the remainder of his life. His only literary occupation was composing additional fables, and corresponding occasionally with Pope and Swift. A sudden attack of inflam-matory fever carried him off in three days. Pope's letter to Swift announcing the event was endorsed: 'On my dear friend Mr Gay's death. Received, December 15th, but not read till the 20th, by an impulse foreboding some misfortune.' And nothing in Swift's life is more touching or honourable to his memory than those passages in his letters where the recollection of his friend melted his haughty stoicism. Gay was buried in Westminster Abbey, where a costly monument erected by the Duke and Duchess of Queensberry bears his own lines:

> Life is a jest, and all things show it: I thought so once, and now I know it.

The works of this genial son of the Muses, which have lost much of their popularity, show the licentiousness without the elegance of Prior. His Fables are still the best we possess; and if they have not the rich humour and archness of La Fontaine's, they are light and pleasing, and are always smooth in versification. The Hare with Many Friends is doubtless drawn from the fabulist's own experience. In the Court of Death he tries a higher flight, and marshals his 'diseases dire' with strong and gloomy power. His song of Black-eyed Susan and the 'ballad' beginning "Twas when the seas were roaring" are full of characteristic tenderness and lyrical melody. This ballad (in the then usual sense of the word) was said by Cowper to have been the joint production of Arbuthnot, Swift, and Gay, but the tradition is not supported by evidence.

The Country Ballad-singer.

Sublimer strains, O rustic Muse 1 prepare;
Forget awhile the barn and dairy's care;
Thy homely voice to loftier numbers raise,
The drunkard's flights require sonorous lays;
With Bowzybeus' songs exalt thy verse,
While rocks and woods the various notes rehearse.

'Twas in the season when the reapers' toil
Of the ripe harvest 'gan to rid the soil;
Wide through the field was seen a goodly rost,
Clean damsels bound the gathered sheaves about;
The lads with sharpened hook and sweating brow
Cut down the labours of the winter plough.

When fast asleep they Bowzybeus spied,
His hat and oaken staff lay close beside;
That Bowzybeus who could sweetly sing,
Or with the rosined bow torment the string;
That Bowzybeus who, with finger's speed,
Could call soft warblings from the breathing reed;
That Bowzybeus who, with jocund tongue,
Ballads, and roundelays, and catches sung:
They loudly laugh to see the damsel's fright,
And in disport surround the drunken wight.

Ah, Bowzybee, why didst thou stay so long? The mugs were large, the drink was wondrous strong! Thou shouldst have left the fair before 'twas night, But thou sat'st toping till the morning light...,

No sooner 'gan he raise his tuneful song But lads and lasses round about him throng. Not ballad-singer placed above the crowd Sings with a note so shrilling sweet and loud; Nor parish-clerk, who calls the psalm so clear, Like Bowzybeus soothes the attentive car.

Of Nature's laws his carols first begun-Why the grave owl can never face the sun. For owls, as swains observe, detest the light, And only sing and seek their prey by night. How turnips hide their swelling heads below, And how the closing coleworts upwards grow; How Will a-Wisp misleads night-faring clowns O'er hills, and sinking bogs, and pathless downs. Of stars he told that shoot with shining trail, And of the glowworm's light that gilds his tail. He sung where woodcocks in the summer feed, And in what climates they renew their breed-Some think to northern coasts their flight they tend, Or to the moon in midnight hours ascend -Where swallows in the winter's season keep, And how the drowsy bat and domnouse sleep; How Nature does the puppy's eyelid close Till the bright sun has nine times set and rose (For huntamen by their long experience find That puppies still nine rolling suns are blind).

Now he goes on, and sings of fairs and shows, For still new fairs before his eyes arose. How pedlers' stalls with glittering toys are laid. The various fairings of the country maid. Long silken laces hang upon the twine, And rows of pins and amber bracelets shine; How the tight lass knives, combs, and scissors spies, And looks on thimbles with desiring eyes. Of lotteries next with tuneful note he told, Where silver spoons are won, and rings of gold. The lads and lasses trudge the street along. And all the fair is crowded in his song. The mountebank now treads the stage, and solls.

ls, his balsams, and his ague-spells; er and o'er the nimble tumbler springs, the rope the venturous maiden swings; udding, in his parti-coloured jacket, the glove, and jokes at every packet. e-shows he sung, and Punch's feats, kets picked in crowds, and various cheats. D'Oily or Doyley, who gave name to a kind of woollen stuff 'at once cheap and genteel,' and to ornamental napkins, was a linendraper who had a shop in the Strand. White's was a chocolatehouse in St James's Street.

Song.

Virgins are like the fair flower in its lustre, Which in the garden enamels the ground; Near it the bees, in play, flutter and cluster, And gaudy butterflies frolic around.

But when once plucked, 'tis no longer alluring,
To Covent Garden 'tis sent (as yet sweet),
There fades, and shrinks, and grows past all enduring,
Rots, stinks, and dies, and is trod under feet.

(From The Beggar's Opera.)

There is a close parallel to this in the words of Effie Deans in the Heart of Mid-Lothiam: 'I thought o' the bonny bit thorn that our father rooted out o' the yard last M 19, when it had a' the flush o' blossoms on it; and then it lay in the court till the beasts had trod them a' to pieces wi' their feet. I little thought when I was wae for the bit silly green bush and its flowers, that I was to gang the same gate mysell.'

The Court of Death.

Death, on a solemn night of state,
In all his pomp of terror sate:
The attendants of his gloomy reign,
Diseases dire, a ghastly train!
Crowd the vast court. With hollow tone,
A voice thus thundered from the throne:
'This night our minister we name;
Let every servant speak his claim;
Merit shall bear this ebon wand.'
All, at the word, stretched forth their hand.

Fever, with burning heat possessed,
Advanced, and for the wand addressed:
'I to the weekly bills appeal;
Let those express my fervent zeal;
On every slight occasion near,
With violence I persevere.'

Next Gout appears with limping pace, Pleads how he shifts from place to place; From head to foot how swift he flies, And every joint and sinew plies; Still working when he seems supprest, A most tenacious stubborn guest.

A haggard spectre from the crew Crawls forth, and thus asserts his due: ''Tis I who taint the sweetest joy, And in the shape of Love destroy. My shanks, sunk eyes, and noseless face, Prove my pretension to the place.'

Stone urged his evergrowing force;
And, next, Consumption's meagre corse,
With feeble vo.ce that scarce was heard,
Broke with short coughs, his suit preferred:
'Let none object my lingering way;
I gain, like Fabius, by delay;
Fatigue and weaken every foe
By long attack, secure, though slow.'
Plague represents his rapid power,

Who thinned a nation in an hour. All spoke their claim, and hoped the wand. Now expectation hushed the band, When thus the monarch from the throne: 'Merit was ever modest known. What! no physician speak his right? None here! but fees their toils requite. Let, then, Intemperance take the wand, Who fills with gold their zealous hand. You, Fever, Gout, and all the rest-Whom wary men as foes detest-Forego your claim. No more pretend; Intemperance is esteemed a friend; He shares their mirth, their social joys, And as a courted guest destroys. The charge on him must justly fall, Who finds employment for you all.'

The Hare with Many Friends.

Friendship, like love, is but a name, Unless to one you stint the flame. The child whom many fathers share, Hath seldom known a father's care. 'Tis thus in friendship; who depend On many, rarely find a friend.

A Hare, who, in a civil way, Complied with everything, like Gay, Was known by all the bestial train Who haunt the wood or graze the plain. Her care was never to offend, And every creature was her friend.

As forth she went at early dawn, To taste the dew-besprinkled lawn, Behind she hears the hunter's cries, And from the deep-mouthed thunder flies: She starts, she stops, she pants for breath; She hears the near advance of death; She doubles, to mislead the hound, And measures ba k her mazy round; Till, fainting in the public way, Half dead with fear she gasping lay; What transport in her bosom grew When first the Horse appeared in view! 'Let me,' says she, 'your back ascend, And owe my safety to a friend. You know my feet betray my flight; To friendship every burden's light.' The Horse replied: 'Poor honest Puss, It grieves my heart to see thee thus; Be comforted; relief is near, For all your friends are in the rear.' She next the stately Bull implored,

And thus replied the mighty lord:

'Since every beast alive can tell
That I sincerely wish you well,
I may, without offence, pretend
To take the freedom of a friend.
Love calls me hence; a favourite cow
Expects me near yon barley-mow;
And when a lady's in the case,
You know, all other things give place.
To leave you thus might seem unkind;
But see, the Goat is just behind.'

The Goat remarked her pulse was high, Her languid head, her heavy eye; 'My back,' says he, 'may do you harm; The Sheep's at hand, and wool is warm.'

The Sheep was feeble, and complained His sides a load of wool sustained: Said he was slow, confessed his fears, For hounds eat sheep as well as hares.

She now the trotting Calf addressed, To save from death a friend distressed. 'Shall I,' says he, 'of tender age, In this important care engage? Older and abler passed you by; How strong are those, how weak am I! Should I presume to bear you hence, Those friends of mine may take offence. Excuse me, then. You know my heart; But dearest friends, alas! must part. How shall we all lament! Adieu! For, see, the hounds are just in view!'

Song-Black-eyed Susan.

All in the downs the fleet was moored,
The streamers waving in the wind,
When Black-eyed Susan came aboard,
'Oh! where shall I my true love find?
Tell me, ye jovial sailors, tell me true,
If my sweet William sails among the crew?'

William, who high upon the yard
Rocked with the billow to and fro,
Soon as her well-known voice he heard,
He sighed, and cast his eyes below:
The cord slides swiftly through his glowing hand
And, quick as lightning, on the deck he stands

So the sweet lark, high poised in air,
Shuts close his pinions to his breast—
If chance his mate's shrill call he hear—
And drops at once into her nest.
The noblest captain in the British fleet
Might envy William's lips those kisses sweet.

'O Susan, Susan, lovely dear,
My vows shall ever true remain;
Let me kiss off that falling tear;
We only part to meet again.
Change as ye list, ye winds! my heart shall be
The faithful compass that still points to thee.

'Believe not what the landmen say,
Who tempt with doubts thy constant mind;
They'll tell thee, sailors, when away,
In every port a mistress find:
Yes, yes, believe them when they tell thee so,
For thou art present wheresoe'er I go.

If to fair India's coast we sail,
Thy eyes are seen in diamonds bright,
hy breath is Afric's spicy gale,
Thy skin is ivory so white.
hus every beauteous object that I view
Vakes in my soul some charm of lovely Sue.

Though battle call me from thy arms,
Let not my pretty Susan mourn;
hough cannons roar, yet, safe from harms,
William shall to his dear return.
ove turns aside the balls that round me fly,
est precious tears should drop from Susan's eye.'

he boatswain gave the dreadful word;
The sails their swelling bosom spread;
Io longer must she stay aboard;
They kissed—she sighed—he hung his head.
Ier lessening boat unwilling rows to land,
Adieu!' she cries, and waved her lily hand.

Ballad.

'Twas when the seas were roaring
With hollow blasts of wind,
A damsel lay deploring,
All on a rock reclined.
Wide o'er the foaming billows
She cast a wistful look;
Her head was crowned with willows,
That trembled o'er the brook.

'Twelve months are gone and over, And nine long tedious days; Why didst thou, venturous lover, Why didst thou trust the seas? Cease, cease, thou cruel ocean, And let my lover rest: Ah! what's thy troubled motion To that within my breast?

'The merchant, robbed of pleasure, Sees tempests in despair; But what's the loss of treasure, To losing of my dear? Should you some coast be laid on Where gold and diamonds grow, You'd find a richer maiden, But none that loves you so.

'How can they say that nature
Has nothing made in vain;
Why, then, beneath the water,
Should hideous rocks remain?
No eyes the rocks discover
That lurk beneath the deep,
To wreck the wandering lover,
And leave the maid to weep.'

All melancholy lying,
Thus wailed she for her dear;
Repaid each blast with sighing,
Each billow with a tear.
When o'er the white wave stooping
His floating corpse she spied,
Then, like a lily drooping,
She bowed her head, and died.

To Mr Pope, on his having finished his Translation of the Iliad: A Welcome from Greece.

Long hast thou, friend! been absent from my soil,
Like patient Ithacus at siege of Troy;
I have been witness of thy six years toil,
Thy daily labours, and thy night's annoy,
Lost to thy native land, with great turmoil,
On the wide sea, oft threatening to destroy:
Methinks with thee I've trod Sigæan ground,
And heard the shores of Hellespont resound.

Did I not see thee when thou first sett'st sail
To seek adventures fair in Homer's land?
Did I not see thy sinking spirits fail,
And wish thy bark had never left the strand?
Ev'n in mid ocean often didst thou quail,
And oft lift up thy holy eye and hand,
Praying the Virgin dear, and saintly choir,
Back to the port to bring thy bark entire.

Cheer up, my friend! thy dangers now are o'er;
Methinks—nay, sure the rising coasts appear;
Hark! how the guns salute from either shore,
As thy trim vessel cuts the Thames so fair:
Shouts answering shouts from Kent and Essex roar,
And bells break loud through every gust of air:
Bonfires do blaze, and bones and cleavers ring,
As at the coming of some mighty king.

Now pass we Gravesend with a friendly wind,
And Tilbury's white fort, and long Blackwall;
Greenwich, where dwells the friend of human kind,
More visited than or her park or hall,
Withers the good, and (with him ever join'd)
Facetious Disney, greet thee first of all:
I see his chimney smoke, and hear him say,
Duke! that's the room for Pope, and that for Gay.

Come in, my friends! here shall ye dine and lie,
And here shall breakfast, and here dine again;
And sup and breakfast on (if ye comply),
For I have still some dozens of champaign:
His voice still lessens as the ship sails by;
He waves his hand to bring us back in vain:
For now I see, I see proud London's spires;
Greenwich is lost, and Deptford dock retires.

Oh, what a concourse swarms on yonder quay!

The sky re-echoes with new shouts of joy;

By all this show, I ween, 'tis Lord Mayor's day;

I hear the voice of trumpet and hautboy.—

No, now I see them near.—Oh, these are they

Who come in crowds to welcome thee from Troy.

Hail to the bard, whom long as lost we mourn'd;

From siege, from battle, and from storm, return'd!

Of goodly dames, and courteous knights, I view
The silken petticoat, and broider'd vest;
Yea peers, and mighty dukes, with ribbands blue (True blue, fair emblem of unstained breast).
Others I see, as noble, and more true,
By no court-badge distinguish'd from the rest:
First see I Methuen, of sincerest mind,
As Arthur grave, as soft as womankind.

What lady 's that, to whom he gently bends?

Who knows not her? ah! those are Wortley's eyes:

How art thou honour'd, number'd with her friends!

For she distinguishes the good and wise.

The sweet-tongu'd Murray near her side attends;
Now to my heart the glance of Howard flies;
Now Harvey, fair of face, I mark full well,
With thee, youth's youngest daughter, sweet Lepell.

Arbuthnot there I see, in physic's art,
As Galen learn'd, or famed Hippocrate;
Whose company drives sorrow from the heart,
As all disease his medicines dissipate:
Kneller amid the triumph bears his part,
Who could (were mankind lost) anew create:
What can th' extent of his vast soul confine?
A painter, critic, engineer, divine!

How lov'd! how honour'd thou! yet be not vain:
And sure thou art not, for I hear thee say,
All this, my friends, I owe to Homer's strain,
On whose strong pinions I exalt my lay.
What from contending cities did he gain?
And what rewards his grateful country pay?
None, none were paid—why then all this for me?
These honours, Homer, had been just to thee.

Pope's sojourn in Greece was, of course, in spirit only. Major-General Withers and Colonel Disney (familiarly 'Duke' Disney) are buried side by side in Westminster Abbey; Sir Paul Methuen was Secretary of State in 1716-17; 'Arthur' may have been Arthur Moore, Commissioner of Plantations and father of James Moore Smythe, playwright, with whom a few years later Pope had a bitter quarrel; Harvey is John, Lord Hervey; Lady Wortley Montagu and Lady Murray are named along with the Misses Howard and Lepell, maids of honour to Queen Caroline. For Arbuthnot, the famous wit, see page 145. The best edition of Gay's Works, with Life and Notes, is by John Underhill (2 vols. 1893).

Alexander Pope,

born in London 22nd May 1688, claimed to be of gentle blood; his father, he said, was of a gentleman's family in Oxfordshire, the head of which was the Earl of Downe; his mother was the daughter of William Turner, Esq., of York. To this a relative of Pope's added that his grandfather was a clergyman in Hampshire, who had two sons, of whom the younger, also Alexander, the poet's father, was sent to Lisbon to be placed in a mercantile house, and there became a Roman Catholic. It has been ascertained that from 1631 to 1645 an Alexander Pope was rector of Thruxton, and held two other livings in the same county of Hampshire; but as there is no memorial of him in the church, and no entry in the register of his having had children, there is some doubt whether this rector of Thruxton was poet's grandfather. Pope's maternal descent has been clearly traced. His grandfather, William Turner, held property in Yorkshire, including the manor of Towthorpe, which he inherited from his uncle. He was wealthy, but did not rank with the gentry. Of the reputed kinship with the Earls of Downe there is no proof; Pope's story was apparently a fiction. In 1677 the poet's father is found carrying on business as a linenmerchant in London; and having acquired a respectable competency by trade, and additional property by his marriage with Edith Turner, he retired from business before 1700 to a property he had purchased at Binfield near Windsor. The boy was partly educated by the family priest. He was afterwards sent to a Catholic seminary at Twyford near Winchester, where he lampooned his teacher, was severely whipped, and then removed to a small school in London, at which he learned little or nothing. Returning home to Binfield in his thirteenth year, he devoted himself to a course of self-instruction and to the enthusiastic study of literature. He delighted to remember that he had seen Dryden; and as Dryden died on the 1st of May 1700, his youthful admirer could not have been quite twelve years of age. But Pope was already a poet.

As yet a child, nor yet a fool to fame, I lisped in numbers, for the numbers came.

At the age of sixteen he had commenced his Pastorals, translated part of Statius, and written imitations of Waller and other English poets. He soon became acquainted with some of the most eminent persons of the age-with Walsh, Wycherley, Congreve, Lansdowne, and Gard; and from this time his life was that of 1 popular poet enjoying high social distinction His Pastorals were published in Tonson's Mis-In 1711 appeared his Essy cellany in 1709. on Criticism, which is said to have been conposed two years before publication, when he was only twenty-one. Addison commended the Essay warmly in the Spectator, and it soon attained great popularity. Pope's style was now completely formed. His versification was that of his master, Dryden, but he gave the heroic couplet a peculiar terseness, correctness, and melody. The Essay was shortly afterwards followed by the Rape of the Lock (1712). The stealing of a lock of hair from a beauty of the day, Miss Arabella Fermor, by her lover, Lord Petre, was taken seriously, causing an estrangement between the families; and Pope wrote his poem to make a jest of the affair, 'and laugh them together again.' Though in this he did not succeed, he added greatly to his reputation by the effort. The machinery of the poem, founded upon the Rosicrucian theory that the elements are inhabited by spirits-sylphs, gnomes, nymphs, and salamanders-was added in 1713, and published in the spring of 1714. The addition forms the most perfect work of Pope's Sylphs had been previously genius and art. mentioned as invisible attendants on the fair; the idea is shadowed forth in Shakespeare's Ariel, and the amusements of the fairies in the Midsummer Night's Dream. But Pope has blended the most delicate satire with the most lively fancy, and produced the finest and most brilliant mock-heroic poem in the world. 'It is,' said Johnson, 'the most airy, the most ingenious, and the most delightful of all Pope's compositions' In 1713 appeared his Windsor Forest, evidently founded on Denham's Cooper's Hill.

Pope now commenced his translation of the ad, for which he issued proposals in 1713; it is published at intervals between 1715 and 20. At first the gigantic task oppressed him ith its difficulty. He was but an indifferent reek scholar; but as he gradually grew more miliar with Homer's phrases, erelong he was ble to despatch fifty verses a day. Great part the manuscript was written upon the backs d covers of letters; it was not without reason wift called him 'paper-sparing Pope.' The transion brought its author a clear £5320. But is hardly a fair statement, if we consider that is large sum was in part a 'benevolence' from e upper classes of society, designed to reward s literary merit. The Odyssey was not published til 1725, and here Pope called in the assistance his poetical friends Broome and Fenton. These o coadjutors translated twelve books, and the tes were compiled by Broome, who received m Pope £500, besides being allowed the subiptions collected from personal friends, amountto £70, 4s. Fenton's share was only £200. ducting the sums paid to his co-translators, pe realised by the Odyssey upwards of £3500; ether the Iliad and Odyssey had brought the t a fortune of from eight to nine thousand ınds-so princely was the patronage then ended to literature.

While engaged on the Iliad Pope removed from ifield, his father having sold his estate there, and m April 1716 till the beginning of 1718 lived at iswick. Here he collected and published his rks; and in this volume first appeared the st picturesque, melodious, and passionate of all poems, the Elegy to the Memory of an Unforrate Lady, and the Epistle of Eloisa to Abelard. Chiswick Pope's father died (1717), and soon er the poet removed with his aged mother Twickenham, where he had taken a lease of house and grounds; and there he lived for rest of his life. The villa was not large, : sufficiently commodious for the wants of an glish gentleman whose friends visited himself her than his dwelling. The taste with which pe laid out his grounds (five acres in all) 1 a marked effect on English landscape-The Prince of Wales took the rdening. sign of his garden from the poet's; and nt, the improver and embellisher of pleasureounds, received his best lessons from Pope, o thus aided materially in banishing the stiff, mal Dutch style. The classic spot where pe was visited by Ministers of State, wits, ets, and beauties has long since been transmed-his house pulled down, and his pleasureounds rearranged.

After the Iliad the next great undertaking s an edition of Shakespeare, published in 1725, in six quarto volumes. The preface to this work is the best of his prose writings, but Pope failed as an editor; he lacked the necessary knowledge of Elizabethan literature, and the diligence required for collating copies and fixing and illustrating the text. Fenton gave assistance for this edition of Shakespeare, for which he received £30, 14s. Pope's remuneration as editor was £217, 12s. In 1727 and 1728 Pope published, in conjunction with his friend Swift, three volumes of Miscellanies, which drew down upon the authors a torrent of invective, lampoons, and libels, and led to the Dunciad. This elaborate and splendid satire was first printed in an imperfect form in May 1728, then enlarged with notes, the Prolegomena of Scriblerus, and other additions, and published in April 1729. The work displays the fertile invention of the poet, the variety of illustration at his command, and the unrivalled force and facility of his diction; but it is often indecorous, and still oftener unjust towards the miserable poets and critics against whom he waged war. 'I have often wondered,' says Cowper, 'that the same poet who wrote the Dunciad should have written these lines:

> That mercy I to others shew, That mercy shew to me.

Alas for Pope if the mercy he shewed to others was the measure of the mercy he received!' Sir Walter Scott was right in thinking Pope must himself have suffered most from these wretched contentions. But his propensity to satire was irresistible; he was eminently sensitive, vain, and irritable, and implacable in his resentment towards all who had questioned or slighted his poetical supremacy. Between 1731 and 1735 he had published his Epistles to Burlington, Bathurst, Cobham, and Arbuthnot—the latter, also known as the Prologue to the Satires, containing that famous 'Character of Atticus' which is the melancholy memorial of the quarrel with Addison, provoked partly by political diversities and partly by jealousy. See the article below on Tickell. To the same period belongs the Essay on Man, in four Epistles, the first of which was published anonymously in February 1733, and the second about three months afterwards. The third and fourth appeared in the winter of 1733-34. The Essay is now read not for its philosophy but for its poetry; its ethical distinctions are neglected for those splendid passages and striking incidents which irradiate the poem.

Pope's later labours were chiefly confined to satire. Misfortunes were now gathering round him. Swift was fast verging on imbecility, and was lost to the world; Atterbury and Gay died in 1732; and next year he lost his mother, whose declining years he had watched with affectionate solicitude. Between 1733 and 1739 he published his inimitable Imitations of Horace, satirical, moral, and critical, containing the most noble and generous sentiments mixed up with withering invective and fierce denunciations. In 1742 he added a fourth book to the Dunciad, displaying the final advent of the goddess to destroy order and science, and to substitute the kingdom of the dull upon earth. Political events contributed to agitate Pope's last days. Constant excitement, added to a life of ceaseless study, telling on a frame naturally delicate and deformed from birth, had completely worn him out. He complained of his inability to think; yet shortly before his death he affirmed: 'I am so certain of the soul's being immortal, that I seem to feel it within me as it were by intuition.' Pope died at Twickenham on the 30th of May 1744.

Most of the property within his disposal he left, for her life, to Martha Blount-'the fair-haired Martha'-a daughter of an old Roman Catholic family at Mapledurham in Oxfordshire, who was a little younger than himself, whose acquaintance he had made in the Binfield days, and to whom he remained devoted for more than thirty years. scandal of one of the most scandalous times in the world's history questioned whether Martha's character was as fair as her hair, and even threw doubts on her beauty, her manners, and her grati-But there is tolerable rebutting tude to Pope. testimony as to her good looks: and as for the rest literary history disdains to inquire. [The above biographical notice of Pope is that written for the old edition by Dr R. Carruthers, revised and corrected; the critical essay that follows is by Professor Saintsbury.—Ed.]

There is no English poet—and perhaps there is hardly any English writer-whose position it is more difficult, for a critic with the sense of criticism, to lay down without some misgivings than it is to lay down Pope's. The all-important historical preliminaries, so often neglected-so certain to be neglected at the neglecter's peril—are indeed here quite certain and clear. From almost his first appearance there was no doubt about Pope in the minds of his contemporaries. The very rage of his numerous foes was pretty certainly exasperated by the fact that it was rage against their own con-They felt that he was the poet they tried victions. to make him out not to be. The discontent and surfeit with the obscure and 'metaphysical' style, which had first found expression at the Restoration, had not in the least exhausted itself; though little clouds—the recurrence to ballad poetry, the turn to exact description of nature, &c .- were rising on the far distance to threaten some change of weather in taste. But the first generation of 'prose and sense' had not succeeded in hitting a style of poetry that would please the general surely. The steeds of Dryden's car (to borrow the image from one of Pope's half-rebels) needed Dryden to guide them; and, moreover, their pace was admittedly There had been no real second to unequal. Dryden, except the belated and singular genius of Butler, during the forty years of Dryden's reign. Towards the end of that reign especially, though Dryden himself wrote ever better and better, there had been unpleasant stumbles into vulgarity and slipshodness, unpleasant backslidings into Cowleian frigidity. Even before Pope, indeed, one or two writers-notably Garth-had made not quite unsuccessful attempts to conventionalise the choice of subject and treatment yet further, and to adjust the couplet so that it might be even smoother even more pointed, and might make up for a loss of strength by an added refinement and correctness. They attempted this; Pope did it: and the age frankly accepted what he did as what it wanted Nor-a most unusual experience-did the ages or generations immediately succeeding attempt any serious revolt. There were, throughout the eighteenth century, constant movements which, looking back upon them, we now see to have been movements of a revolutionary character; but they seldom consciously menaced the sovereign. Warton himself, the first to hint reasoned doubts, put Pope above Dryden and next to Milton. Oddly enough, even when, at the close of the age, the Romantic movement came, it was at first less unjust to Pope than to Dryden; and Wordsworth, while most falsely deciding that whenever Virgil has his eye on the object Dryden spoils the passage, could find praise for such a tissue of bookish conventionalities as Windsor Forest. When Bowles accentuated Warton's doubts and lessened his praises, he was sharply opposed by men from Campbell and Byron downwards. in the second Romantic generation—from 1820 or thereabouts onwards—that Pope's reputation came into serious jeopardy. Of late it has been recovering; but it is difficult to say that there is even yet more than a general agreement, which is not itself universal, and which, even where it prevails, had best not be disturbed by too inquisitive investigation of its articles. We must, however, see what positive estimate we can ourselves extract from actual survey.

The exact precociousness of Pope is, owing to his unlucky and now not denied untruthfulness, difficult to determine; but the dates of publication are not questionable. He may have written the Pastorals at sixteen—he certainly printed them at one-and-twenty; the Messiah and part of Window Forest may have been written as early, but the latter certainly was published by 1713, by which time The Rape of the Lock was also in existence; and the Essay on Criticism, while it may have been written in 1709, was certainly advertised for publication in 1711. The poetical characteristics of this not inconsiderable body of work are perfectly well marked, and, with slight differences and immaturities, identical from the first with each

The poet far as he understands it and so far as his eat powers will let him, adopted that theory rrectness' which the sixteenth and sevencentury critics of Italy first, and of France ad built up, as they pretended, and perhaps ly thought, out of Aristotle, Horace, Quinand even Longinus, but really to a large out of their own heads. Both pleas are in themselves perfectly true and sound; but they will not quite stretch to the extent required. It is: undoubtedly much easier to follow rules of art in reference to artificial than to natural objects. A table, even a brocaded dress, looks very much the same to Dick and to Tom and to Harry; there is no real difficulty, if fair ability be present, in getting the acceptance of the stock part or incident, or in the admission of the gradus epithet.

It is almost necessary to premise these generalities, because without them not merely is an estimate of Pope himself impossible, but even an understanding of the differences in the opinions about him is not easy. For instance, that most able defender of his who has been mentioned above urges that while The Ancient Mariner has neither beginning, middle, nor end,' The Rape of the Lock is above all things remarkable for the 'nature and propriety of its construction.' To others the starting-point of contrast between the wedding guest and the Ancient Mariner, the central sin of the shooting of the albatross, and the finale of purgation not yet complete, seem, in their supernatural order, perfectly natural and proper; while the ordered arrangement of the Rape seems to them, for all its happy brilliancy, perfectly artificial and conventional, possessing no real sequence of action whatever, and dependent for such as it appears to have upon burlesque of previous conventions and upon episodes and digressive beauties. So difficult is it to secure common ground in this matter.

In the Essay on Criticism and the Rape of the Lock, however, poems all but contemporaneous, there is no doubt that we see a writer, and even with certain limitations a poet, of the most remarkable kind. Up to this time no poets save Horace and Dante (for though Ben Jonson was a greater, and Dryden a very much greater, critic than Pope, neither had so fully co-ordinated his gifts) had so thoroughly adjusted practice to principle and principle to practice. The Essay on Criticism is very far from original; it is not exactly consistent with itself; it betrays almost schoolboy ignorance of literary and other history. But the idea of poetry which animates it is exactly the idea which would suggest work of the kind of the Rape of the Lock; and this poem carries that idea out so consummately that further perfection is almost impossible. It may be matter of some surprise that Pope's extremest admirers have not seen how damaging a fact it is that this unquestioned masterpiece of his is a mock-heroic poem: just as Boileau's Lutrin is the one unquestionably poetical thing that Boileau has done. Not, indeed, that comedy (as some of their own prophets would hold) is necessarily a low or 'non-serious' kind. But burlesque certainly is, from the mere fact that it is parasitic and second-hand. If the stock epic did not exist, the mock-epic would lose more than half its attractions. But this may pass. On Pope's principles you probably cannot have a better poem than the Rape of the Lock; and the only charge valid against it on these principles is the excessive prominence of the gradus epithet. This, it is true, might pass to some extent as parody, but it is resorted to on a scale and in contexts which more than suggest its employment as a genuine, not a mock, ornament. Windsor Forest, on the other hand, though it is not much less in accordance with the principles of the Essay on Criticism, brings out the defects of those principles by showing, not the limited excellence which at the best they can produce, but the defects which they are likely to allow. The composition, though rhetorically correct, is flat and unnatural; the descriptions (in such a poem of the very first importance) show no direct impression on the poet's mind, give no characteristic features of the scenery, and produce on the mind of the reader a picture of but the vaguest decorative effect.

But even in this, which is a failure, as in the Essay, which is a partial, and the Rape, which is a brilliant and dazzling, success of its kind, Pope's true gifts and merits—the gifts and merits which give him a secure, though not a supreme, 1 among English poets-already appear. he has still to polish it a little, he has rearranged the Drydenian couplet, so as to it of much of its stateliness and of a ver deal of the irresistible momentum which is it characteristic, but to substitute for these: greater polish, a constant glitter instead of termittent blaze, a variety contained within ously narrow limits, but astonishingly great those limits, and a sort of castanet accompa of rhyme which, till the ear wearies utterly singularly attractive. It is not surprising th should have produced an extraordinary ef the public when presented to them within th space of three or four years only, conveyin different matter as the artificial but agreeat ventionalities of the Pastorals, the declama the Messiah, the argument (thoroughly popular taste) of the Essay on Criticis description of Windsor Forest, and the gl badinage of the Rape of the Lock.

The translation of Homer, though pleasa perhaps even useful to the time, adds not Pope's proper position as a poet; indeed, be said to weaken that position by showir easy it was for understrappers, like Broor Fenton, not so much to imitate as to reprod style. It is, of course, 'not Homer' in any point except that of giving the story comple sense and with indifferent fidelity in word: though it is no constituent of his poetical cl helped him to establish those claims in tw -first, by supplying him with an indepe which enabled him ever afterwards to wri as he liked; and secondly, because it ex him in his own couplet, and so did him son like the same service which Dryden's prac heroic plays had rendered to his master.

But two poems which appeared early in t gress of the translation itself (in 1717), an before the bulk of Pope's satirical and c work, are of much more importance. The on an Unfortunate Lady (a much embellish 'poetised' version of the story of a certa Weston) and the Epistle from Eloisa to . are not only pretty, original, and very an productions, but have been relied upon poet's admirers to support his claims merely a brilliant satirist and expert ir applied departments of poetry, but a seriou The first, which is by far the better, is Pope's only effort in pathos; the second most important effort in passion. No o deny that the Elegy at least comes very 1 success, if it does not actually achieve it, way of exciting in the reader the feelings d by the writer. The only question is, whet success is not attained rather by the rhetoric by the poetic road. It is also very noticea some of the most effective passages (for it ii. 17-22) are still very strongly Drydenian.

When the translation of Homer was completed, id its 'ten long years' were passed; when the lition of Shakespeare which Pope then underrok, and for which he was singularly ill-fitted, ras also out of the way, it might have been a mestion what task the poet should next attempt. But, as it happened, his aptitudes, his weaksesses, and the curious tendency (fostered in nim by his theory of poetry) to adopt suggestions rather than strike out an entirely new line, combined to supply him with most appropriate, if not in every respect praiseworthy, occupation for the nearly twenty remaining years of his life. He had from the first been involved, partly without, but much more by, his own fault, in acrimonious quarrels with 'Grub Street' critics, with estranged friends, and with those of 'the great' who, he thought, did not take him at his proper value. He had also, though not himself a very accurate or profound thinker, shared the rationalising, and in the lower sense philosophising, tendencies of the age. Suggestions of Swift -the one great genius-and of Bolingbrokethe most active and specious talent-among his friends put him between 1726 and 1732 on three great works or collections of works—the Dunciad; the Moral Essays (some of them written earlier), with the Essay on Man at their head; and the Satires and Epistles, partly imitated from Horace, partly original. According to a thrifty habit of his, he by degrees inserted in these, or added to them, fragments of verse composed at various times and with various purposes. Some of these, though among the most brilliant evidences of his powers, are among the most unpleasant blots on his memory. For the 'Character of Atticus' (in the Prologue to the Satires, quoted below at Page 189) was a libel on a dead friend who had certainly done him much good, and had at least Possibly never done him any wrong at all; and the Character of Atossa' was prepared for publication Perhaps after he had received a great sum of money not to publish it, and certainly after he had for years been flattering and begging from the subject with whom (whether it was wholly drawn rom her or not) it was sure to be identified. But 'ope's moral character on some sides (not on all, or he was an admirable son, a faithful lover, ometimes a generous benefactor, and in regard younger men of letters curiously devoid of the alousy which he showed in other cases) is in 1at desperately happy condition of raggedness and lackness which cannot suffer from a fresh rent r an added stain. His intellectual and poetical osition gained enormously from the work of these st years, in which (for the Rape, exquisite as it is, only an exquisite trifle in rococo, and the Elegy fine piece of verse-rhetoric on a small scale) he ally showed what he could add to English poetry. hey are, of course, abundantly open to criticism; ut after criticism has done her worst, there is very such more than enough left.

The Dunciad, which appeared in its first form in 1728, but was not completed or set in its final condition till just before Pope's death, appears to have been directly suggested by Swift as a satire on 'Dulness' (the name by which he himself refers to it), and connects itself very well with the old diversions of the 'Scriblerus Club,' in which, as far back as the palmy days of Queen Anne, the two friends, with Arbuthnot, Gay, Oxford, Bolingbroke, and others, had amused themselves by laughing at dunces. In some touches, and especially in the magnificent conclusion (another of the highest points reached by Pope's genius), it is worthy of the suggestion. But for the most part, according to Pope's habit, it resolves itself into a string of personal attacks on his literary and other enemies, connected, as far as they are connected at all, by mock-epic 'machinery' not distantly related to that of the Rape, and by a borrowing from Dryden of the idea of a monarchy of Dulness. But the occupants (for there was a succession) of the throne were far from happily The first was Theobald, the Shakespearian critic, who had aroused Pope's ire by detecting faults in his edition, and who, though no genius at original composition, was always an invaluably careful and sometimes a singularly acute hand at comment and emendation. The substitution for him, in the later form, of the actor, dramatist, and poet-laureate, Colley Cibber, was a worse blunder still; for Cibber, though he too had offended Pope, was neither dunce nor dullard in any sense, accepted or conceivable. The Moral Essays are open to different but equally damaging exception. They were suggested by Bolingbroke, whose flimsy, anti-Christian optimism Pope in the first place did not fully understand, and in the second place was not in the least competent to expound and set in order philosophically. Only the Satires and Epistles, whether imitated or not, escape these initial and general drawbacks.

All, however, alike display the maturest and most polished state of their author's talents. His couplet has had every one of its possible virtues developed to the very uttermost, and is absolutely at his command for the purposes to which he chooses to apply it. Furthermore, he has likewise acquired a knowledge of the world which is of the very first importance for those purposes. This man-of-theworldliness, indeed, keeps him on all but the very rarest occasions from the heights of poetry, but it makes him perfectly at home on the middle slopes, and does not at all prevent his plunging into some of the depths, though they are mud-holes rather than abysses. Everywhere, in the literary and social lampoons of the Dunciad, in the sometimes almost unbelievable excesses of personal spite there and elsewhere, in the superficial but admirably put philosophising about ruling passions and so forth, in the sharp but not exaggerated etchings of society and its foibles, in the satire on crazes and tastes and whims-nay, in the travesties of literary history and literary criticism which we find here and there-there is always the same absolute supremacy of expression. The composition may be rambling (it is only a lover's delusion that Pope is a careful plotter), the facts may be wrong, the temper may be detestable; or all these things may be presented in various degrees of excellence. But always the poet says just what he wants to say, just in the manner in which he wishes to say it. Pope's lyrical and miscellaneous pieces must not be passed over, but are of minor total as well · as individual importance. His Ode on St Cecilia's Day is a manifest following of Dryden's, and far inferior; the translation and the imitation of Hadrian's Animula Vagula are both very ingenious and pretty (see Vol. I. p. 783); the epitaph on Gay is touching, and that on Newton rhetorically, if flashily, effective; the Song by a Person of Quality is one of the most delightful rallyings of poetical rubbish in the language; and the complimentary verses to Mrs Howard are charming. The rest (of which The Universal Prayer, unkindly called by some The Devil's Prayer, is the chief) are no great things. Pope wrote prose very well, but almost entirely confined his exercises in it to annotations on his poems, and to an abundance of letters, which at their best are somewhat artificial, and in refashioning and publishing which he allowed himself the most astonishing and almost incredible devices of tortuous policy.

One curious work of his, generally omitted in accounts of him, remains to be noticed. There are frequent mentions in Spence's Anecdotes of his fondness for the modern Italian-Latin poets, Politian, Molza, and others. But few of his biographers have said anything of the form which this fancy took, in a book issued late in his life—Selecta Poemata Italorum, Accurante A. Pope (2 vols. London, 1740). This, which was founded on an anonymous collection issued in 1684, has no introduction or notes, but is still one of the best anthologies of the matter on a moderate scale. And perhaps Pope's study of these writers may have had more to do with his poetical peculiarities than has been generally recognised.

GEORGE SAINTSBURY.

The Messiah: A Sacred Eclogue.

Ye nymphs of Solyma! begin the song:
To heavenly themes sublimer strains belong.
The mossy fountains and the sylvan shades,
The dreams of Pindus and the Aonian maids,
Delight no more. O thou my voice inspire,
Who touched Isaiah's hallowed lips with fire!
Rapt into future times, the bard begun:
A Virgin shall conceive, a Virgin bear a Son!
From Jesse's root behold a branch arise,
Whose sacred flower with fragrance fills the skies:
The ethereal spirit o'er its leaves shall move,
And on its top descends the mystic Dove.

Ye heavens! from high the dewy nector pour, And in soft silence shed the kindly shower. The sick and weak the healing plant shall aid, From storms a shelter, and from heat a shade. All crimes shall cease, and ancient fraud shall fail: Returning Justice lift aloft her scale : Peace o'er the world her olive wand extend. And white-robed Innocence from heaven descend. Swift fly the years, and rise the expected morn! Oh, spring to light, auspicious Babe, be born! See, nature hastes her earliest wreaths to bring, With all the incense of the breathing spring! See lofty Lebanon his head advance! See nodding forests on the mountains dance I See spicy clouds from lowly Saron rise, And Carmel's flowery top perfumes the skies? Hark ! a glad voice the lonely desert cheers; Prepare the way! a God, a God appears! A God, a God! the vocal hills reply; The rocks proclaim the approaching Deity. Lo I earth receives him from the bending skies; Sink down, ye mountains; and ye valleys, rise; With heads declined, ye cedars, homage pay; Be smooth, ye rocks; ye rapid floods, give way! The Saviour comes! by ancient bards foretold: Hear him, ye deaf, and all ye blind, behold! He from thick films shall purge the visual ray, And on the sightless eyeball pour the day: 'Tis he the obstructed paths of sound shall clear, And bid new music charm the unfolding car: The dumb shall sing, the lame his crutch forego, And leap exulting like the bounding roe. No sigh, no murmur, the wide world shall hear; From every face he wipes off every tear. In adamantine chains shall Death be bound. And hell's grim tyrant feel the eternal wound. As the good shepherd tends his fleecy care, Seeks freshest pasture, and the purest air, Explores the lost, the wandering sheep directs, By day o'ersees them, and by night protects, The tender lambs he raises in his arms. Feeds from his hand, and in his bosom warms; Thus shall mankind his guardian care engage, The promised Father of the future age. No more shall nation against nation rise, Nor ordent warriors meet with hateful eves: Nor fields with gleaming steel be covered o'er, The brazen trumpets kindle rage no more: But useless lances into scythes shall bend. And the broad falchion in a ploughshare end. Then palaces shall rise; the joyful son Shall finish what his short-lived sire begun : Their vines a shadow to their race shall yield, And the same hand that sowed, shall reap the field. The swain in barren deserts with surprise Sees lilies spring, and sudden verdure rise : And starts, amidst the thirsty wilds, to hear New falls of water murmuring in his ear, On rifted rocks, the dragon's late abodes, The green reed trembles, and the bulrush nods. Waste sandy valleys, once perplexed with thorn, The spury fir and shapely box adorn: To leafless shrubs the flowering palms succeed, And odorous myrtle to the noisome weed. The lambs with wolves shall graze the verdant mes And boys in flowery bands the tiger lead :

steer and lion at one crib shall meet, harmless serpents lick the pilgrim's feet. smiling infant in his hand shall take rrested basilisk and speckled snake, ed, the green lustre of the scales survey, with their forky tongue shall innocently play. crowned with light, imperial Salem, rise! thy towery head, and lift thy eyes! long race thy spacious courts adorn! uture sons, and daughters yet unborn, owding ranks on every side arise, inding life, impatient for the skies! arbarous nations at thy gates attend, in thy light, and in thy temple bend! hy bright altars thronged with prostrate kings, heaped with products of Sabæan springs; hee Idume's spicy forests blow, seeds of gold in Ophir's mountains glow. eaven its sparkling portals wide display, break upon thee in a flood of day! fore the rising sun shall gild the morn, evening Cynthia fill her silver horn; ost, dissolved in thy superior rays, ide of glory, one unclouded blaze ow thy courts: the Light himself shall shine aled, and God's eternal day be thine! eas shall waste, the skies in smoke decay, s fall to dust, and mountains melt away; xed his word, his saving power remains; realm for ever lasts, thy own Messiah reigns!

Then prostrate falls, and begs with ardent eyes Soon to obtain, and long possess the prize; The powers gave ear, and granted half his prayer, The rest the winds dispersed in empty air.

But now secure the painted vessel glides, The sunbeams trembling on the floating tides: While melting music steals upon the sky, And softened sounds along the waters die; Smooth flow the waves, the zephyrs gently play, Belinda smiled, and all the world was gay. Soft o'er the shrouds aërial whispers breathe, That seemed but zephyrs to the train beneath. Some to the sun their insect wings unfold, Wast on the breeze, or sink in clouds of gold; Transparent forms, too fine for mortal sight, Their fluid bodies half dissolved in light, Loose to the wind their airy garments flew, Thin glittering textures of the filmy dew, Dipped in the richest tincture of the skies, Where light disports in ever-mingling dyes; While every beam new transient colours flings, Colours that change whene'er they wave their wings. Amid the circle on the gilded mast, Superior by the head was Ariel placed; His purple pinions opening to the sun, He raised his azure wand, and thus begun:

'Ye sylphs and sylphids, to your chief give ear! Fays, fairies, genii, elves, and dæmons, hear! Ye know the spheres, and various tasks assigned By laws eternal to the aerial kind. Some in the fields of purest ether play And bask and whiten in the blaze of day; Some guide the course of wandering orbs on high, Or roll the planets through the boundless sky; Some, less refined, beneath the moon's pale light Pursue the stars that shoot athwart the night. Or suck the mists in grosser air below, Or dip their pinions in the painted bow, Or brew fierce tempests on the wintry main, Or o'er the glebe distil the kindly rain. 'Our humbler province is to tend the fair,
Not a less pleasing, though less glorious care;
To save the powder from too rude a gale,
Nor let the imprisoned essences exhale;
To draw fresh colours from the vernal flowers;
To steal from rainbows ere they drop in showers
A brighter wash; to curl their waving hairs,
Assist their blushes, and inspire their airs;
Nay oft, in dreams, invention we bestow,
To change a flounce, or add a furbelow.'

From 'Eloisa to Abelard.'

In these deep solitudes and awful cells,
Where heavenly-pensive Contemplation dwells,
And ever-musing Melancholy reigns,
What means this tumult in a vestal's veins?
Why rove my thoughts beyond this last retreat?
Why feels my heart its long-forgotten heat?
Yet, yet I love!—From Abelard it came,
And Eloisa yet must kiss the name.

Dear, fatal name! rest ever unrevealed,
Nor pass these lips in holy silence sealed:
Hide it, my heart, within that close disguise,
Where, mixed with God's, his loved idea lies:
O write it not, my hand—the name appears
Already written—wash it out, my tears!
In vain lost Eloisa weeps and prays,
Her heart still dictates, and her hand obeys.

Relentless walls! whose darksome round contains Repentant sighs, and voluntary pains:
Ye rugged rocks, which holy knees have worn;
Ye grots and caverns shagged with horrid thorn!
Shrines, where their vigils pale-eyed virgins keep,
And pitying saints, whose statues learn to weep!
Though cold like you, unmoved and silent grown,
I have not yet forgot myself to stone.
All is not heaven's while Abelard has part,
Still rebel nature holds out half my heart;
Nor prayers nor fasts its stubborn pulse restrain,
Nor tears for ages taught to flow in vain.

Soon as thy letters trembling I enclose,
That well-known name awakens all my woes.
Oh, name for ever sad, for ever dear!
Still breathed in sighs, still ushered with a tear.
I tremble, too, where'er my own I find,
Some dire misfortune follows close behind.
Line after line my gushing eyes o'erflow,
Led through a sad variety of woe:
Now warm in love, now withering in my bloom,
Lost in a convent's solitary gloom!
There stern religion quenched the unwilling flame,
There died the best of passions, love and fame.

Yet write, oh, write me all, that I may join Griefs to thy griefs, and echo sighs to thine!

Nor foes nor fortune take this power away;

And is my Abelard less kind than they?

Tears still are mine, and those I need not spare;

Love but demands what else were shed in prayer:

No happier task these faded eyes pursue;

To read and weep is all they now can do.

Then share thy pain, allow that sad relief; Ah, more than share it, give me all thy grief. Heaven first taught letters for some wretch's aid, Some banished lover, or some captive maid; They live, they speak, they breathe what love inspires, Warm from the soul, and faithful to its fires. The virgin's wish without her fears impart, Excuse the blush, and pour out all the heart, Speed the soft intercourse from soul to soul, And waft a sigh from Indus to the pole. . . .

Ah, think at least thy flock deserves thy care, Plants of thy hand, and children of thy prayer; From the false world in early youth they fled, By thee to mountains, wilds, and deserts led, You raised these hallowed walls; the desert smiled, And Paradise was opened in the wild.

No weeping orphan saw his father's stores Our shrines irradiate, or emblaze the floors; No silver saints, by dying misers given, Here bribed the rage of ill-requited heaven: But such plain roofs as piety could raise, And only vocal with the Maker's praise. In these lone walls (their day's eternal bound), These moss-grown domes with spiry turrets crowned Where awful arches make a noonday night, And the dim windows shed a solemn light; Thy eyes diffused a reconciling ray, And gleams of glory brightened all the day. But now no face divine contentment wears, 'Tis all blank sadness or continual tears. See how the force of others' prayers I try, O pious fraud of amorous charity! But why should I on others' prayers depend? Come thou, my father, brother, husband, friend! Ah, let thy handmaid, sister, daughter, move, And all those tender names in one, thy love! The darksome pines that o'er you rocks reclined, Wave high, and murmur to the hollow wind; The wand'ring streams that shine between the hills, The grots that echo to the tinkling rills, The dying gales that pant upon the trees, The lakes that quiver to the curling breeze; No more these scenes my meditation aid, Or lull to rest the visionary maid. But o'er the twilight groves and dusky caves, Long sounding aisles, and intermingled graves, Black Melancholy sits, and round her throws A deathlike silence and a dead repose: Her gloomy presence saddens all the scene, Shades every flower, and darkens every green, Deepens the murmur of the falling floods, And breathes a browner horror on the woods. . . .

What scenes appear where'er I turn my view! The dear ideas, where I fly, pursue, Rise in the grove, before the altar rise, Stain all my soul, and wanton in my eyes. I waste the matin-lamp in sighs for thee; Thy image steals between my God and me; Thy voice I seem in every hymn to hear, With every bead I drop too soft a tear. When from the censer clouds of fragrance roll, And swelling organs lift the rising soul, One thought of thee puts all the pomp to flight, Priests, tapers, temples, swim before my sight; In seas of flame my plunging soul is drowned, While altars blaze, and angels tremble round.

While prostrate here in humble grief I lie, Kind virtuous drops just gathering in my eye; While praying, trembling in the dust I roll, And dawning grace is opening on my soul: Come, if thou dar'st, all charming as thou art! Oppose thyself to heaven; dispute my heart: Come, with one glance of those deluding eyes Blot out each bright idea of the skies; Take back that grace, those sorrows, and those tea Take back my fruitless penitence and prayers; Snatch me, just mounting, from the blest abode; Assist the fiends, and tear me from my God!

No, fly me, fly me! far as pole from pole; Rise Alps between us! and whole oceans roll! Ah, come not, write not, think not once of me, Nor share one pang of all I felt for thee. quit, thy memory resign; sunce me, hate whate'er was mine.

While angels with their silver wings o'ershade
The ground, now sacred by thy relics made.

So peaceful rests, without a stone, a name, What once had beauty, titles, wealth, and fame. How loved, how honoured once, avails thee not, To whom related, or by whom begot; A heap of dust alone remains of thee; Tis all thou art, and all the proud shall be!

Poets themselves must fall, like those they sung, Deaf the praised ear, and mute the tuneful tongue. Even he whose soul now melts in mournful lays, Shall shortly want the generous tear he pays; Then from his closing eyes thy form shall part, And the last pang shall tear thee from his heart; Life's idle business at one gasp be o'er, The Muse forgot, and thou beloved no more!

Happiness not in Riches but in Virtue.

Know, all the good that individuals find, Or God and nature meant to mere mankind, Reason's whole pleasure, all the joys of sense, Lie in three words-Health, Peace, and Competence. But Health consists with temperance alone; And Peace, O virtue! Peace is all thy own. The good or bad the gifts of fortune gain; But these less taste them, as they worse obtain. Say, in pursuit of profit or delight, Who risk the most, that take wrong means or right? Of vice or virtue, whether blest or curst, Which meets contempt, or which compassion first? Count all the advantage prosperous vice attains, 'Tis but what virtue flies from and disdains: And grant the bad what happiness they would, One they must want, which is, to pass for good.

O blind to truth, and God's whole scheme below, Who fancy bliss to vice, to virtue woe! Who sees and follows that great scheme the best, Best knows the blessing, and will most be blessed. But fools the good alone unhappy call, For ills or accidents that chance to all. See Falkland dies, the virtuous and the just! See godlike Turenne prostrate on the dust! See Sidney bleeds amid the martial strife! Was this their virtue, or contempt of life? Say, was it virtue, more though Heaven ne'er gave, Lamented Digby! sunk thee to the grave? Tell me, if virtue made the son expire, Why, full of days and honour, lives the sire? Why drew Marseilles' good bishop purer breath, When nature sickened, and each gale was death? Or why so long (in life if long can be) Lent Heaven a parent to the poor and me? . . .

Honour and shame from no condition rise; Act well your part, there all the honour lies. Fortune in men has some small difference made,
One flaunts in rags, one flutters in brocade;
The cobbler aproned, and the parson gowned,
The friar hooded, and the monarch crowned.
'What differ more,' you cry, 'than crown and cowl?'
I'll tell you, friend! a wise man and a fool.
You'll find, if once the monarch acts the monk,
Or, cobbler-like, the parson will be drunk,
Worth makes the man, and want of it the fellow:
The rest is all but leather or prunella. . . .

But by your father's worth if yours you rate, Count me those only who were good and great. Go! if your ancient but ignoble blood Has crept through scoundrels ever since the flood, Go! and pretend your family is young; Nor own your fathers have been fools so long. What can ennoble sots, or slaves, or cowards? Alas! not all the blood of all the Howards.

Look next on greatness; say where greatness lies: 'Where, but among the heroes and the wise?' Heroes are much the same, the point's agreed, From Macedonia's madman to the Swede; The whole strange purpose of their lives to find, Or make, an enemy of all mankind! . . . If parts allure thee, think how Bacon shined, The wisest, brightest, meanest of mankind: Or ravished with the whistling of a name, See Cromwell, damned to everlasting fame! If all united thy ambition call, From ancient story learn to scorn them all. There, in the rich, the honoured, famed, and great, See the false scale of happiness complete! In hearts of kings, or arms of queens who lay, How happy! those to ruin, these betray: Mark by what wretched steps their glory grows, From dirt and sea-weed as proud Venice rose; In each how guilt and greatness equal ran, And all that raised the hero, sunk the man: Now Europe's laurels on their brows behold, But stained with blood, or ill exchanged for gold: Then see them broke with toils, or sunk in ease, Or infamous for plundered provinces. O wealth ill-fated! which no act of fame E'er taught to shine, or sanctified from shame! What greater bliss attends their close of life? Some greedy minion or imperious wife The trophied arches, storied halls invade, And haunt their slumbers in the pompous shade. Alas! not dazzled with their noontide ray, Compute the morn and evening to the day; The whole amount of that enormous fame, A tale, that blends their glory with their shame!

Know then this truth (enough for man to know), 'Virtue alone is happiness below.'
The only point where human bliss stands still, And tastes the good without the fall to ill; Where only merit constant pay receives, Is blest in what it takes, and what it gives; The joy unequalled if its end it gain, And if it lose, attended with no pain: Without satiety though e'er so blessed, And but more relished as the more distressed: The broadest mirth unfeeling Folly wears, Less pleasing far than Virtue's very tears: Good from each object, from each place acquired, For ever exercised, yet never tired;

Never elated, while one man's oppressed;
Never dejected, while another's blessed;
And where no wants, no wishes can remain,
Since but to wish more virtue, is to gain.

Digby was the Hon. Robert Digby, third son of Lord Digby died in 1724. M. de Belaance, Bishop of Marseilles, distings himself by his activity during the plague in Marseilles in Prunells was a species of woollen stuff, of which clergymen's a were often made. The allusion in the passage about the 'take blends their glory with their shame,' is to the great Duke of borough and his 'imperious' duchers. The oft-quoted line, honest man's the noblest work of God,' occurs in this Eusey.

Hope.

Hope springs eternal in the human breast:
Man never is, but always to be blest.
The soul, uneasy and confined from home,
Rests and expatiates in a life to come.

The Poor Indian.

Lo the poor Indian, whose untutored mind
Sees God in clouds, or hears him in the wind;
His soul proud Science never taught to stray
Far as the solar walk or milky way;
Yet simple nature to his hope has given
Behind the cloud-topped hill an humbler heaven;
Some safer world in depth of woods embraced,
Some happier island in the watery waste,
Where slaves once more their native land behold,
No fiends torment, no Christians thirst for gold.
To be, contents his natural desire,
He asks no angel's wing, no seraph's fire;
But thinks, admitted to that equal sky,
His faithful dog shall bear him company.

Happiness.

O Happiness! our being's end and aim, Good, Pleasure, Ease, Content, whate'er thy name That something still which prompts th' eternal sigh For which we bear to live, or dare to die; Which still so near us, yet beyond us lies, O'erlooked, seen double by the fool and wise! Plant of celestial seed! if dropped below, Say in what mortal soil thou deign'st to grow? Fair opening to some court's propitious shine, Or deep with diamonds in the flaming mine? Twined with the wreaths Parnassian laurels yield, Or reaped in iron harvests of the field? Where grows !-- where grows it not? If vain our We ought to blame the culture, not the soil: Fixed to no spot is Happiness sincere; 'Tis nowhere to be found, or everywhere; 'Tis never to be bought, but always free, And, fled from monarchs, St John, dwells with the Ask of the learned the way! The learned are blin This bids to serve, and that to shun mankind; Some place the bliss in action, some in ease; Those call it pleasure, and contentment these; Some, sunk to beasts, find pleasure end in pain; Some, swelled to gods, confess e'en virtue vain; Or indolent, to each extreme they fall, To trust in everything, or doubt of all. Is there a parson much bemused in beer,
A maudlin poetess, a rhyming peer,
A clerk foredoomed his father's soul to cross,
Who pens a stanza when he should engross?
Is there who, locked from ink and paper, scrawls
With desperate charcoal round his darkened walls?

Who shames a scribbler? Break one cobweb through, He spins the slight, self-pleasing thread anew: Destroy his fib or sophistry: in vain! The creature's at his dirty work again, Throned in the centre of his thin designs, Proud of a vast extent of flimsy lines. . . .

One dedicates in high heroic prose, And ridicules beyond a hundred foes: One from all Grub Street will my fame defend, And, more abusive, calls himself my friend. This prints my letters, that expects a bribe, And others roar aloud: 'Subscribe, subscribe!'

Dipped me in ink; my parents', or my own?
As yet a child, nor yet a fool to fame,
I lisped in numbers, for the numbers came.

No duty broke, no father disobeyed:

To help me through this long disease, my life;

And teach the being you preserved, to bear. . . .

A man's true merit 'tis not hard to find; But each man's secret standard in his mind, That casting-weight pride adds to emptiness, This, who can gratify? for who can guess? The bard whom pilfered Pastorals renown, Who turns a Persian tale for half-a-crown, Just writes to make his barrenness appear, And strains from hard-bound brains eight lines a year; He who, still wanting, though he lives on theft, Steals much, spends little, yet has nothing left: And he who now to sense, now nonsense leaning, Means not, but blunders round about a meaning; And he whose fustian's so sublimely bad, It is not poetry, but prose run mad: All these my modest satire bade translate, And owned that nine such poets made a Tate. How did they fume, and stamp, and roar, and chafe! And swear, not Addison himself was safe.

Peace to all such! but were there one whose fires True genius kindles, and fair fame inspires;

Blest with each talent and each art to please, And born to write, converse, and live with ease: Should such a man, too fond to rule alone, Bear, like the Turk, no brother near the throne, View him with scornful, yet with jealous eyes, And hate for arts that caused himself to rise; Damn with faint praise, assent with civil leer, And without sneering, teach the rest to sneer; Willing to wound and yet afraid to strike, Just hint a fault and hesitate dislike; Alike reserved to blame or to commend, A timorous foe and a suspicious friend; Dreading even fools, by flatterers besieged, And so obliging that he ne'er obliged; Like Cato, give his little senate laws, And sit attentive to his own applause; While wits and Templars every sentence raise, And wonder with a foolish face of praise. Who but must laugh if such a man there be? Who would not weep if Atticus were he? . . .

Eternal smiles his emptiness betray, As shallow streams run dimpling all the way; Whether in florid impotence he speaks, And, as the prompter breathes, the puppet squeaks; Or at the ear of Eve, familiar toad, Half froth, half venom, spits himself abroad, In puns, or politics, or tales, or lies, Or spite, or smut, or rhymes, or blasphemies; His wit all seesaw, between that and this, Now high, now low, now master up, now miss, And he himself one vile antithesis. Physic of Metaphysic begs defence, And Metaphysic calls for aid on Sense. See Mystery to Mathematics fly! In vain! they gaze, turn giddy, rave, and die. Religion blushing veils her sacred fires, And unawares Morality expires. For public flame, nor private, dares to shine; Nor human spark is left, nor glimpse divine. Song by a Person of Quality.

Fluttering spread thy purple pinions, Gentle Cupid, o'er my heart; I a slave in thy dominions; Nature must give way to art.

Mild Arcadians, ever blooming, Nightly nodding o'er your flocks, See my weary days consuming, All beneath yon flowery rocks.

Thus the Cyprian goddess weeping, Mourned Adonis, darling youth: Him the boar in silence creeping, Gored with unrelenting tooth.

Cynthia, tune harmonious numbers; Fair Discretion, string the lyre; Soothe my ever-waking slumbers: Bright Apollo, lend thy choir.

Gloomy Pluto, king of terrors, Armed in adamantine chains, Lead me to the crystal mirrors, Watering soft Elysian plains.

Mournful cypress, verdant willow, Gilding my Aurelia's brows, Morpheus hovering o'er my pillow, Hear me pay my dying vows.

Melancholy smooth Mæander, Swiftly purling in a round, On thy margin lovers wander, With thy flowery chaplets crowned.

Thus when Philomela drooping, Softly seeks her silent mate, See the bird of Juno stooping; Melody resigns to fate.

On a Certain Lady at Court.

I know the thing that 's most uncommon; (Envy, be silent, and attend!)
I know a reasonable woman,
Handsome and witty, yet a friend.

Not warped by passion, awed by rumour, Not grave thro' pride, or gay through folly, An equal mixture of good humour And sensible soft melancholy.

'Has she no faults then (Envy says), sir?'
Yes, she has one, I must aver;
When all the world conspires to praise her,
The woman's deaf, and does not hear.

Death of Villiers, Duke of Buckingham.

In the worst inn's worst room, with mat half-hung, The floors of plaister, and the walls of dung, On once a flock-bed, but repaired with straw, With tape-tied curtains, never meant to draw, The George and Garter dangling from that bed Where tawdry yellow strove with dirty red, Great Villiers lies—alas! how changed from him, That life of pleasure, and that soul of whim! Gallant and gay, in Cliveden's proud alcove, The bower of wanton Shrewsbury and love;

Or just as gay, at council, in a ring
Of mimic statesmen, and their merry king.
No wit to flatter, left of all his store!
No fool to laugh at, which he valued more.
There, victor of his health, of fortune, friends,
And fame, this lord of useless thousands ends.

The Dying Christian to his Soul.

Vital spark of heavenly flame,
Quit, O quit this mortal frame:
Trembling, hoping, lingering, flying—
O the pain, the bliss of dying!
Cease, fond Nature, cease thy strife,
And let me languish into life!

Hark! they whisper; angels say,
'Sister spirit, come away!'
What is this absorbs me quite?
Steals my senses, shuts my sight,
Drowns my spirits, draws my breath?
Tell me, my soul, can this be death?

The world recedes: it disappears!
Heaven opens on my eyes! my ears
With sounds seraphic ring:
Lend, lend your wings! I mount! I fly!
O Grave! where is thy victory?
O Death! where is thy sting?

This imitation of the Animula vagula blandula, verses attributed to the dying (heathen) Emperor Hadrian, was obviously in part moulded by Thomas Flatman's ode, quoted at Vol. I. p. 783.

From Pope's 'Iliad.'

The troops exulting sat in order round, And beaming fires illumined all the ground, As when the moon, refulgent lamp of night! O'er heaven's pure azure spreads her sacred light; When not a breath disturbs the deep serene, And not a cloud o'ercasts the solemn scene; Around her throne the vivid planets roll, And stars unnumbered gild the glowing pole; O'er the dark trees a yellower verdure shed, And tip with silver every mountain's head; Then shine the vales, the rocks in prospect rise, A flood of glory bursts from all the skies; The conscious swains, rejoicing in the sight, Eye the blue vault, and bless the useful light. So many flames before proud Ilion blaze, And lighten glimmering Xanthus with their rays; The long reflections of the distant fires Gleam on the walls and tremble on the spires. A thousand piles the dusky horrors gild, And shoot a shady lustre o'er the field. Full fifty guards each flaming pile attend, Whose umbered arms by fits thick flashes send: Loud neigh the coursers o'er their heaps of corn, And ardent warriors wait the rising morn. (Book viii.)

On Sickness and Death.

To SIR RICHARD STEELE .- July 15, 1712.

You formerly observed to me that nothing made a more ridiculous figure in a man's life than the disparity we often find in him sick and well; thus, one of an unfortunate constitution is perpetually exhibiting a miserable example of the weakness of his mind and of his body in their turns. I have had frequent opportunities of late to consider myself in these different views and, I hope, have received some advantage by it, if what Waller says be true, that 'The soul's dark cottage, battered and decayed, Lets in new light through chinks that Time has made.'

Then surely sickness, contributing no less than old age to the shaking down this scaffolding of the body, may discover the inward structure more plainly. Sickness is a sort of early old age; it teaches us a diffidence in our earthly state, and inspires us with the thoughts of a future, better than a thousand volumes of philosophers and divines. It gives so warning a concussion to those props of our vanity, our strength and youth, that we think of fortifying ourselves within, when there is so little dependence upon our outworks. Youth at the very best is but a betrayer of human life in a gentler and smoother manner than age: it is like a stream that nourishes a plant upon a bank, and causes it to flourish and blossom to the sight, but at the same time is undermining it at the root in secret. My youth has dealt more fairly and openly with me; it has afforded several prospects of my danger, and given me an advantage not very common to young men, that the attractions of the world have not dazzled me very much; and I begin, where most people end, with a full conviction of the emptiness of all sorts of ambition, and the unsatisfactory nature of all human pleasures. When a smart fit of sickness tells me this scurvy tenement of my body will fall in a little time, I am even as unconcerned as was that honest Hibernian, who, being in bed in the great storm some years ago, and told the house would tumble over his head, made answer: 'What care I for the house? I am only a lodger,' I fancy it is the best time to die when one is in the best humour; and so excessively weak as I now am, I may say with conscience, that I am not at all uneasy at the thought that many men, whom I never had any esteem for, are likely to enjoy this world after me. When I reflect what an inconsiderable little atom every single man is, with respect to the whole creation, methinks it is a shame to be concerned at the removal of such a trivial animal as I am. The morning after my exit, the sun will rise as bright as ever, the flowers smell as sweet, the plants spring as green, the world will proceed in its old course, people will laugh as heartily, and marry as fast as they were used to do. The memory of man-as it is elegantly expressed in the Book of Wisdom-passeth away as the remembrance of a guest that tarrieth but one day, There are reasons enough, in the fourth chapter of the same book, to make any young man contented with the prospect of death. 'For honourable age is not that which standeth in length of time, or is measured by number of years. But wisdom is the gray hair to men, and an unspotted life is old age. He was taken away speedily, lest wickedness should alter his understanding, or deceit beguile his soul,' &c .- I am, your, &c.

Pope was at this time only twenty-four—that is, if we assume the letter to have been actually sent to Steele; but it seems to be merely a literary essay—part of the fabricated correspondence.

Pope in Oxford.

TO MRS MARTHA BLOUNT-1716.

Nothing could have more of that melancholy which once used to please me than my last day's journey;

for, after having passed through my favourite woods a the forest, with a thousand reveries of past pleasures, I rid over hanging hills, whose tops were edged with groves, and whose feet watered with winding riven, listening to the falls of cataracts below, and the memuring of the winds above; the gloomy verdure of Stonor succeeded to these, and then the shades of the evening overtook me. The moon rose in the clearst sky I ever saw, by whose solemn light I paced on slowly, without company, or any interruption to the range of my thoughts. About a mile before I reached Oxfort, all the bells tolled in different notes; the clocks of every college answered one another, and sounded forth-so in a deeper, some a softer tone—that it was eleven at night. All this was no ill preparation to the life I have led since among those old walls, venerable galleris, stone porticos, studious walks, and solitary scenes of the university. I wanted nothing but a black gown and a salary, to be as mere a book-worm as any there. I conformed myself to the college-hours, was rolled up in books, lay in one of the most ancient, dusky parts of the university, and was as dead to the world as any bernit of the desert. If anything was alive or awake in me, it was a little vanity, such as even those good men used to entertain, when the monks of their own order extolled their piety and abstraction. For I found myself received with a sort of respect, which this idle part of mankind, the learned, pay to their own species; who are as outsiderable here as the busy, the gay, and the ambitious are in your world.

This is a genuine latter slightly altered. Martha Blount was the Stella of Pope, who took the warmest interest in all her slisin, and left her the bulk of his fortune. Her elder sister Terum was his first favourite, but Martha gained the sucendeacy, and retained it till the death of the poet. 'The fair-haired Martha, and Terum brown,' as Cay called them, were of an old Catholic family, the Blounts of Mapledurham, near Reading. Martha (two years younger than her illustrious friend) survived till 1763.

Death of Two Lovers by Lightning.

To Lady Mary Wortley Montago.—September 2 [1919].

I have a mind to fill the rest of this paper with at accident that happened just under my eyes, and his made a great impression upon me. I have just passed part of this summer at an old romantic seat of my Lord Harcourt, which he lent me. It overlooks a common field, where, under the shade of a haycock, sat two lovers, as constant as ever were found in romance, beneath a spreading beech. The name of the one-let it sound as it will-was John Hewet; of the other, Sarah Drew. John was a well-set man about five-andtwenty; Sarah, a brown woman of eighteen. John 🜬 for several months borne the labour of the day in the same field with Sarah; when she milked, it was his morning and evening charge to bring the cows to her pail. Their love was the talk, but not the scandal, of the whole neighbourhood; for all they aimed at was the blameless possession of each other in marriage. It was but this very morning that he had obtained her parents' consent, and it was but till the next week that they were to wait to be happy. Perhaps this very day, in the intervals of their work, they were talking of their wedding-clothes; and John was now matching several kinds of poppies and field-flowers to her complexies, to make her a present of knots for the day. While they were thus employed—it was on the last of July-4 terrible storm of thunder and lightning arose, and drove the labourers to what shelter the trees or hedges afforded. Sarah, frighted and out of breath, sunk on a haycock, and John-who never separated from her-sat by her side, having raked two or three heaps together to secure her. Immediately there was heard so loud a crack as if heaven had burst asunder. The labourers, all solicitous for each other's safety, called to one another: those that were nearest our lovers, hearing no answer, stepped to the place where they lay: they first saw a little smoke, and after, this faithful pair-John with one arm about his Sarah's neck, and the other held over her face, as if to screen her from the lightning. were struck dead, and already grown stiff and cold in this tender posture. There was no mark or discolouring on their bodies, only that Sarah's eyebrow was a little singed, and a small spot between her breasts. They were buried the next day in one grave, in the parish of Stanton-Harcourt in Oxfordshire, where my Lord Harcourt, at my request, has erected a monument over them. Of the following epitaphs which I made, the critics have chosen the godly one: I like neither, but wish you had been in England to, have done this office better: I think it was what you could not have refused me on so moving an occasion.

When Eastern lovers feed their funeral fire, On the same pile their faithful fair expire; Here pitying Heaven that virtue mutual found, And blasted both that it might neither wound. Hearts so sincere the Almighty saw well pleased, Sent his own lightning, and the victims seized.

Think not, by rigorous judgment seized,
A pair so faithful could expire;
Victims so pure Heaven saw well pleased,
And snatched them in celestial fire.

Live well, and fear no sudden fate:
When God calls virtue to the grave,
Alike 'tis justice, soon or late,
Mercy alike to kill or save.
Virtue unmoved can hear the call,
And face the flash that melts the ball.

Upon the whole, I cannot think these people unhappy. The greatest happiness, next to living as they would have done, was to die as they did. The greatest honour people of this low degree could have, was to be remembered on a little monument; unless you will give them another—that of being honoured with a tear from the finest eyes in the world. I know you have tenderness; you must have it; it is the very emanation of good sense and virtue: the finest minds, like the finest metals, dissolve the easiest.

An Ancient English Country-seat. To Lady Mary Wortley Montagu.

DEAR MADAM—'Tis not possible to express the least part of the joy your return gives me; time only and experience will convince you how very sincere it is. I excessively long to meet you, to say so much, so very much to you, that I believe I shall say nothing. I have given orders to be sent for the first minute of your arrival—which I beg you will let them know at Mr Jervas's. I am fourscore miles from London, a short journey compared to that I so often thought at least of undertaking, rather than die without seeing you again.

Though the place I am in is such as I would not quit for the town, if I did not value you more than any, nay everybody else there; and you will be convinced how little the town has engaged my affections in your absence from it, when you know what a place this is which I prefer to it; I shall therefore describe it to you at large, as the true picture of a genuine ancient country-seat.

You must expect nothing regular in my description of a house that seems to be built before rules were in fashion: the whole is so disjointed, and the parts so detached from each other, and yet so joining again, one cannot tell how, that-in a poetical fit-you would imagine it had been a village in Amphion's time, where twenty cottages had taken a dance together, were all out, and stood still in amazement ever since. A stranger would be grievously disappointed who should ever think to get into this house the right way. One would expect, after entering through the porch, to be let into the hall; alas! nothing less, you find yourself in a brewhouse. From the parlour you think to step into the drawing-room; but, upon opening the iron-nailed door, you are convinced, by a flight of birds about your ears and a cloud of dust in your eyes, that it is the pigeonhouse. On each side our porch are two chimneys, that wear their greens on the outside, which would do as well within, for whenever we make a fire, we let the smoke out of the windows. Over the parlour window hangs a sloping balcony, which time has turned to a very convenient penthouse. The top is crowned with a very venerable tower, so like that of the church just by, that the jackdaws build in it as if it were the true steeple.

The great hall is high and spacious, flanked with long tables, images of ancient hospitality; ornamented with monstrous horns, about twenty broken pikes, and a matchlock musket or two, which they say were used in the civil wars. Here is one vast arched window, beautifully darkened with divers scutcheons of painted glass. There seems to be great propriety in this old manner of blazoning upon glass, ancient families being like ancient windows, in the course of generations seldom free from cracks. One shining pane bears date 1286. The youthful face of Dame Elinor owes more to this single piece than to all the glasses she ever consulted in her life. Who can say after this that glass is frail, when it is not half so perishable as human beauty or glory? For in another pane you see the memory of a knight preserved, whose marble nose is mouldered from his monument in the church adjoining. And yet, must not one sigh to reflect that the most authentic record of so ancient a family should lie at the mercy of every boy that throws a stone? In this hall, in former days, have dined gartered knights and courtly dames, with ushers, sewers, and seneschals; and yet it was but the other night that an owl flew in hither, and mistook it for a barn.

This hall lets you up (and down) over a very high threshold, into the parlour. It is furnished with historical tapestry, whose marginal fringes do confess the moisture of the air. The other contents of this room are a broken-bellied virginal, a couple of crippled velvet chairs, with two or three mildewed pictures of mouldy ancestors, who look as dismally as if they came fresh from hell with all their brimstone about 'em. These are carefully set at the further corner: for the windows being everywhere broken, make it so convenient a place to dry poppies and mustard seed in, that the room is appropriated to that use.

Next this parlour lies, as I said before, the pigeon-house, by the side of which runs an entry that leads, on one hand and t'other, into a bed-chamber, a buttery, and a small hole called the chaplain's study. Then follow a brew-house, a little green and gilt parlour, and the great stairs, under which is the dairy. A little further on the right, the servants' hall; and by the side of it, up six steps, the old lady's closet, which has a lattice into the said hall, that, while she said her prayers, she might cast an eye on the men and maids. There are upon this ground floor in all twenty-four apartments, hard to be distinguished by particular names; among which I must not forget a chamber that has in it a large antiquity of timber, which seems to have been either a bedstead or a cider-press.

Our best room above is very long and low, of the exact proportion of a bandbox; it has hangings of the finest work in the world; those, I mean, which Arachne spins out of her own bowels: indeed, the roof is so decayed, that after a favourable shower of rain, we may, with God's blessing, expect a crop of mushrooms between the chinks of the floors.

All this upper story has for many years had no other inhabitants than certain rats, whose very age renders them worthy of this venerable mansion, for the very rats of this ancient seat are gray. Since these have not quitted it, we hope at least this house may stand during the small remainder of days these poor animals have to live, who are now too infirm to remove to another: they have still a small subsistence left them in the few remaining books of the library.

I had never seen half what I have described but for an old starched gray-headed steward, who is as much an antiquity as any in the place, and looks like an old family picture walked out of its frame. He failed not, as we passed from room to room, to relate several memoirs of the family; but his observations were particularly curious in the cellar: he shewed where stood the triple rows of butts of sack, and where were ranged the bottles of tent for toasts in the morning: he pointed to the stands that supported the iron-hooped hogsheads of strong beer; then stepping to a corner, he lugged out the tattered fragments of an unframed picture: 'This,' says he, with tears in his eyes, 'was poor Sir Thomas, once master of all the drink I told you of: he had two sons (poor young masters!) that never arrived to the age of his beer; they both fell ill in this very cellar, and never went out upon their own legs.' He could not pass by a broken bottle without taking it up to shew us the arms of the family on it. He then led me up the tower, by dark winding stone steps, which landed us into several little rooms, one above another; one of these was nailed up, and my guide whispered to me the occasion of it. It seems the course of this noble blood was a little interrupted about two centuries ago by a freak of the Lady Frances, who was here taken with a neighbouring prior; ever since which the room has been made up, and branded with the name of the adultery chamber. The ghost of Lady Frances is supposed to walk here: some prying maids of the family formerly reported that they saw a lady in a fardingale through the keyhole; but this matter was hushed up, and the servants forbid to talk of it.

I must needs have tired you with this long letter; but what engaged me in the description was a generous principle to preserve the memory of a thing that must itself soon fall to ruin; nay, perhaps, some part of it before this reaches your hands: indeed, I owe this old house the same sort of gratitude that we do to an old friend that harbours us in his declining condition, may, even in his last extremities. I have found this as excellent place for retirement and study, where no one who passes by can dream there is an inhabitant, and even anybody that would visit me dares not venture under my roof. You will not wonder I have translated a great deal of Homer in this retreat; any one that sees it will own I could not have chosen a fitter or more likely place to converse with the dead. As soon as I return to the living, it shall be to converse with the best of them. I hope, therefore, very speedily to tell you in person how sincerely and unalterably I am, madam, your most faithful, obliged, and obediest servant. I beg Mr Wortley to believe me his most humble servant.

The house from which Pope dated this and the preceding letter was the mansion of Stanton Harcourt, here described with fantastic additions and alterations; here Pope did translate part of the Iliad.

To Bishop Atterbury, in the Tower.

May 17, 1723

Once more I write to you, as I promised, and this once, I fear, will be the last! The curtain will soon be drawn between my friend and me, and nothing left but to wish you a long good-night. May you enjoy a state of repose in this life not unlike that sleep of the soul which some have believed is to succeed it, where we lie utterly forgetful of that world from which we are gone, and ripening for that to which we are to go. If you retain any memory of the past, let it only image to you what has pleased you best; sometimes present a dream of an absent friend, or bring you back an agreeable conversation. But, upon the whole, I hope you will think less of the time past than of the future, as the former has been less kind to you than the latter infallibly will be. Do not envy the world your studies; they will tend to the benefit of men against whom you can have no complaint; I mean of all posterity: and, perhaps, at your time of life, nothing else is worth your care. What is every year of a wise man's life but a censure or critic on the past? Those whose date is the shortest, live long enough to laugh at one half of it; the boy despises the infant; the man, the boy; the philosopher, both; and the Christian, all. You may now begin to think your manhood was too much a puerility, and you will never suffer your age to be but a second infancy. The toys and baubles of your childhood are hardly now more below you than those toys of our riper and our declining years, the drums and rattles of ambition, and the dirt and bubbles of avarice. At this time, when you are cut off from a little society, and made a citizen of the world at large, you should bend your talents, not to serve a party or a few, but all mankind. Your genius should mount above that mist in which its participation and neighbourhood with earth long involved it; to shine abroad, and to heaven, ought to be the business and the glory of your present situation. Remember it was at such a time that the greatest lights of antiquity dazzled and blazed the most, in their retreat, in their exile, or in their death. But why do I talk of dazzling or blazing?—it was then that they did good, that they gave light, and that they became guides to mankind.

Those aims alone are worthy of spirits truly great, and such I therefore hope will be yours. Resentment, ndeed, may remain, perhaps cannot be quite extinguished in the noblest minds; but revenge never will sarbour there. Higher principles than those of the irst, and better principles than those of the latter, will infallibly influence men whose thoughts and whose searts are enlarged, and cause them to prefer the whole o any part of mankind, especially to so small a part as one's single self.

Believe me, my lord, I look upon you as a spirit entered into another life, as one just upon the edge of mmortality, where the passions and affections must be much more exalted, and where you ought to despise all little views and all mean retrospects. Nothing is worth your looking back; and, therefore, look forward, and make, as you can, the world look after you. But take are that it be not with pity, but with esteem and admiration.

I am, with the greatest sincerity and passion for your ame as well as happiness, your, &c.

Atterbury went into exile a month or two after this, and never eturned to England. His farewell letter to Pope from the Tower s given above at page 158.

Pope was one of the authors of the Memoirs of Martinus Scriblerus, and in them lavished much vit on subjects which are now mostly of little nterest. He ridiculed Burnet's History of my Iwn Times with infinite humour in Memoirs of P. P., Clerk of this Parish; and he contributed everal papers to the Guardian. His prose works ontain also a collection of Thoughts on Various Subjects, such as these:

There never was any party, faction, sect, or cabal rhatsoever, in which the most ignorant were not the nost violent; for a bee is not a busier animal than a lockhead. However, such instruments are necessary o politicians; and perhaps it may be with states as with clocks, which must have some dead-weight hanging it them, to help and regulate the motion of the finer and more useful parts.

When men grow virtuous in their old age, they only nake a sacrifice to God of the devil's leavings.

He who tells a lie is not sensible how great a task ne undertakes; for he must be forced to invent twenty nore to maintain one.

Get your enemies to read your works in order to nend them: for your friend is so much your second self, that he will judge too like you.

There is nothing wanting to make all rational and lisinterested people in the world of one religion but hat they should talk together every day.

A short and certain way to obtain the character of a reasonable and wise man is, whenever any one tells you his opinion, to comply with him.

The character of covetousness is what a man generally acquires more through some niggardliness or ill grace in little and inconsiderable things than in expenses of any consequence. A very few pounds a year would ease that man of the scandal of avarice.

Recipe for an Epic Poem-from the 'Guardian.'

It is no small pleasure to me, who am zealous in the interests of learning, to think I may have the honour of leading the town into a very new and uncommon road of criticism. As that kind of literature is at present carried on, it consists only in a knowledge of mechanic rules which contribute to the structure of different sorts of poetry; as the receipts of good housewives do to the making puddings of flour, oranges, plums, or any other ingredients. It would, methinks, make these my instructions more easily intelligible to ordinary readers, if I discoursed of these matters in the style in which ladies learned in economics dictate to their pupils for the improvement of the kitchen and larder. I shall begin with Epic Poetry, because the critics agree it is the greatest work human nature is capable of. . . .

For the Fable.—Take out of any old poem, history-book, romance, or legend—for instance, Geoffrey of Monmouth, or Don Belianis of Greece—those parts of story which afford most scope for long descriptions: put these pieces together, and throw all the adventures you fancy into one tale. Then take a hero whom you may choose for the sound of his name, and put him into the midst of these adventures: there let him work for twelve books; at the end of which, you may take him out ready prepared to conquer or to marry; it being necessary that the conclusion of an Epic Poem be fortunate.

To make an Episode.—Take any remaining adventure of your former collection, in which you could no way involve your hero; or any unfortunate accident that was too good to be thrown away; and it will be of use, applied to any other person who may be lost and evaporate in the course of the work, without the least damage to the composition.

For the Moral and Allegory.—These you may extract out of the Fable afterwards at your leisure. Be sure you strain them sufficiently.

For the Manners.—For those of the hero, take all the best qualities you can find in all the best celebrated heroes of antiquity; if they will not be reduced to a consistency, lay them all in a heap upon him. But be sure they are qualities which your patron would be thought to have; and to prevent any mistake which the world may be subject to, select from the alphabet those capital letters that compose his name, and set them at the head of a dedication before your poem. However, do not absolutely observe the exact quantity of these virtues, it not being determined whether or no it be necessary for the hero of a poem to be an honest man.—For the under characters, gather them from Homer and Virgil, and change the names as occasion serves.

For the Machines.—Take of deities, male and female, as many as you can use; separate them into two equal parts, and keep Jupiter in the middle. Let Juno put him in a ferment, and Venus mollify him. Remember on all occasions to make use of volatile Mercury. If you have need of devils, draw them out of Milton's Paradise, and extract your spirits from Tasso. The use of these machines is evident; for since no Epic Poem can possibly subsist without them, the wisest way is to reserve them for your greatest necessities when you cannot extricate your hero by any human means, or yourself by your own wits, seek relief from Heaven, and the gods will do your business very readily. This is according to the direct prescription of Horace in his Art of Poetry:

- 'Nec deus intersit, nisi dignus vindice nodus Inciderit—'
- 'Never presume to make a god appear, But for a business worthy of a god.'—ROSCOMMON.

That is to say, a poet should never call upon the gods for their assistance but when he is in great perplexity.

For the Descriptions.—For a Tempest.—Take Eurus, Zephyr, Auster, and Boreas, and cast them together in one verse: add to these, of rain, lightning, and of thunder (the loudest you can), quantum sufficit. Mix your clouds and billows well together till they foam, and thicken your description here and there with a quicksand. Brew your tempest well in your head before you set it a-blowing.

For a Battle.—Pick a large quantity of images and descriptions from Homer's Iliads, with a spice or two of Virgil; and if there remain any overplus, you may lay them by for a skirmish. Season it well with similes, and it will make an excellent battle.

For a Burning Town.—If such a description be necessary, because it is certain there is one in Virgil, Old Troy is ready burnt to your hands. But if you fear that would be thought borrowed, a chapter or two of the Theory of the Conflagration, well circumstanced, and done into verse, will be a good succedaneum.

As for Similes and Metaphors, they may be found all over the creation; the most ignorant may gather them; but the danger is in applying them. For this, advise with your bookseller.

For the Language.—(I mean the diction.) Here it will do well to be an imitator of Milton, for you will find it easier to imitate him in this than anything else. Hebraisms and Grecisms are to be found in him, without the trouble of learning the languages. I knew a painter, who, like our poet, had no genius, make his daubings be thought originals by setting them in the smoke. You may, in the same manner, give the venerable air of antiquity to your piece, by darkening it up and down with Old English. With this you may be easily furnished upon any occasion by the dictionary commonly printed at the end of Chaucer.

I must not conclude without cautioning all writers without genius in one material point; which is, never to be afraid of having too much fire in their works. I should advise rather to take their warmest thoughts, and spread them abroad upon paper, for they are observed to cool before they are read.

The first edition of Pope (1751), by his friend Bishop Warburton, was an answer to Bolinghroke a attack on Pope's memory. Warton's (1797) was virtually a reply to Warburton's; Bowles and Roscoe each published an edition of his works, but all other editions have been superseded by that of Elwin and Courthope, with a Life of the poet by Courthope in the last volume (so vols. 1871-89).

John Dennis (1657 1734) was known as 'the critic,' and some of his critical disquisitions show an acute but narrow and coarse mind. The son of a prosperous London saddler, he had received a learned education at Harrow and Cambridge, and was well read in ancient and modern literature. He took his place among the men of wit and fashion, and brought a rancorous pen to the assistance of the Whigs. But his intolerable vanity, irritable temper, intemperance, and failure to attain literary success led him into feuds which rendered his whole life a scene of warfare. His critiques on Addison's Cato and Pope's Homer are well known. He wrote nine plays, for one of which—a tragedy called Apprus and Virginia (1708)—he invented a new species of thunder, which was approved of m the theatres. The play was not successful; and being afterwards present at a representation of Macbeth, and hearing his own thunder made use of, he growled, 'See how these rascals use me: they will not let my play run, and yet they steal my thunder!' Many ludicrous stories are told of his self-importance, which amounted to a disease. Southey has praised his critical powers, and Mr. Gosse, who speaks highly of his earlier work, has noted his 'fervent and judicious eulogy of Milton:' but Dennis is remembered mainly for his bitter attacks on the new school of poetry in his time, and for his quarrels with Pope, whom he assailed as a 'stupid and impudent hunch-backed toad.' Pope took ample vengeance.

Charles Gildon (1665-1724), born at Gillingham in Dorsetshire, was a Catholic bred at Dousy who became a deist, and was converted back to Protestant orthodoxy. He was an industrious hack-writer, wrote unsuccessful plays, occasional poems, a Life of Defoe, and some critical books, including one on The Laws of Poetry. As he preferred Tickell as a translator, and Ambrose Philips as a pastoral poet, to Pope, he was severely handled in the Dunciad and Moral Essays.

Edmund Smith (1672-1710) was, according to Dr Johnson, 'one of those lucky writers who have without much labour attained high reputation, and who are mentioned with reverence rather for the possession than the exertion of uncommon abilities;' but the reputation and the reverence have vanished, and little is remembered but his name and the fact that he wrote an artificial play, Phadra and Hippolytus, on Racine's model, which had the honour of a prologue by Addison and an epilogue by Prior, but was 'hardly heard the third night.1 Johnson sympathised with the public rather than with Addison, but highly praised Smith's Latin ode on the death of the orientalist, Dr Pococke, and his (English) elegy on John Philips. Handsome, slovenly 'Rag' Smith (for so he was known to his contemporaries) was the son of a London merchant called Neale, but assumed the name of a relative by whom he was brought up : he was expelled from Christ Church, Oxford, for his irregular life, and died of a dose of physic taken in defiance of the doctor.

John Hughes (1677-1720), born at Marborough, and educated at the same Dissenting academy as Dr Isaac Watts, is best known as author of a successful tragedy, The Siege of Damascus, and as a contributor to the Taller, the Spectator, the Guardian, and other serials. Pope and Swift thought more highly of his character than of his poetry. But he is one of Johnson's poets, having written a number of Poems on Several Occasions, odes, &cc., as well as the libretto for an English opera, Calypso and Telemachus, a masque, and several cantatas set to music by Handel and other eminent musicians.

To all that knew her in her station;

Another contemporary William King (1650-1729) was—though born in Aberdeenshire—Archbishop of Dublin, and a writer on divinity; a third (1685-1763), born at Stepney, and Principal of St Mary Hall, Oxford, was author of The Toast, a mockheroic satire levelled against his opponents in a troublesome lawsuit about a property in Galway.

Aaron Hill (1685-1750), the son of a Wiltshire squire, was bred at Barnstaple and Westminster, and travelled with a tutor to Constantinople and the Levant. He wrote numerous poems and a dozen plays, and cut a considerable figure among the literary men of the first half of the eighteenth century, not a few of whom were his debtors for encouragement and help; but he is best remembered for his controversy with Pope, the allusion to him in the Dunciad, for the spirit with which he met Pope's attack, and the victory he obtained in the ensuing correspondence. Only one of Hill's dramas, the tragedy of Zara, after Voltaire, can be said to have been popular. He was an ingenious, speculative man, projected a new way of making potash, extracted oil from beech-mast, manufactured wine from a vineyard in Essex, and tried to develop the rafting of timber down the Spey for the navy, but was seldom successful in any of his schemes.

Hill is not the contemptible poetaster he is often taken for, though in the eighty-two closely printed, double-columned pages occupied by his poetical works in Anderson's British Poets there is much wearisome commonplace, as well as some felicity of diction and real poetry, and much of no little interest, in a form old-fashioned enough to seem ungraceful, yet not archaic enough to be quaint. He praised Pope, encouraged Thomson with sound advice excellently versified, and enthusiastically greeted 'the unknown author of the beautiful new piece called Pamela.' He intervened warmly in prose and verse on behalf of Savage. He wrote the famous translation of Crashaw's lines on the miracle of Cana. In a panegyric of Peter the Great he laments British suspicion of Russia, foresees the Black Sea covered by the Russian navy, the East and West united and under Russian sway, Siberia occupied, and China and the Porte humiliated. And before Ossian Macpherson was born we find Hill translating from (non-extant?) Gaelic poems and praising the Scuirs of Skye.

Ronald and Dorna—By a Highlander, to his Mistress.

From a Literal Translation of the Original.

Come, let us climb Skorr-urran's snowy top;
Cold as it seems, it is less cold than you:
Thin through its snow these lambs its heath-twigs crop;
Your snow, more hostile, starves and freezes too.

What though I loved of late in Skie's fair isle;
And blushed, and bowed, and shrunk from Kenza's eye?
All she had power to hurt with was her smile;
But 'tis a frown of your's for which I die.

Ask why these herds beneath us rush so fast
On the brown sea-ware's stranded heaps to feed?
Winter, like you, withholds their wished repast,
And, robbed of genial grass, they browse on weed.

Mark with what tuneful haste Sheleila flows,

To mix its widening stream in Donnan's lake;

Yet should some dam the current's course oppose,

It must perforce a less loved passage take.

Born like your body for a spirit's claim, Trembling I wait, unsouled till you inspire: God has prepared the lamp, and bids it flame; But you, fair Dorna, have withheld the fire.

High as yon pine, when you begin to speak,
My lightening heart leaps hopeful at the sound;
But fainting at the sense, falls, void and weak,
And sinks and saddens like yon mossy ground.

All that I taste, or touch, or see, or hear,
Nature's whole breadth reminds me but of you;
Ev'n heaven itself would your sweet likeness wear,
If with its power you had its mercy too.

To Mrs L-r, playing on a Bass Viol.

While o'er the dancing chords your fingers fly, And bid them live, till they have made us die; Trembling in transport at your touch they spring, As if there dwelt a heart in every string.

Your voice soft rising through the lengthened notes, The married harmony united floats; Two charms so join'd that they compose but one; Like heat and brightness from the self-same sun.

Like heat and brightness from the self-same sun.

The wishful viol would its wealth retain,
And, sweetly conscious, hugs the pleasing pain,
Envious forbids the warbling joys to roll,
And, murmuring inward, swells its sounding soul.

Proud of its charming power, your tuneful bow
Floats o'er the chords majestically slow;
Careless and soft, calls out a tide of art,
And in a storm of music drowns the heart.

So when that god, who gave you all your skill,

So when that god, who gave you all your skill, To angel forms like yours intrusts his will, Calm they descend some new-meant world to found, And smiling see creation rising round!

A Song.

Oh forbear to bid me slight her,
Soul and senses take her part;
Could my death itself delight her,
Life should leap to leave my heart.
Strong though soft a lover's chain,
Charm'd with woe and pleas'd with pain.

Though the tender flame were dying,
Love would light it at her eyes;
Or, her tuneful voice applying,
Through my ear my soul surprise.
Deaf, I see the fate I shun;
Blind, I hear I am undone.

The Messenger.

Go, happy paper, gently steal,
And soft beneath her pillow lie:
There in a dream my love reveal,
A love that awe must else conceal,
In silent doubt to die.

Should she to flames thy hope consign,
Thy suffering moment soon expires,
A longer pain, alas, is mine,
Condemned in endless woe to pine,
And feel unslackening fires.

But if inclined to hear and bless,
While in her heart soft pity stirs;
Tell her her beauties might compel
A hermit to forsake his cell,
And change his heaven for her's.

Oh tell her were her treasures mine, Nature and art would court my aid; The painter's colours want her shine; The rainbow's brow not half so fine As her sweet eyelids shade!

By day the sun might spare his rays;
No star make evening bright;
Her opening eyes, with sweeter blaze,
Should measure all my smiling days,
And if she slept, 'twere night.

Leonard Welsted (1688-1747), born at Abington in Northamptonshire, and bred at Westminster and Cambridge, became clerk in ordinary to the Ordnance and a commissioner of State lotteries. He was an accomplished scholar and a fashionable poet, author of a play and a number of epistles, odes, and other poems, as well as of a translation of Longinus.

Elijah Fenton (1683-1730), reckoned by Johnson 'an excellent versifier and a good poet,' may still be held entitled to the first characterisation, inasmuch as it would hardly be possible to distinguish his share from Pope's in the translation of the Odyssey did we not know that Pope had assigned him the first, fourth, nineteenth, and twentieth books in the joint enterprise. Fenton was the son of an attorney at Shelton near Newcastle-under-Lyne, and studied at Jesus College, Cambridge. A very estimable man, he was for a time headmaster of the grammar-school at Sevenoaks in Kent, and from 1714 till his death was usually a tutor or secretary in wealthy houses. His odes to the Sun and to Life, his epistles, complimentary odes, elegies, and tales, are rather verse than poetry. But his tragedy of Marianne was acted with great success. He translated and 'imitated' from Isaiah, Horace, Ovid, Catullus, Propertius, and Chaucer (the latter exercitation in bogus-antique English).

William Broome (1689-1745), born at Haslington, Cheshire, from Eton passed to St John's College, Cambridge, held four livings in Suffolk and Norfolk, and wrote six books of Pope's Odyssey -the eighth, eleventh, twelfth, sixteenth, eighteenth, and twenty-third—in a style of verse even less distinguishable from Pope's own than Fenton's. Broome was a much better Greek scholar than Pope, who was greatly annoyed when he found that popular rumour exaggerated his debt to his collaborator; and the master-spirit was not above taking revenge on society by pillorying Broome in a line of the Dunciad. Broome's own verses have no merits save those of sound sense, appropriate illustration, and correct rhythm and rhyme. He is specially copious on the 'pompous misery of being great,' repeating with tedious iteration the sentiment that 'none are completely wretched but the great.'

Lewis Theobald (1688-1744) was one of the many contemporaries whom the satire of Pope invested with literary interest; but for their sorrows at Pope's hand some of their names would have long since passed into oblivion. The bad poets outwitted him, as Swift predicted, and provoked him to transmit their names to posterity. Theobald, the first hero of the Dunciad, procured the enmity of Pope by criticising his edition of Shakespeare, and editing a better edition himself (1733). Well versed in the Elizabethan writers, and in dramatic literature generally, he decidedly excelled Pope as a commentator. He is acknowledged to have made many most brilliant emendations of the folio text of Shakespeare-notably the famous 'and a babbled of green fields' in the Hostess's account of Falstaff's death in Henry V. He also wrote some poetical and dramatic pieces, but they are He was born at Sittingfeeble performances. bourne, and bred an attorney.

Thomas Yalden (1670-1736) was a poet commended by Johnson, whose verses fill over thirty closely printed, double-columned pages in Anderson's British Poets. His father was a groom of the chamber to Prince Charles, and after the Restoration an exciseman at Oxford. admitted as a demy to Magdalen College, took orders; held cures in Warwickshire, Wiltshire, Devonshire, and Hampshire successively or together; and in 1713 was appointed chaplain to Bridewell Hospital. He was imprisoned for a short time on suspicion of being concerned in Atterbury's schemes. He wrote translations, imitations, paraphrases or pieces 'in allusion to' Homer, Horace, Ovid, Isaiah, and others, 'Pindaric' odes on a variety of subjects, a collection of neatly turned fables with political reference, odes and hymns. How the High Churchman of that day judged Milton may be seen from the verses, quoted below, which he wrote in his copy of Paradise Lost:

These sacred lines with wonder we peruse, And praise the flights of a seraphic muse, Till thy seditious prose provokes our rage, And soils the beauties of thy brightest page. Thus here we see transporting scenes arise, Heaven's radiant host, and opening paradise; Then trembling view the dread abyss beneath, Hell's horrid mansions, and the realms of death.

Whilst here thy bold majestic numbers rise, And range th' embattled legions of the skies, With armies fill the azure plains of light, And paint the lively terrors of the fight, We own the poet worthy to rehearse Heaven's lasting triumphs in immortal verse: But when thy impious mercenary pen Insults the best of princes, best of men, Our admiration turns to just disdain, And we revoke the fond applause again.

Like the fall'n angels in their happy state, Thou shar'dst their nature, insolence and fate: To harps divine, immortal hymns they sung, As sweet thy voice, as sweet thy lyre was strung. As they did rebels to th' Almighty grow, So thou profan'st his image here below. Apostate bard! may not thy guilty ghost, Discover to its own eternal cost, That as they heaven, thou paradise hast lost!

His 'Hymn to Darkness,' obviously written in rivalry of Cowley's 'Hymn to Light,' begins thus:

Darkness, thou first great parent of us all,

Thou art our great original:

Since from thy universal womb

Does all thou shad'st below, thy numerous offspring come.

Thy wondrous birth is ev'n to time unknown,
Or, like eternity, thou'dst none;
Whilst light did its first being owe
Unto that awful shade it dares to rival now.

Say, in what distant region dost thou dwell,

To reason inaccessible?

From form and duller matter free,

Thou soar'st above the reach of man's philosophy.

Involv'd in thee, we first receive our breath,

Thou art our refuge too in death:

Great monarch of the grave and womb,

Where'er our souls shall go, to thee our bodies come.

Johnson says the first seven verses are good, but the third, fourth, and seventh are the best of them; the tenth he pronounces 'exquisitely beautiful'a judgment more significant for Johnson than for Yalden! The seventh and tenth are:

Though solid bodies do exclude the light,

Nor will the brightest ray admit:

No substance can thy force repel,

Thou reign'st in depths below, dost in the centre dwell...

Thou dost thy smiles impartially bestow,

And know'st no difference here below:

All things appear the same by thee,

Though light distinction makes, thou giv'st equality.

Johnson evidently valued the sense more than the manner; modern critics would find it difficult to see wherein the verses selected by Johnson for special commendation are less commonplace and antipoetic than the rest of the eighteen.

Bernard de Mandeville (1670-1733), 8 vigorous and graphic writer, who squandered exceptional powers largely on paradoxical and antimoral speculations, was born at Dort in Holland, and, having studied at Leyden, came over to England, and settled in London as a medical practitioner. His first publications were in rhyme In 1705 he published a string of sarcastic verse entitled The Grumbling Hive, or Knaves Turned Honest, which he reprinted in 1714 with the addition of long explanatory potes, and an Inquiry into the Origin of Moral Virtue, giving to the whole the title afterwards so well known, The Fable of the Bees, or Private Vices Public Benefits. To a later edition were added An Essay on Charity Schools and A Search into the Origin of Society. The Grumbling Hive is the only part where there is semblance of a fable; and from its first paragraph

His arguments were conby John Dennis, William Law, Bishop and others; and Mandeville replied to in Letters to Dion. But there is no reason that he seriously meant that the 'moral re the political offspring which flattery on pride.' And in teaching that restrain their selfish appetites and sacriown interests for the public good are dupes, the Dutch doctor anticipated a t of the teaching of Nietzsche. His gift as an English writer was remarkable in a foreigner. Benjamin Franklin found him the soul of a tavern club, 'a most entertaining, facetious companion.'

The extracts given below are from the Grumbling Hive, from the 'Remarks' O, and P. appended thereto, and from A Search into the Nature of Society.

Vast Numbers throng'd the fruitful hive; Yet those vast numbers made 'em thrive; Millions endeavouring to supply Each other's lust and vanity; Whilst other millions were employ'd, To see their handy-works destroy'd: They furnish'd half the universe; Yet had more work than labourers. Some with vast stocks and little pains Jump'd into business of great gains ; And some were damn'd to sythes and spades And all those hard laborious trades Where willing wretches daily sweat, And wear out strength and limbs to eat : Whilst others follow'd mysteries, To which few folks bind 'prentices; That want no stock, but that of brass, And may set up without a cross; As sharpers, parasites, pimps, players, Pick-pockets, coiners, quacks, south-sayers, And all those that in enmity, With downright working, cunningly Convert to their own use the labour Of their good-natur'd heedless neighbour. These were call'd knaves, but bar the name, The grave industrious were the same : All trades and places knew some cheat, No calling was without deceit.

On Division of Labour.

If we trace the most flourishing nations in their origin, we shall find that, in the remote beginnings of every society, the richest and most considerable men among them were a great while destitute of a great many comforts of life that are now enjoyed by the meanest and most humble wretches; so that many things which were once looked upon as the invention of luxury are now allowed even to those that are so miserably poor as to become the objects of public charity, nay, counted so necessary that we think no human creature ought to want them. , , , A man would be laughed at that should discover luxury in the plain dress of a poor creature that walks along in a thick parish gown, and a coarse shirt underneath it; and yet what a number of people, how many different trades, and what a variety of skill and tools, must be employed to have the most ordinary Yorkshire cloth! What depth of thought and ingenuity, what toil and labour, and what length of time must it have cost, before man could learn from a seed to raise and prepare so useful a product as linen ! . . .

What a bustle is there to be made in several parts of the world before a fine scarlet or crimson cloth can be produced; what multiplicity of trades and artificers must be employed! Not only such as are obvious, as woolcombers, spinners, the weaver, the cloth-worker, the scourer, the dyer, the setter, the drawer, and the packer; but others that are more remote, and might seem foreign to it, as the millwright, the pewterer, and the chymist, which yet are all necessary, as well as a great number of other handicrafts, to have the tools, utensils, and other implements belonging to the trades already named. all these things are done at home, and may be performed without extraordinary fatigue or danger; the most frightful prospect is left behind, when we reflect on the toil and hazard that are to be undergone abroad, the vast seas we are to go over, the different climates we are to endure, and the several nations we must be obliged to for their assistance. Spain alone, it is true, might furnish us with wool to make the finest cloth; but what skill and pains, what experience and ingenuity, are required to dye it of those beautiful colours! How widely are the drugs and other ingredients dispersed through the universe that are to meet in one kettle! Alum, indeed, we have of our own; argol we might have from the Rhine, and vitriol from Hungary: all this is in Europe. But then for saltpetre in quantity we are forced to go as far as the East Indies. Cocheneal, unknown to the ancients, is not much nearer to us, though in a quite different part of the earth: we buy it, 'tis true, from the Spaniards; but, not being their product, they are forced to fetch it for us from the remotest corner of the new world in the West Indies. Whilst so many sailors are broiling in the sun and sweltered with heat in the east and west of us, another set of them are freezing in the north to fetch potashes from Russia.

Virtues of the Great.

This contradiction in the frame of man [between professed principles and actual practice] is the reason that the theory of virtue is so well understood and the practice of it so rarely to be met with. If you ask me where to look for those beautiful shining qualities of primeministers, and the great favourites of princes, that are so finely painted in dedications, addresses, epitaphs, funeralsermons, and inscriptions, I answer, There, and nowhere else. Where would you look for the excellency of a statue but in that part which you see of it? 'Tis the polished outside only that has the skill and labour of the sculptor to boast of; what is out of sight is untouched. Would you break the head or cut open the breast to look for the brains or the heart, you would only show your ignorance, and destroy the workmanship. This has often made me compare the virtues of great men to your large china jars: they make a fine show, and are ornamental even to a chimney. One would, by the bulk they appear in and the value that is set upon them, think they might be very useful; but look into a thousand of them, and you will find nothing in them but dust and cobwebs.

Pomp and Superfluity.

If the great ones of the clergy, as well as the laity, of any country whatever, had no value for earthly pleasures, and did not endeavour to gratify their appetites, why are envy and revenge so raging among them, and all the other passions improved and refined upon in courts of princes more than anywhere else; and why are their repasts, their recreations, and whole manner of living, always such as are approved of, coveted, and imitated by the most sensual people of the same country? If, despising all visible decorations, they were only in love with the embellishments of the mind, why should they borrow so many of the implements, and make use of the most darling toys, of the luxurious? Why should a lord treasurer, or a bishop, or even the Grand Signior, or the Pope of Rome, to be good and virtuous and endeavour the conquest of his passions, have occasion for greater revenues, richer furniture, or a more numeous attendance as to personal service than a private man? What virtue is it the exercise of which requires so much pomp and superfluity as are to be seen by all men in power? A man has as much opportunity to practise temperance that has but one dish at a med, as he that is constantly served with three courses and a dozen dishes in each. One may exercise as much patience and be as full of self-denial on a few flocks, without curtains or tester, as in a velvet bed that is sixteen foot high. The virtuous possessions of the m are neither charge nor burden: a man may bear mister tunes with fortitude in a garret, forgive injuries afort, and be chaste, though he has not a shirt to his back; and therefore I shall never believe but that an indifferent sculler, if he was entrusted with it, might carry all the learning and religion that one man can contain, as well as a barge with six oars, especially if it was but to cross from Lambeth to Westminster; or that humility is so ponderous a virtue, that it requires six horses to draw it.

Lord Bolingbroke.—Henry St John, Viscount Bolingbroke, was in his own day the most conspicuous and illustrious of that friendly hand of Tory wits who adorned the reigns of Anne and George I. St John was descended from an ancient family, and was born at Battersea in 1678. He was educated at Eton (not at Oxford). After travelling on the Continent, he entered Parliament, was successively Secretary for War and Foreign Secretary of State, shared the Tory leadership with Harley, but estranged his followers by his mania for secret scheming. Made a peer in 1712, be negotiated the Treaty of Utrecht in 1713. After intriguing successfully for Harley's downfall, be was plotting a Jacobite restoration when Quest Anne died and George I. succeeded. Retiring to France, he was attainted, and served the Pretender as secretary. Here also he became unpopular, and was accused of neglect or is-Losing thus a second secretaryship, capacity. he had recourse to literature, and produced his Reflections upon Exile, and a letter to Sir William Wyndham, an apologia for his conduct containing some of his very best writing. In 1723 he obtained permission to return to England; his family inheritance was restored to him, but he was excluded from the House of Lords. He commenced an active opposition to Walpole, and wrote a number of political tracts against the Whig Ministry. Disappointed in his hope of re-entering political life, he retired again to France in 1735, and resided there seven years, writing now his most important contributions to literature—his Letters on the Study of History and a Letter on the True Use of Retirement. In 1738, on a visit to England, he entrusted to Pope the MS. of his Letters on the Spirit of Patriotism and his Idea of a Patriot King. Chesterfield said of the latter, Bolingbroke's most elaborate piece, that till he I not know the extent and power language. The Decline of Life.

We are both in the decline of life, my dear Dean, and have been some years going down the hill; let us make the passage as smooth as we can. Let us fence against physical evil by care, and the use of those means which experience must have pointed out to us; let us fence against moral evil by philosophy. We may, nay-if we will follow nature and do not work up imagination against her plainest dictates—we shall, of course, grow every year more indifferent to life, and to the affairs and interests of a system out of which we are soon to go. This is much better than stupidity. The decay of passion strengthens philosophy, for passion may decay, and stupidity not succeed. Passions-says Pope, our divine, as you will see one time or other-are the gales of life; let us not complain that they do not blow a storm. What hurt does age do us in subduing what we toil to subdue all our lives? It is now six in the morning; I recall the time—and am glad it is over—when about this hour I used to be going to bed surfeited with pleasure, or jaded with business; my head often full of schemes, and my heart as often full of anxiety. Is it a misfortune, think you, that I rise at this hour refreshed, serene, and calm; that the past and even the present affairs of life stand like objects at a distance from me, where I can keep off the disagreeable, so as not to be strongly affected by them, and from whence I can draw the others nearer to me? Passions, in their force, would bring all these, may even future contingencies, shout my ears at once, and reason would but ill defend me in the scuffle.

The Mind's Independence of Circumstances.

Believe me, the providence of God has established such an order in the world, that of all which belongs to us, the least valuable parts can alone fall under the will of others. Whatever is best is safest, lies most out of the reach of human power, can neither be given nor taken away. Such is this great and beautiful work of nature -the world. Such is the mind of man, which contemplates and admires the world, where it makes the noblest part. These are inseparably ours; and as long as we remain in one, we shall enjoy the other. Let us march, therefore, intrepidly, wherever we are led by the course of human accidents. Wherever they lead us, on what coast soever we are thrown by them, we shall not find ourselves absolutely strangers. We shall meet with men and women, creatures of the same figure, endowed with the same faculties, and born under the same laws of nature. We shall see the same virtues and vices flowing from the same general principles, but varied in a thousand different and contrary modes, according to that infinite variety of laws and customs which is established for the same universal end-the preservation of society. We shall feel the same revolutions of seasons; and the same sun and moon will guide the course of our year. The same azure vault, bespangled with stars, will be everywhere spread over our heads. There is no part of the world from whence we may not admire those planets, which roll, like ours, in different orbits round the same central sun; from whence we may not discover an object still more stupendous, that army of fixed stars hung up in the immense space of the universe, innumerable suns, whose beams enlighten and cherish the unknown worlds which roll around them; and whilst I am ravished by such contemplations as these, whilst my soul is thus raised up to heaven, it imports me little what ground I tread upon. (From Reflections upon Exile.)

National Partiality and Prejudice.

There is scarce any folly or vice more epidemical among the sons of men than that ridiculous and hurtful vanity by which the people of each country are apt to prefer themselves to those of every other; and to make their own customs, and manners, and opinions the standards of right and wrong, of true and false. The Chinese mandarins were strangely surprised and almost incredulous when the Jesuits shewed them how small a figure their empire made in the general map of the world. . . . Now, nothing can contribute more to prevent us from being tainted with this vanity than to accustom ourselves early to contemplate the different nations of the earth in that vast map which history spreads before us, in their rise and their fall, in their barbarous and civilised states, in the likeness and unlikeness of them all to one another, and of each to itself. By frequently renewing this prospect to the mind, the Mexican with his cap and coat of feathers, sacrificing a human victim to his god, will not appear more savage to our eyes than the Spaniard with an hat on his head, and a gonilla round his neck, sacrificing whole nations to his ambition, his avarice, and even the wantonness of his cruelty. I might shew by a multitude of other examples how history prepares us for experience, and guides us in it; and many of these would be both curious and important. I might likewise bring several other instances wherein history serves to purge the mind of those national partialities and prejudices that we are apt to contract in our education, and that experience for the most part rather confirms than removes; because it is for the most part confined, like our education. But I apprehend growing too prolix, and shall therefore conclude this head by observing, that though an early and proper application to the study of history will contribute extremely to keep our minds free from a ridiculous partiality in favour of our own country, and a vicious prejudice against others, yet the same study will create in us a preference of affection to our own country. There is a story told of Abgarus. He brought several beasts taken in different places to Rome, they say, and let them loose before Augustus; every beast m immediately to that part of the circus where a parcel of earth taken from his native soil had been laid. Cride Judaus Apella. This tale might pass on Josephus; for in him, I believe, I read it; but surely the love of our country is a lesson of reason, not an institution of nature. Education and habit, obligation and interest, attach was it, not instinct. It is, however, so necessary to be cultivated, and the prosperity of all societies, as well as the grandeur of some, depends upon it so much, that orates by their eloquence, and poets by their enthusiasm, have endeavoured to work up this precept of morality into a principle of passion. But the examples which we find a history, improved by the lively descriptions and the jest applauses or censures of historians, will have a much better and more permanent effect than declamation, or song, or the dry ethics of mere philosophy.

(From On the Study of History)

Complaints about the Shortness of Life Unreasonable.

I think very differently from most men of the time we have to pass, and the business we have to do, in this world. I think we have more of one, and less of the other, than is commonly supposed. Our want of time, and the shortness of human life, are some of the principal common-place complaints which we prefer against the established order of things; they are the grumblings of the vulgar, and the pathetic lamentations of the philoopher; but they are impertinent and impleus in both The man of business despises the man of pleasure for squandering his time away; the man of pleasure pits or laughs at the man of business for the same thing; and yet both concur superciliously and absurdly to find sub with the Supreme Being for having given them so little time. The philosopher, who misspends it very often s much as the others, joins in the same cry, and authoris this impiety. Theophrastus thought it extremely hard to die at ninety, and to go out of the world when he bed just learned how to live in it. His master Aristotle found fault with nature for treating man in this respect work than several other animals; both very unphilosophically! and I love Seneca the better for his quarrel with the Stagirite on this head. We see, in so many instances, a just proportion of things, according to their several relations to one another, that philosophy should lead us to conclude this proportion preserved, even where we do not discern it; instead of leading us to conclude that it is not preserved where we do not discern it, or where we think that we see the contrary. To conclude otherwise is shocking presumption. It is to presume that the system of the universe would have been more wisely contrived if creatures of our low rank among intellectual natures had been called to the councils of the Most High; or that the Creator ought to amend his work by the advice of the creature. That life which seems to our self-love so short, when we compare it with the ideas we frame of eternity, or even with the duration of some other beings, will appear sufficient, upon a less partial view, to all the ends of our creation, and of a just proportion in the successive course of generations. The term long; we render it short; and the want we of flows from our profusion, not from our

But if you have not thus examined, it must be evident to all, nay to yourself on the least cool reflection, that you are still, notwithstanding all your learning, in a state of ignorance. For knowledge can alone produce knowledge; and without such an examination of axioms and facts, you can have none about inferences.'

In this manner one might expostulate very reasonably with many a great scholar, many a profound philosopher, many a dogmatical casuist. And it serves to set the complaints about want of time and the shortness of human life in a very ridiculous but a true light.

Pleasures of a Patriot.

Neither Montaigne in writing his essays, nor Descartes in building new worlds, nor Burnet in framing an antediluvian earth, no, nor Newton in discovering and establishing the true laws of nature on experiment and a sublimer geometry, felt more intellectual joys than he feels who is a real patriot, who bends all the force of his understanding, and directs all his thoughts and actions, to the good of his country. When such a man forms a political scheme and adjusts various and seemingly independent parts in it to one great and good design, he is transported by imagination, or absorbed in meditation, as much and as agreeably as they; and the satisfaction that arises from the different importance of these objects, in every step of the work, is vastly in his favour. It is here that the speculative philosopher's labour and pleasure end. But he who speculates in order to act, goes on and carries his scheme into execution. His labour continues, it varies, it increases; but so does his pleasure too. The execution, indeed, is often traversed, by unforeseen and untoward circumstances, by the perverseness or treachery of friends, and by the power or malice of enemies; but the first and the last of these animate, and the docility and fidelity of some men make amends for the perverseness and treachery of others. Whilst a great event is in suspense, the action warms, and the very suspense, made up of hope and fear, maintains no unpleasing agitation in the mind. If the event is decided successfully, such a man enjoys pleasure proportionable to the good he has done-a pleasure like to that which is attributed to the Supreme Being on a survey of his works. If the event is decided otherwise, and usurping courts or overbearing parties prevail, such a man has still the testimony of his conscience, and a sense of the honour he has acquired, to soothe his mind and support his courage. For although the course of state affairs be to those who meddle in them like a lottery, yet it is a lottery wherein no good man can be a loser; he may be reviled, it is true, instead of being applauded, and may suffer violence of many kinds. I will not say, like Seneca, that the noblest spectacle which God can behold is a virtuous man suffering and struggling with afflictions; but this I will say, that the second Cato, driven out of the forum and dragged to prison, enjoyed more inward pleasure and maintained more outward dignity than they who insulted him, and who triumphed in the ruin of their country.

Wise, not Cunning Ministers.

We may observe much the same difference between wisdom and cunning, both as to the objects they propose and to the means they employ, as we observe between the visual powers of different men. One sees distinctly the objects that are near to him, their immediate relations, and their direct tendencies: and a sight like this serves well enough the purpose of those who concern themselves no further. The cunning minister is one of those: he neither sees nor is concerned to see any further than his personal interests and the support of his administration require. If such a man overcomes any actual difficulty, avoids any immediate distress, or, without doing either of these effectually, gains a little time by all the low artifice which cunning is ready to suggest and baseness of mind to employ, he triumphs, and is flattered by his mercenary train on the great event; which amounts often to no more than this, that he got into distress by one series of faults, and out of it by another. The wise minister sees and is concerned to see further, because government has a further concern: he sees the objects that are distant as well as those that are near, and all their remote relations, and even their indirect tendencies. He thinks of fame as well as of applause, and prefers that which to be enjoyed must be given, to that which may be bought. He considers his administration as a single day in the great year of government; but as a day that is affected by those which went before, and that must affect those which are to follow. He combines, therefore, and compares all these objects, relations, and tendencies; and the judgment he makes on an entire, not a partial survey of them, is the rule of his conduct. That scheme of the reason of state, which lies open before a wise minister, contains all the great principles of government, and all the great interests of his country: so that, as he prepares some events, he prepares against others, whether they be likely to happen during his administration, or in some future time. (From The Idea of a Patriot King.)

Bolingbroke's collected works were published by Mallet in 1753-54. See works on him by Macknight (1863), Harrop (1884), Churton Collins (1886), and Hassall (1887), and the defence of his character for patriotism by W. Sichel (vol. i. 1901). Ch. de Remusat's character-sketch (in L'Angleterre au XVIIIième Siècle) is eminently judicial; and there are German works on him by Von Noorden (1882) and Brosch (1883).

Isaac Watts (1674–1748) was born at Southampton, where his father kept a boarding-school and was in a small way a poet. The child of pious parents, he was trained for the ministry at an Independent academy in London; and he was for six years tutor in the family of Sir John Hartopp at Stoke-Newington. Here he was chosen (1699) assistant-minister by the Independent congregation in Mark Lane, where three years after he succeeded to the full charge; but infirm health soon rendered him unequal to the performance of the full ministerial labours. His health continuing to decline, he went for change of air in 1712 into the house of Sir Thomas Abney (Lord Mayor in 1700) at Theobalds; and as an inmate of that kindly household he spent the remainder of his life—thirty-six years. While in this pleasant retreat he preached occasionally, and, in spite of his small stature and feeble health, he was accounted an admirable and effective preacher. But he gave the most of his time to literary labour. He produced a series of catechisms and educational manuals, as well as theological works and volumes of sermons. His treatises on Logic and on the Improvement of the Mind were long in constant use as handbooks His poetry consists mainly but not wholly of devotional hymns, which by their simplicity and unaffected ardour secured the interest of many generations, and were never forgotten in mature life by those who committed them to memory as children. The Hora Lyrica (1705) and Hymni and Spiritual Songs (1707) were followed by Divine and Moral Songs for Children (1715), Psalms of David Imitated (1719), and Reliquie Juveniles (1734, in prose and verse).

Watts's theology was marked by a charity and catholicity then unusual amongst the orthodox, and even exposed him to the charge of heresy at the hands of the stricter brethren. A Calvinist, he yet shrank from the high doctrine of reprobation. He held the doctrine of the Trinity not essential to salvation, and was willing to admit Arians to communion; and it was even affirmed—on insufficient evidence—that in the end he had become a Unitarian. His hymns provided a vehicle for the religious emotions of the English world till then (from theological prejudice or otherwise) unknown. Among his five hundred hymns and versions there is many a metrical defect, and not a few verses of mere rhymed theology; yet a select number remain amongst the most cherished treasures of English devotion. It is enough to name 'There is a land of pure delight,' 'Jesus shall reign where'er the sun,' 'When I survey the wondrous cross,' and 'Our God, our help in ages past.' The second of these is the first great missionary hymn; the third has been pronounced 'the most majestic hymn in English speech.' Those who think of Watts as the author mainly of 'How doth the little busy bee,' 'Let dogs delight,' and a few similar edifying verses in the common measure rhyme do him a great injustice. Even in the Divine and Moral Songs for Children there is frequently something of the sweet simplicity of Blake, if the fervour is usually ethical rather than lyrical; Watts's blank verse comes very near Cowper's in feeling and rhythm, and there is at times a line or a touch that suggests even Wordsworth. And the rhythms of the irregular ode, of the Sapphic, of the heroic measure, are handled with no inconsiderable skill. The poems quoted below are all from the Hora Lyrica.

From 'The Law given at Sinai.'

Forbear, young muse, forbear;
The flowery things that poets say,
The little arts of simile
Are vain and useless here;
Nor shall the burning hills of old
With Sinai be compared,
Nor all that lying Greece has told,
Or learned Rome has heard;

Ætna shall be named no more,
Ætna the torch of Sicily;
Not half so high
Her lightnings fly;
Not half so loud her thunders roar
Cross the Sicaman sea, to fright the Italian shore.
Behold the sacred hill: Its trembling spire
Quakes at the terrors of the fire,
While all below its verdant feet
Stagger and reel under the Almighty weight:
Pressed with a greater than feigned Atlas' load.
Deep groaned the mount; it never bore
Infinity before,
It bowed, and shook beneath the burden of a God.

From 'The Day of Judgment'-An Ode. Attempted in English Sapplick.

When the fierce north wind with his airy forces
Rears up the Baltic to a foaming fury;
And the red lightning with a storm of hail comes Rushing amain down.

How the poor sailors stand amazed and tremble! While the hoarse thunder, like a bloody trumpet, Roars a loud onset to the gaping waters, Ouick to devour them.

Such shall the noise be, and the wild disorder, (If things eternal may be like these earthly,) Such the dire terror when the great Archangel
Shakes the creation;

Tears the strong pillars of the vault of heaven, Breaks up old marble, the repose of princes. See the graves open, and the bones arising, Flames all around them.

From 'To Sarisea'-An Epistle

Farewell, ye waxing and ye waning moons, That we have watched behind the flying clouds On night's dark hill, or setting or ascending, Or in meridian height: Then silence reigned O'er half the world; then ye beheld our tears, Ye witnessed our complaints, our kindred groans, (Sad harmony!) while with your beamy horns Or richer orb ye silvered o'er the green Where trod our feet, and lent a feeble light To mourners. Now ye have fulfilled your round, Those hours are fled, farewell. Months that are gone Are gone for ever, and have borne away Each his own load. Our woes and sorrows past, Mountainous woes, still lessen as they fly Far off. So billows in a stormy sea, Wave after wave (a long succession) roll Beyond the ken of sight: The sailors safe Look far a-stern till they have lost the storm, And shout their boisterous joys.

From 'True Monarchy.'

We are a little kingdom; but the man That chains his rebel will to reason's throne, Forms it a large one, while his royal mind Makes heaven its council, from the rolls above Draws its own statutes, and with joy obeys. This not a troop of well-appointed guards Create a monarch, not a purple robe Dyed in the people's blood, not all the crowns Or dazzling tiars that bend about the head,
Though gilt with sun-beams and set round with stars,
A monarch he that conquers all his fears,
And treads upon them; when he stands alone,
Makes his own camp; four guardian virtues wait
His nightly slumbers, and secure his dreams.
Now dawns the light; he ranges all his thoughts
In square battalions, bold to meet the attacks
Of time and chance, himself a numerous host,
All eye, all ear, all wakeful as the day,
Firm as a rock, and moveless as the centre.

From 'True Courage.'

This is the man whom storms could never make Meanly complain; nor can a flattering gale Make him talk proudly: he hath no desire To read his secret fate: yet unconcerned And calm could meet his unborn destiny,

DR ISAAC WATTS.

(From the Portrait by Sir G. Kneller in the National Portrait Gallery.)

In all its charming, or its frightful shapes. He that unshrinking, and without a groan, Bears the first wound, may finish all the war With mere courageous silence, and come off Conqueror: for the man that well conceals The heavy strokes of fate, he bears them well. He, though the Atlantic and the Midland seas With adverse surges meet, and rise on high Suspended 'twixt the winds, then rush amain Mingled with flames, upon his single head, And clouds, and stars, and thunder, firm he stands, Secure of his best life; unhurt, unmoved; And drops his lower nature, born for death. Then from the lofty castle of his mind Sublime looks down exulting, and surveys The ruins of creation (souls alone Are heirs of dying worlds); a piercing glance Shoots upwards from between his closing lids, To reach his birth-place, and without a sigh

He bids his battered flesh lie gently down Amongst his native rubbish; whilst the spirit Breathes and flies upward, an undoubted guest Of the third heaven, the unruinable sky.

Thither, when fate has brought our willing souls, No matter whether 'twas a sharp disease, Or a sharp sword that help'd the travellers on, And pushed us to our home. Bear up, my friend, Serenely, and break through the stormy brine With steady prow; know, we shall once arrive At the fair haven of eternal bliss, To which we ever steer; whether as kings Of wide command we've spread the spacious sea With a broad painted fleet, or rowed along In a thin cock-boat with a little oar.

Dr Watts breathing forth threatenings and slaughter against the enemies of his king and country is a pleasing spectacle. In an 'answer to an infamous satyr called "Advice to a Painter" against King William III. of glorious memory,' the good doctor thus blazes forth:

Why smoke the skies not? Why no thunders roll? Nor kindling lightnings blast his guilty soul? Audacious wretch! to stab a monarch's fame, And fire his subjects with a rebel-flame; To call the painter to his black designs, To draw our guardian's face in hellish lines: Painter, beware! the monarch can be shown Under no shape but angel's, or his own, Gabriel or William, on the British throne.

O could my thought but grasp the vast design,
And words with infinite ideas join,
I'd rouse Apelles from his iron sleep,
And bid him trace the warrior o'er the deep:
Trace him, Apelles, o'er the Belgian plain;
Fierce, how he climbs the mountains of the slain,
Scattering just vengeance through the red campaign.
Then dash the canvas with a flying stroke,
Till it be lost in clouds of fire and smoke,
And say, 'Twas thus the conqueror through the squadrons broke.

Mark him again emerging from the cloud, Far from his troops; there like a rock he stood His country's single barrier in a sea of blood. Whilst alone

He wards the fate of nations, and provokes his own: But heaven secures its champion; o'er the field Paint hovering angels; though they fly conceal'd, Each intercepts a death, and wears it on his shield.

Watts in defence of his own choice of subjects, and in exhortation of other poets (in the preface to the Hora), shows a command of swinging rhythmical prose:

Besides, we may fetch a further answer to Monsieur Boileau's objection from other poets of his own country. What a noble use have Racine and Corneille made of Christian subjects in some of their best tragedies! What a variety of divine scenes are displayed, and pious passions awakened, in those poems! The martyrdom of Polyeucte, how doth it reign over our love and pity, and at the same time animate our zeal and devotion! May I here be permitted the liberty to return my thanks to that fair and ingenious hand that directed me to sade entertainments in a foreign language, which I had long wished for, and sought in vain in our own. Yet I must confess, that the Davideis, and the two Arthurs, have so far answered Boileau's objection, in English, as that the obstacles of attempting Christian poesy are broken down, and the vain pretence of its being impracticable is experimentally confuted.

It is true indeed, the Christian mysteries have not such need of gay trappings as beautified, or rather conposed, the heathen superstition. But this still makes for the greater ease and surer success of the poet. The wonders of our religion, in a plain narration and a simple dress, have a native grandeur, a dignity, and a beauty in them, though they do not utterly disdain all methods of ornament. The book of the Revelation seems to be a prophecy in the form of an opera or s dramatic poem, where divine art illustrates the subject with many charming glories; but still it must be acknowledged that the naked themes of Christianity have something brighter and bolder in them, something more surprising and celestial, than all the adventures of gods and heroes, all the dazzling images of false lustre that form and garnish a heathen song: here the very argament would give wonderful aids to the muse, and the heavenly theme would so relieve a dull hour and a languishing genius, that when the muse nods, the sens would burn and sparkle upon the reader, and keep him feelingly awake.

With how much less toil and expense might a Dryden an Otway, a Congreve, or a Dennis furnish out : Christian poem than a modern play! There is nothing among all the ancient fables or later romances the have two such extremes united in them as the eterns God becoming an infant of days; the possessor of th palace of Heaven laid to sleep in a manger; the hol Jesus, who knew no sin, bearing the sins of men in hi body on the tree; agonies of sorrow loading the soul him who was God over all, blessed for ever; and th sovereign of life stretching his arms on a cross, bleedin and expiring: The heaven and the hell in our divinit are infinitely more delightful and dreadful than the childish figments of a dog with three heads, the bucke of the Belides, the Furies with snaky hairs, or all the flowery stories of Elysium. And if we survey the or as themes divinely true, and the other as a medley fooleries which we can never believe, the advantage fo touching the springs of passion will fall infinitely on tl side of the Christian poet; our wonder and our love, or pity, delight, and sorrow, with the long train of hopand fears, must needs be under the command of a harmonious pen, whose every line makes a part of th reader's faith, and is the very life or death of his soul.

If the trifling and incredible tales that furnish out a tragedy are so armed by wit and fancy as to become sovereign of the rational powers, to triumph over all the affections, and manage our smiles and our tears at pleasure; how wondrous a conquest might be obtained over a wild world, and reduce it, at least, to sobriety, if the same happy talent were employed in dressing the scene of religion in their proper figures of majesty, sweetness and terror! The wonders of creating power, of redeen ing love, and renewing grace, ought not to be thus in piously neglected by those whom Heaven has endue with a gift so proper to adorn and cultivate them; an a whose sweet insinuations might almost convey piety i nature, and melt the hardest souls to the love The affairs of this life, with their reference to come, would shine bright in a dramatic de-; nor is there any need of any reason why we lways borrow the plan or history from the ancient primitive martyrs, though several of these would out noble materials for this sort of poesy: but scenes would be better understood by most and the application would be much more easy. uish of inward guilt; the secret stings and racks irges of conscience; the sweet retiring hours and al joys of devotion; the victory of a resolved я a thousand temptations; the inimitable love sion of a dying God; the awful glories of the last ; the grand decisive sentence, from which there opeal; and the consequent transports or horrors vo eternal worlds: these things may be variously l, and form many poems. How might such peres, under a divine blessing, call back the dying the nation to life and beauty? This would eligion appear like itself, and confound the nies of a profligate world, ignorant of pious re have reason to fear that the tuneful men of have not raised their ambition to so divine a should rejoice to see more of this celestial fire within them; for the flashes that break out in esent and past writings betray an infernal source. incomparable Mr Cowley, in the latter end of ace, and the ingenious Sir Richard Blackmore, beginning of his, have so pathetically described tented, that I rather refer the reader to mourn m, than detain and tire him here. These gentletheir large and laboured works of poesy have two world happy examples of what they wish and ge in prose; the one in a rich variety of thought y, the other in all the shining colours of profuse d diction.

rter sonnets were composed on sublime subjects, the Psalms of David and the holy transports sed in the other sacred writings, or such as the des of Horace and the ancient lyricks, I persyself that the Christian preacher would find t aid from the poet in his design to diffuse nd allure souls to God. If the heart were first from Heaven, and the muse were not left alone the devotion and pursue a cold scent, but only as an assistant to the worship, then the song nd where the inspiration ceases; the whole re would be of a piece, all meridian light and fervour; and the same pious flame would be ed and kept glowing in the heart of him that Some of the shorter odes of the two poets now ed, and a few of the Rev. Mr Norris's Essays are convincing instances of the success of this ny opinion, also, that the free and unconfined of Pindar or the noble measures of Milton rhyme would best maintain the dignity of the swell as give a loose to the devout soul, nor e raptures of her faith and love. Though in e attempts of this kind I have too often fettered ghts in the narrow metre of our Psalm-trans-I have contracted and cramped the sense, or it obscure and feeble, by the too speedy and eturns of rhyme.

The 'large and laboured works of poesy' above described are Cowley's Davideis (see Vol. I. p. 643) and Blackmore's two poems on Arthur (see Vol. II. p. 107). For Mr Norris, see below at page 259. There are Lives of Watts by Dr Gibbons, Dr Johnson, Southey, Milner, and E. Paxton Hood (1875). Since 1753 there have been more than half-a-dozen collective editions of his works; that of 1824 was in 6 vols. 4to.

Charles Leslie (1650-1722), author in 1698 of the famous Short and Easy Method with the Deists, was born in Dublin, the sixth son of John Leslie (1571-1671), the centenarian Bishop of Raphoe and Clogher, who was of Aberdeenshire Educated at Enniskillen and Trinity College, Dublin, Charles Leslie studied law in London, but in 1680 took orders. As chancellor of the cathedral of Connor, he distinguished himself by several disputations with Catholic divines, and by the boldness with which he opposed the pro-papal designs of King James. Nevertheless at the Revolution he adopted a decisive tone of Jacobitism, from which he never swerved through Removing to London, he was chiefly engaged for several years in writing controversial works against Quakers, Socinians, and deists, of which, however, none are now remembered except the little treatise above named, and his Gallienus Redivivus (1695), a chief authority for the Massacre of Glencoe. He also wrote many occasional tracts in behalf of the House of Stuart. In 1711 he repaired to St Germains, and in 1713 to Bar-le-Duc. The Chevalier allowed him to have a chapel fitted up for the English service, and was even expected to lend a favourable ear to his arguments against popery; but in 1721 Leslie returned to Ireland in disgust, and soon after died at his house of Glaslough in County Monaghan. His works (7 vols. 1832) place their author high amongst controversial writers.

John Potter (c. 1674-1747) contributed little to English literature, but as a very eminent English classical scholar deserves a brief record. Born at Wakefield, and educated at University College, Oxford, he became professor of divinity at Oxford in 1708, Bishop of Oxford in 1715, and in 1737 Archbishop of Canterbury. He published, besides notes on Plutarch and St Basil, the Archaologia Græca, or Antiquities of Greece (1698), which was practically the standard work till after the middle of the nineteenth century; also editions of Lycophron (1697) and Clemens Alexandrinus (1715); and in English, a Discourse on Church Government, and other theological treatises, several of them against Hoadly, who complimented Potter as being his most formidable antagonist.

James Bramston (c. 1694-1744) wrote two satirical poems, much admired in their day and included in Dodsley's Collection: The Art of Politics, described as 'in imitation of Horace's Art of Poetry' (1729), and The Man of Taste (1733), 'occasioned by Pope's Epistle on that Subject.' He also produced an imitation of Philips's Splendid Shilling, called The Crooked Sixpence. In 1708

Bramston was admitted at Westminster School; in 1713 he was elected to a studentship at Christ Church, Oxford; and in 1723-25 he became vicar of Lurgashall and Harting in Sussex. His two principal poems are good essays in the style of Pope's and Young's satires. The following is the conclusion of his Art of Politics:

Parliamenteering is a sort of itch, That will too oft unwary knights bewitch. Two good estates Sir Harry Clodpole spent; Sate thrice, but spoke not once, in Parliament. Two good estates are gone—who'll take his word? Oh, should his uncle die, he'll spend a third; He'd buy a house his happiness to crown, Within a mile of some good borough-town; Tag-rag and bobtail to Sir Harry's run, Men that have votes, and women that have none; Sons, daughters, grandsons with his Honour dine; He keeps a publick-house without a sign. Cobblers and smiths extol th' ensuing choice, And drunken tailors boast their right of voice. Dearly the free-born neighbourhood is bought, They never leave him while he's worth a groat; So leeches stick, nor quit the bleeding wound, Till off they drop with skinfuls to the ground.

His Man of Taste is ironically made thus to expatiate on his likes and dislikes:

Swift's whims and jokes for my resentment call, For he displeases me that pleases all.

Verse without rhyme I never could endure,
Uncouth in numbers, and in sense obscure.

To him as nature when he ceased to see,
Milton's an universal blank to me.

Confirmed and settled by the nation's voice,
Rhyme is the poet's pride and people's choice,
Always upheld by national support,
Of market, university, and court:
Thomson, write blank; but know that for that reason,
These lines shall live when thine are out of season.
Rhyme binds and beautifies the poet's lays,
As London ladies owe their shape to stays.

In the same poem he parodies:

Musick has charms to soothe a savage beast, And therefore proper at a sheriff's feast.

And many of the couplets are sprightly:

To give is wrong, but it is wronger still, On any terms to pay a tradesman's bill.

I'll please the maids of honour if I can; Without black velvet britches, what is man?

Oxford and Cambridge are not worth one farthing, Compared to Haymarket and Convent-garden.

This is true taste, and whoso likes it not Is blockhead, coxcomb, puppy, fool, and sot.

Laurence Echard (c. 1670-1730), born at Barsham rectory in Suffolk, and bred at Christ's, Cambridge, held a succession of Lincolnshire and Suffolk livings, and died Archdeacon of Stow. Of nearly a score of publications, educational, classical, geographical, and historical, the most important was his History of England (1707-20) from the Romans to William and Mary, which was the standard work thenceforward till it was superseded by Rapin's. The 'historic method' has long since banished some of the elements which in Echard's day were available for enlivening the records of the past. After the battle of Worcester 'Cromwell in his letter to the Parliament tells them,' says Echard, 'that the dimensions of this Mercy were above his thoughts, and that it was a Crowning Mercy.' There was, however, another side to the story, Echard thought, and adds accordingly this tale of Cromwell and the Devil.

But others accounted it an infernal judgment; oncerning which we have a strange story in the last put of the History of Independency, which the author says he received from a person of quality, viz. 'It was believ'd, and that not without some good cause, that Cromwell the same morning that he defeated the King's army at Worcester, had conference personally with the devil, with whom he made a contract, that to have in will then, and in all things else for seven years from that day, he should, at the expiration of the said years, have him at his command, to do at his pleasure, both with his soul and body.' This is also related in other printed books; but we have receiv'd a more full account new yet publish'd, which is here inserted as a thing more wonderful than probable, and therefore more for the diversion than satisfaction of the reader. It is a relation or narrative of a valiant officer call'd Lindsey, a intimate friend of Cromwell's, the first captain of his regiment, and therefore commonly called Colonel Lindso; which is to this effect. 'On the third of September's the morning, Cromwell took this officer to a wood side not far from the army, and bid him alight, and follow him into that wood, and to take particular notice of what he saw and heard. After they had both alighted, and secur'd their horses, and walk'd some small wy into the wood, Lindsey began to turn pale, and to be seiz'd with horror from some unknown cause: upon which Cromwell ask'd him how he did, or how be tel himself. He answer'd, that he was in such a trembling and consternation, that he never felt the like in all the conflicts and battels he had been engag'd in; but whether it proceeded from the gloominess of the place, or the temperament of his body, he knew not. How now, said Cromwell, what, troubled with vapous? come forwards, man! They had not gone above twenty yards, before Lindsey on a sudden stood still, and cy'd out, by all that's good, he was seiz'd with such m accountable terror and astonishment, that it was inpossible for him to stir one step further. Upon which Cromwell call'd him faint-hearted fool, and bid him stand there and observe, or be witness; and then advancing to some distance from him, he met with a grave elderly man with a roll of parchment in his hand, who deliver'd it to Cromwell, who eagerly perus'd it. Lindsey, a little recover'd from his fear, heard several loud words between them: particularly Cromwell said, this is but for seven years; I was to have had it for one and twenty, and it must and shall be so. The other told him positively, it could not be for above seven; upon which Cromwell cry'd with great fierceness it should however be for fourteen years. But the other peremptorily declar'd it could not possibly be for any longer time; and if he would not take it so, there were others who suld accept of it. Upon which Cromwell at last took e' parchment, and returning to Lindsey with great joy his countenance, he cry'd, now, Lindsey, the battel is r own! I long to be engag'd. Returning out of the ood, they rode to the army, Cromwell with a resoluon to engage as soon as possible, and the other with design of leaving the army as soon. After the first name Lindsey deserted his post, and rode away with Il possible speed, day and night, till he came into the bunty of Norfolk, to the house of an intimate friend, ne Mr Thorowgood, minister of the parish of fromwell as soon as he miss'd him, sent all ways after im, with a promise of a great reward to any that bould bring him alive or dead. Thus far the narraive of Lindsey himself; but something further is to be emember'd, to compleat and confirm the story.

When Mr Thorowgood saw his friend Lindsey come anto his yard, his horse and himself just tired, in a sort of a maze, said, How now, Colonel! we hear there is like to be a battel shortly; what, fled from your colours? A battel! said the other; yes there has been a battel, and I am sure the King is beaten; but if ever I strike a stock for Cromwell again, may I perish eternally: For I am sure he has made a league with the devil, and the devil will have him in due time. Then desiring his protection from Cromwell's inquisitors, he went in and related to him the whole story, and all the circumstances. cooclading with these remarkable words, that Cromwell would certainly dye that day seven years that the battel was lought. The strangeness of the relation caus'd Mr Thorowgood to order his son John, then about twelve years of age, to write it in full length in his commonplace book, and to take it from Lindsey's own mouth. This common place book, and likewise the same story written in other books, I am assured is still preserv'd is the family of the Thorowgoods. But how far Lindsey to be believ'd, and how far the story is to be accounted incredible, is left to the reader's faith and judgment, and not to any determination of our own.

Simon Ockley (1678-1720), orientalist and Listorian, was born at Exeter of good Norfolk dock, studied at Queen's College, Cambridge, and is vicar of the small living of Swavesey in the Ounty of Cambridge earned repute as the most minent Arabist in England-insomuch that in 711 he was made professor of Arabic at Camvidge. Most of his short life was spent in dire Overty: and in the debtors' prison of Cambridge e actually found a leisure for finishing his obus eagnum denied him amidst the worries of his carage. He translated a number of Arabic ooks and Italian and other treatises about the ast. But the one work for which he is rememered is his Conquest of Syria, Persia, and Egypt · the Saracens (3 vols. 1708-57), commonly called The History of the Saracens.' It was mainly used on an Arabic manuscript now not regarded , quite a sound authority. But unlike his precessor Pocock, Ockley wrote in English, and ade his subject interesting to educated men enerally. Gibbon obviously had Ockley's history enstantly at hand, and speaks of the author as learned and spirited interpreter of Arabic ithorities,' and as 'an original in every sense, who had opened his eyes.' The Life of Mohammed usually prefixed was not from his own pen, but was added by Dr Long, Master of Pembroke College, to the third volume, published long after Ockley's death. In Ockley's work nothing is more relevant to the history of literature than the traditional story of the burning of the Alexandrian Library at the conquest of Egypt in 641 by Amrou ('Amr ibn el-Asi), General of the Caliph Omar; Egypt having till then been held for the Eastern Emperor Heraclius by the Coptic governor Mokaukas (Mukowkis). Some have denied that any such destruction as Ockley records took place; the general opinion is, that in the seventh century the library was in a very dilapidated condition, and that the Arabs only completed what neglect and Christian fanaticism had already well-nigh accomplished. No doubt Ockley's authorities absurdly exaggerated the extent of the destruction in the account they give and he repeats of

The Burning of the Alexandrian Library.

The inhabitants of Alexandria were then polled, and upon this the whole of Egypt followed the fortune and example of its metropolis, and the inhabitants compounded for their lives, fortunes, and free exercise of their religion, at the price of two ducats a head yearly. This head-money was to be paid by all without distinction, except in the case of a man holding land, farms, or vinevards, for in such cases he paid proportionably to the yearly value of what he held. This tax brought in a most prodigious revenue to the caliph. After the Saracens were once arrived to this pitch, it is no wonder if they went further, for what would not such a revenue do in such hands? For they knew very well how to husband their money, being at that time sumptuous in nothing but their places of public worship. Their diet was plain and simple. Upon their tables appeared neither wine nor any of those dainties, the products of modern luxury, which pall the stomach and enfeeble the constitution. Their chief drink was water: their food principally milk, rice, or the fruits of the earth.

The Arabians had as yet applied themselves to no manner of learning, nor the study of anything but their vernacular poetry, which, long before Mohammed's time, they understood very well after their way, and prided themselves upon. They were altogether ignorant of the sciences, and of every language but their own. Amrou, however, though no scholar, was a man of quick parts and of good capacity, and one who in the intervals of business was more delighted with the conversation of the learned, and with rational and philosophical discourses, than it is usual for men of his education to be, There was at that time in Alexandria one John, sirnamed 'The grammarian,' an Alexandrian by birth, of the sect of the Jacobites, and was the same that afterwards denied the Trinity, and being admonished by the bishops of Egypt to renounce his erroneous opinions, he was, upon his refusal, excommunicated. He was, however, a man eminent for learning, and Amrou was greatly pleased with his conversation; not only taking delight in frequently hearing him discourse on several sciences, but also occasionally asking him questions. This person, perceiving the great respect shown hum by Amrou, ventured one day to petition him for the books in the Alexandrian Library, telling him 'That he perceived he had taken an account of all things which he thought valuable in the city, and sealed up all the repositories and treasuries, but had taken no notice of the books; that, if they would have been any way useful to him, he would not have been so bold as to ask for them, but since they were not, he desired he might have them.' Amrou told him, 'That he had asked a thing which was altogether out of his power to grant, and that he could by no means dispose of the books without first asking the caliph's leave. However,' he said, 'he would write, and see what might be done in the matter.' Accordingly he performed his promise, and having given a due character of the abilities of this learned man, and acquainted Omar with his petition, the caliph returned this answer, 'What is contained in these books you mention is either agreeable to what is written in the book of God (meaning the Koran) or it is not: if it be, then the Koran is sufficient without them; if otherwise, it is fit they should be destroyed.' Amrou, in obedience to the caliph's command, distributed the books throughout all the city, amongst those that kept warm baths (of which there was at that time no fewer than four thousand in Alexandria), to heat the baths with. And notwithstanding the great havoc that must needs be made of them at this rate, yet the number of books which the diligence of former princes had collected was so great, that it was six months before they were consumed. A loss never to be made up to the learned world!

Joseph Addison

was born on 1st May 1672 at Milston, Amesbury (Wilts), where his father, the Rev. Lancelot Addison (1632-1703), afterwards Dean of Lichfield, was rector. His mother was Jane, daughter of Dr Nathaniel Gulston and sister of William Gulston, Bishop of Bristol. He passed from Amesbury School to Salisbury School; thereafter, in 1683, to the Grammar-School of Lichfield, whither the family had removed on his father's appointment to the Deanery; and, later, to Charterhouse, where his future friend, Richard Steele, was a pupil. In 1687 he was admitted a commoner of Queen's College, Oxford; but in 1689 his success with some Latin verses (Inauguratio Regis Gulielmi) procured his election to a demyship at Magdalen College. took his Master's degree in 1693, and five years later obtained a Fellowship at his college.

In his undergraduate efforts Addison confined himself to Latin: in verse, in the Inauguratio, already referred to, and the Gratulatio pro exoptato serenissimi Regis Gulielmi ex Hibernia reditu (1690); and in prose, in a short dissertation, De Insignioribus Romanorum Poetis (1692), which was frequently reprinted together with a continuation translated by one of Curll's hacks from the English of an ingenious Major Pack. These pieces, and his contributions of occasional verse to the two volumes of Musæ Anglicanæ (1691, 1699), are interesting solely as formative evidence of Addison's political bias and literary method. We cannot share the enthusiasm of his contemporaries for the Pax Gulielmi (1697), which the judicial 'Rag' Smith held to be 'the best poem since the Æneid,' but we can admit its elegance, as we may concede the humour of the Machinæ Gesticulanta (à propos of Powell's famous puppet-show) or the devotional spirit of the Resurrectio. In this Lata miscellany we have a forecast, as complete as juvenile wit will allow, of the later faculty and graces of Mr Spectator.

Addison's first English poem was a short piece To Mr Dryden (2nd June 1693), which secured the favour of the poet, and through him, or Congrese, or both, an introduction to the Whig leaders Somers and Montagu, and to the bookseller Jacob Tonson. Dryden thought so highly of Addison's translation of the Fourth Georgic that he referred to it in his critical Postscript to the Reader ('after his Bees, my latter swarm is scarcely worth the hiving'), and he honoured his young friend by printing his Essay on the Georgics (1693) as an introduction to his own translation of Virgil. Addison continued to reside at Oxford, and appears to have been preparing to take holy orders; but he was dissuaded from this intention by his political friends, who had discovered in him a useful literary ally in the cosflict of parties. He commended himself further to Somers and Montagu by his praise of the latter in a verse Account of the Greatest English Poets (1694), and by his dedication to the former of A Poem to His Majesty (1695); and by their united influence he obtained, in 1699, a pension of three hundred pounds a year for purposes of travel and general preparation in public affairs.

His Grand Tour-which included France, Italy, Austria, Germany, and Holland, and extended over four years—was not the conventional escapade of the 'gentlemen that were just come wild out of their country' (Letter to Stanyan, Blois, February 1700). In Dr Johnson's phrase, 'he proceeded in his journey to Italy, which he surveyed with the eyes of a poet.' And the good Abbé Philippeaux at Blois admitted, with implied astonishment, that during his year at Blois his friend had had no amour, and added, 'I think I should have known it if he had had any.' Incidental references in his Letters show that he was making some historical inquiries about treaties and other matters, but his stronger likings lay in scholarly associations with the places which he visited, or in the æsthetic problems which their variety suggested. From Geneva he addressed his Letter from Italy (February 1702) to Montagu, now Lord Halifax—a prelude, in his happiest verse, to the more elaborate prose Remarks on Several Parts of Italy, which he prepared in 1705 from notes made during his tour. In these, as well as in the Dialogues on Medals, which he wrote during his visit to Vienna (1702), he shows his predisposition to that amiable reflection which characterises the more perfect f the Spectator. The Letter from Italy, in his technique is perhaps at its best, was admired by Pope, and frequently quoted itated by him. s Day (1699), and although he laid himen to the gibe that he had produced a e in rhyme,' he won by the very calmnd plainness of his verse the political and il success which was desired. From the tion of the Campaign till the fall of the in 1710 Addison was absorbed in politics, duties of an Under Secretary of State of Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of (1709), of Keeper of Records, of a member iament, or of a party-writer in such vens the short tract on The Present State of the '707) or The Whig Examiner (Nos. I.-V., eptember to 12th October 17to). His only work was the unfortunate attempt to write glish opera on the subject of Rosamond 1707), and some friendly collaboration with Steele in his Tender Husband. He had already, from May 1709, contributed some papers to his friend's Tatler, but it was not till the following year that his political leisure gave him the opportunity of writing the essays upon which his reputation now chiefly rests. On the death of Queen Anne public affairs again engrossed his attention.

All the work of this short period (1710-1714) is, with the exception of the tragedy Cato, in prose, and in the form of short essays; and Cato is hardly an exception, for though finished and produced at Drury Lane in 1713, it had been planned and almost entirely written during his Continental tour. He contributed over sixty papers to the Tatler between 26th May 1709 and 2nd January 1711, when Steele brought the successful sheet to a sudden close, not because he, or his friend, had become to the public, as to Swift, 'cruel, dull, and dry,' but probably because Steele felt his Whiggism somewhat ungracious to Harley, who had generously allowed him to remain in his post at the Stamp Office. Swift really sneered at its politics, for there was no falling off in the paper, especially in the character-sketches of the Political Upholsterer Tom Folio, 'the broker in learning,' or Ned Softly, 'the very pretty poet,' which Addison contributed. Steele readily acknowledged Addison's assistance. 'I fared like a distressed Prince who calls in a powerful Neighbour to his aid; I was undone by my Auxiliary; when I had once called him in, I could not subsist without Dependance on him.' It is probable that the stoppage of the Tatler was hastened because the two friends had already made their plans for the daily sheet of The Spectator, which they issued within two months (1st March 1711). The new enterprise must be considered, as its promoters intended it to be, a continuation of the Tatler.

Many of its apparently original characteristics, such as The Club, with its types of quidnuncs, or the topics of social satire, had been elaborated in the Tatler-a continuity of literary purpose which will be best appreciated by the reader who makes the most careful study of the allusions and personalia of the two publications. The success of these social and critical studies doubtless prompted the editor and his 'auxiliary' to avoid politics, but they made no serious promise to confine their 'Censorship of Great Britain' to the doings of the coffee-house, the tea-table, and the theatre; and, indeed, towards the end of the journal, they occasionally deviated into ingenious speculations which must have pleased their Whig subscribers. The Spectator was continued till 6th December 1712, and ran to five hundred and fifty-five numbers, of which Addison and Steele wrote over five hundred, in about equal proportions. A supplementary set (Nos. 556-635) appeared between 18th June and 20th December 1714. In this the majority of the contributions is by Addison, who edited them when they were reissued as the eighth volume of the Octavo, or First Collected, Edition of the Spectator.

Between 28th May and 22nd September 1713 Addison wrote over fifty papers for The Guardian, which Steele had started within three months of his sudden stoppage of the Spectator proper. Addison fully maintained the intention of Mr Nestor Ironside to 'have nothing to manage with any person or party,' and, even after his editor had 'blazed into faction' in the famous Dunkirk letter (No. 128), continued his Oriental allegories and his discourses on Female Dress, Pride, and the Wisdom of the Ant. And when Steele, after his disastrous adventure with The Englishman-a rabid political sequel to the Guardian, which he, more suo, had suddenly suppressed-returned to the manner of Mr Spectator in the short-lived Lover, Addison obliged him with two papers, Nos. 10 and 39 (March, May 1714). He also contributed about this time two papers to The Reader (Nos. 3 and 4), another of Steele's literary sheets. The last year of his literary period (1713) was occupied in preparing a first portion of a treatise Of the Christian Religion, which remains unfinished, and in the less congenial task of combating the libels of Pope, who, prompted by jealousy, had made a series of unscrupulous attacks. Into the circumstances of this famous quarrel, which involved Dennis, Ambrose Philips, and Tickell, if not all the habitués of Button's, it is unnecessary to enter here (see the articles on Pope and Tickell in this volume; and Mr Courthope's Addison in 'English Men of Letters,' Chap. vii.).

On the death of Queen Anne, Addison was appointed Secretary to the Lords-Justices who managed public affairs till the coming of George I. After the king's arrival, he was nominated for the second time as Chief Secretary for Ireland. He found his duties light, and composed and produced his comedy of The Drummer, which had but indifferent success (March 1716). The serious crisis in Whig politics caused by the Rising of the Fifteen forced Addison to undertake a special party defence in The Freeholder, for which he was rewarded (December 1716) with a Commissionership of Trade and Plantations. Yet even in the fifty-five papers of this partisan journal (23rd December 1715 to 29th June 1716) he pled the Whig cause with his wonted good-humour, and found opportunities to discuss the vagaries of the Female Sex, French Anglophobia, the Treatment of Authors, or his old topic of Wit and Humour. His methods of political persuasion, as illustrated in the case of the Tory Foxhunter (No. 47), were perhaps more successful than those of the most ardent members of his party, such as Steele, who preferred to drub the Jacobites into allegiance.

The Freeholder was Addison's last literary undertaking, if we except two minor political essays—the ascribed Arguments about the Allertion of Triennial Elections of Parliament (contributed to Boyer's Political State, April 1716) and two numbers of the Old Whig (19th March and 2nd April 1719) in reply to Steele's attack in The Plebeian on Sunderland's Peerage Bill. On 3rd August 1716 he married Sarah, Countess of Warwick, by whom he had one daughter. Pope's spiteful reference to his 'marrying discord' (Epith to Dr Arbuthnot, 393) has been too readily accepted by posterity, without proof, and in the face of indirect contrary evidence. He was appointed a Secretary of State on 16th April 1717, but was compelled to resign, on 14th March of the next year, on account of broken health. In his political quarrel with Steele's Plebeian he shows 2 diminished vigour, to which his impetuous friend, in ignorance of his physical condition, referred in no kindly manner, in his fourth paper (6th April 1719): 'The Plebeian has been obliged to object to the Old Whig one of the infirmities of age, viz. slowness; and he must now take notice of another, though he does it with great reluctance, that is, want of memory; for the old gentleman seems to have forgot,' &c. Addison was already threatened with dropsy, as a sequel to an incurable asthma, and, two months later (17th June 1719), succumbed to the disease at Holland House, Kensington.

Addison's literary reputation, unlike that of other English classics, rests less upon the merit of individual pieces or of his work taken as a whole than upon its historical importance as an influence on letters and manners. There is nothing more fatal to his deservedly high put than to judge him by a few, even the best of his verses and essays; and any selection of typical passages, such as are here printed, though it may show certain salient qualities of style, must fail to justify the opinion of later criticism. The same is true of the cumulative effect obtained by the perusal of his entire work. Consideration merely of such things as his industry or the agreeable uniformity of his craftsmanship will not explain his positive value in the history of English literature.

Addison's importance is in a sense extra-literary, for, though he takes up a definite attitude to the zesthetic principles of his time, he is interested not so much in their discussion as academic theory as in their adjustment to life. He realises in a fuller as well as in a more practical way than his contemporaries did the two fundamental ideas of the classical doctrine of taste—the one of restraint, 'temperance,' selection in the literary purpose; the other of arrangement, propriety, harmony of all the parts of the literary scheme. He expresses these in the 'correctness' of his prose, in his conception of the short essay, in his bracing of the couplet as it had been left by Dryden, in the unity of plan in the miscellaneous papers of the Speclator, in the conscious effort to avoid the overelaboration of the characters of the Club or the too ready indulgence of his public in one particular vein of fun or homily. Thus far he is at one with the critical purpose of the Augustans, who, from Pope downwards, confined it to literature, and there almost exclusively as a discipline in technique. But he extended the application to manners, on the one hand exposing the improprieties of society, Party-politics, mere scholarship, or popular religion, which arise from the enthusiasm of disorderly emotions; and on the other hand showing the relationship of each and all of these special questions of reform—literary, social, and moral—to the broader issues of Classicism. This range of Criticism, which gives him a unique place among his contemporaries, was not understood by them. Steele came to resent his persistent dislike of the official Whig as of the official Tory, and Swift was irritated by the Spectator's gossip about fans and patches. Both failed to see the logic of Addison's position, or to foresee the immediate effect in bringing a better philosophy of life 'to dwell at clubs and assemblies, at tea-tables and in coffee-houses.' After all, this difference between Addison and them was only one of method, or rather of degree: he was in more direct opposition to the tone of his age in his refusal to share its pessimism, or to find delight in those gargantuan coarsenesses of art and conduct which sort so uncouthly with the elegances and punctilios of the time. It is easy to explain this divergence by a constitutional amiability and delicacy, but its cause is perhaps more truly to be found in the logical necessity to his balanced mind of completing the expression of a theory which had already commended itself in purely literary matters. Contemporary writers, including Pope, never tire of speaking of Good Sense, True Wit, Good Breeding, The Ingenious Gentleman; but none of them has realised so fully as Addison has done the complex meaning of these terms, and given soul to that later 'Euphues' whom the eighteenth century would fain have made a mere literary prig.

Addison expounded his doctrine and convinced his readers by methods which that doctrine implied-by observing a studied moderation in his attacks and by never losing sight of the general principle involved. Like Swift and Pope he had his mission against Dulness, but he did not anathematise her votaries as yahoos and dunces. He laid claim in his 'spectatorial' office to be 'something of a humorist,' and he had abundance of gentle irony and wit; but it was his tolerance rather which coaxed public opinion to accept his He discovered literary possibilities censorship. in subjects hitherto untouched; and by his condescension to the intelligence of the middle class he not only stimulated its efforts at self-advancement, but obtained the privilege of imposing at one and the same time his canons of taste and rules of conduct. In this unity of æsthetic and moral ideas Addison is in close kinship with the Platonic and Aristotelian conception of critical method. Its general terms offended many, who hinted that he prostituted literature when he brought down philosophy from its academic heaven to inhabit among quidnuncs and lady's-men; and later criticism, under the influence of the doctrine of art for art's sake, has too readily forgotten that while the Addisonian method may or may not be the true concern of the nineteenth century, it was in its own place and time a more just, complete, and effectual aid to the appreciation of æsthetic principles even in their most formal aspects. like bad critical perspective has condemned Addison as unoriginal and trite. The same has been said of Pope, and indeed of eighteenth-century letters generally; but we forget that what appears to us to be commonplaces was then either newfound wisdom, or, if known, was 'ne'er so well expressed.' Addison insinuated himself so delicately into the literary purpose of his successors, that they, and their successors, oblivious of the facts and in their desire for a stronger expression, were inclined to consider him a master of platitude. Had he had more fire and some of the gall of his friends, he might have had more persistent admiration. Didactic as he was, he never dared to preach; and, though he thereby gained the confidence of his own age, the very ease of his method of convincing made it easy for posterity to be ungrateful.

It is somewhat remarkable that in many estimates of Addison the most generous allowance is made for his strictly critical reflections on such subjects as Wit or the Sublime, or his appreciations of Paradise Lost and Chevy Chase. It is almost a tradition to say that we are indebted to him for Milton and the romantic ballads; and it is sometimes an argument with those writers who are never happy in their judgment of the eighteenth century that Addison's attitude to such things as The Children in the Wood shows a critical insight greatly superior to that of his time. It would be more correct to say that it is our partisan interest in these romantic matters which tempts us to read into these 'occasional' observations what Addison would not have said or cared to say. In his critical papers, if anywhere, he is open to the charge of being commonplace and unoriginal. He retails the axioms of the French critics, and seldom adds anything illuminative of their application to English literature. He borrows, and often without acknowledgment, from Le Bossu, the Daciers, Bouhours, and Boileau, more amply than Sidney did from the Renascence critics, or Dryden had already done from the same French writers. These passages stand apart from the rest of his work, not merely by the fact that most of them had been written in an early period and were interpolated in the Spectator when editorial copy ran short, but because they lack the spontaneity and appropriateness of the social essays. They were accepted in England and in Germany as a critical standard, since they had the prima facia recommendation of being embedded in Addison's most popular work, and such topics were new, and therefore attractive, to that larger reading public which had begun, under his guidance, to discuss the miscellaneous problems of taste. To the modern student, however, they are of least consideration in an estimate of Addison's literary position-less important than his fastidious interest in the preparation of a prose style, or in his treatment of the short essay. If some credit be due to him for giving a certain practical value to subjects which had been hitherto exclusively academic, it is but part of that wider acknowledgment of his general intellectual purpose, which was more catholic than exhaustive, and was concerned more in teaching what to avoid than what to take for dogma.

Italy's Misfortune.

Fain would I Raphael's godlike art rehearse,
And show the immortal labours in my verse,
Where from the mingled strength of shade and light
A new creation rises to my sight;
Such heavenly figures from his pencil flow,
So warm with life his blended colours glow.
From theme to theme with secret pleasure tost,
Amidst the soft variety I'm lost:
Here pleasing airs my ravisht soul confound
With circling notes and labyrinths of sound:
Here domes and temples rise in distant views.
And opening palaces invite my muse.

How has kind Heaven adorned the happy land, And scattered blessings with a wasteful hand! But what avail her unexhausted stores, Her blooming mountains, and her sunny shores. With all the gifts that heaven and earth impart, The smiles of nature, and the charms of art, While proud Oppression in her valleys reigns, And Tyranny usurps her happy plains? The poor inhabitant beholds in vain The reddening orange and the swelling grain; Joyless he sees the growing oils and wines, And in the myrtle's fragrant shade repines; Starves, in the midst of nature's bounty curst, And in the loaden vineyard dies for thirst.

A Battle-Plece.

But, O my muse, what numbers wilt thou find To sing the furious troops in battle joined! Methinks I hear the drum's tumultuous sound The victor's shouts and dying groans confound, The dreadful burst of cannon rend the skies, And all the thunder of the battle rise. 'Twas then great Marlborough's mighty soul was proved, That, in the shock of charging hosts unmoved, Amidst confusion, horror, and despair. Examined all the dreadful scenes of war; In peaceful thought the field of death surveyed. To fainting squadrons sent the timely aid, Inspired repulsed battalions to engage, And taught the doubtful battle where to rage. So when an angel by divine command With rising tempests shakes a guilty land, Such as of late o'er pale Britannia past, Calm and serene he drives the furious blast; And, pleased the Almighty's orders to perform, Rides in the whirlwind, and directs the storm.

But see the haughty household-troops advance! The dread of Europe, and the pride of France. The war's whole art each private soldier knows, And with a general's love of conquest glows; Proudly he marches on, and, void of fear, Laughs at the shaking of the British spear: Vain insolence! with native freedom brave, The meanest Briton scorns the highest slave; Contempt and fury fire their souls by turns, Each nation's glory in each warmer burns, Each fights, as in his arm the important day And all the fate of his great monarch lay: A thousand glorious actions, that might claim Triumphant laurels and immortal fame. Confused in clouds of glorious actions lie, And troops of heroes undistinguished die. O Dormer, how can I behold thy fate. And not the wonders of thy youth relate! How can I see the gay, the brave, the young, Fall in the cloud of war and lie unsung! In joys of conquest he resigns his breath, And, filled with England's glory, smiles in death.

The rout begins, the Gallic squadrons run, Compelled in crowds to meet the fate they shun: Thousands of fiery steeds with wounds transfixed Floating in gore, with their dead masters mixt, Midst heaps of spears and standards driven around, Lie in the Danube's bloody whirlpools drowned, Troops of bold youths, born on the distant Saône, Or sounding borders of the rapid Rhone, Or where the Seine her flowery fields divides, Or where the Loire through winding vineyards glide: In heaps the rolling billows sweep away, And into Scythian seas their bloated corps convey. From Blenheim's towers the Gaul, with wild affright, Beholds the various havoc of the fight; His waving banners, that so oft had stood Planted in fields of death, and streams of blood, So wont the guarded enemy to reach, And rise triumphant in the fatal breach. Or pierce the broken foe's remotest lines, The hardy veteran with tears resigns.

Unfortunate Tallard! Oh, who can name The pangs of rage, of sorrow, and of shame,

Were not my orders that I would be private? Why am I disobeyed?

Portius. Alas! my father!
What means this sword? this instrument of death?
Let me convey it hence!

Cato. Rash youth, forbear!

Por. Oh let the prayers, the entreaties of your friends,
Their tears, their common danger, wrest it from you.

Cato. Wouldst thou betray me? wouldst thou give me up A slave, a captive, into Cæsar's hands?
Retire, and learn obedience to a father,
Or know, young man!—

Por. Look not thus sternly on me; You know I'd rather die than disobey you.

Cato. 'Tis well! again I'm master of myself.

Now, Cæsar, let thy troops beset our gates,

And bar each avenue, thy gathering fleets

O'erspread the sea, and stop up every port;

Cato shall open to himself a passage,

And mock thy hopes—

Por. Oh, sir! forgive your son, Whose grief hangs heavy on him! Oh my father! How am I sure it is not the last time I e'er shall call you so! Be not displeased, Oh be not angry with me whilst I weep, And, in the anguish of my heart beseech you To quit the dreadful purpose of your soul!

Cato. Thou hast been ever good and dutiful. [Embracing Weep not, my son. All will be well again. him. The righteous gods, whom I have sought to please, Will succour Cato, and preserve his children.

Por. Your words give comfort to my drooping heart.

Cato. Portius, thou may'st rely upon my conduct.

Thy father will not act what misbecomes him.

But go, my son, and see if aught be wanting

Among thy father's friends; see them embarked;

And tell me if the winds and seas befriend them.

My soul is quite weighed down with care, and asks

The soft refreshment of a moment's sleep. [Exit.

Por. My thoughts are more at ease, my heart revives.

Enter MARCIA.

O Marcia, O my sister, still there's hope!
Our father will not cast away a life
So needful to us all, and to his country.
He is retired to rest, and seems to cherish
Thoughts full of peace. He has despatched me hence
With orders that bespeak a mind composed,
And studious for the safety of his friends.
Marcia, take care that none disturb his slumbers.

Marcia. O ye immortal powers that guard the just,
Watch round his couch, and soften his repose,

Banish his sorrows, and becalm his soul With easy dreams; remember all his virtues! And show mankind that goodness is your care.

Enter Lucia.

Lucia. Where is your father, Marcia, where is Cato?

Marcia. Lucia, speak low, he is retired to rest.

Lucia, I feel a gently-dawning hope

Rise in my soul. We shall be happy still.

Luc. Alas! I tremble when I think on Cato, In every view, in every thought I tremble! Cato is stern, and awful as a god, He knows not how to wink at human frailty, Or pardon weakness that he never felt.

Mar. Though stern and awful to the foes of Rome, He is all goodness, Lucia, always mild, Compassionate, and gentle to his friends. Fill'd with domestic tenderness, the best, The kindest father! I have ever found him Easy, and good, and bounteous to my wishes.

Luc. 'Tis his consent alone can make us blest. Marcia, we both are equally involved In the same intricate, perplext distress. The cruel hand of fate, that has destroyed Thy brother Marcus, whom we both lament—

Mar. And ever shall lament, unhappy youth!
Luc. Has set my soul at large, and now I stand Loose of my vow. But who knows Cato's thoughts?
Who knows how yet he may dispose of Portius,
Or how he has determined of thyself?

Mar. Let him but live! commit the rest to heaven.

Lucius [entering]. Sweet are the slumbers of the virtuous man!

O Marcia, I have seen thy godlike father:
Some power invisible supports his soul,
And bears it up in all its wonted greatness.
A kind refreshing sleep is fall'n upon him:
I saw him stretched at ease, his fancy lost
In pleasing dreams; as I drew near his couch,
He smiled, and cried, Cæsar, thou canst not hurt me.

Mar. His mind still labours with some dreadful thought.

Lucia, why all this grief, these floods of sorrow?

Dry up thy tears, my child, we all are safe

While Cato lives—his presence will protect us.

Juba [entering]. Lucius, the horsemen are returned from viewing

The number, strength, and posture of our foes, Who now encamp within a short hour's march. On the high point of yon bright western tower We ken them from afar, the setting sun Plays on their shining arms and burnished helmets, And covers all the field with gleams of fire.

Luc. Marcia, 'tis time we should awake thy father. Cæsar is still disposed to give us terms,
And waits at distance till he hears from Cato.

Enter Portius.

Portius, thy looks speak somewhat of importance, What tidings dost thou bring? methinks I see Unusual gladness sparkling in thy eyes.

Por. As I was hasting to the port, where now My father's friends, impatient for a passage, Accuse the lingering winds, a sail arrived From Pompey's son, who through the realms of Spain Calls out for vengeance on his father's death, And rouses the whole nation up to arms. Were Cato at their head, once more might Rome Assert her rights, and claim her liberty.

But, hark! what means that groan! Oh give me way, And let me fly into my father's presence.

Luc. Cato, amidst his slumbers, thinks on Rome, And in the wild disorder of his soul Mourns o'er his country.—Hah! a second groan!—Heaven guard us all—

Mar. Alas! 'tis not the voice Of one who sleeps! 'tis agonizing pain, 'Tis death is in that sound—

Portius [re-entering]. Oh sight of woe! O Marcia, what we feared is come to pass! Cato is fall'n upon his sword—

Luc. O Portius, Hide all the horrors of thy mournful tale, And let us guess the rest.

Por. I've raised him up,
And placed him in his chair, where, pale and faint,
He gasps for breath, and, as his life flows from him,
Demands to see his friends. His servants weeping,
Obsequious to his orders, bear him hither. [Scene open.

Mar. O heaven, assist me in this dreadful hour To pay the last sad duties to my father.

Juba. These are thy triumphs, thy exploits, O Casa!

Luc. Now is Rome fall'n indeed!—

Cato [brought forward in his chair]. Here set me downPortius, come near me—are my friends embarked?

Can anything be thought of for their service?

Whilst I yet live, let me not live in vain.

—O Lucius, art thou here?—thou art too good!— Let this our friendship live between our children; Make Portius happy in thy daughter Lucia.

Alas! poor man, he weeps!—Marcia, my daughter—Oh bend me forward!—Juba loves thee, Marcia. A senator of Rome, while Rome survived, Would not have match'd his daughter with a king. But Cæsar's arms have thrown down all distinction; Whoe'er is brave and virtuous is a Roman.—
—I'm sick to death—Oh when shall I get loose

From this vain world, the abode of guilt and sorrow

—And yet methinks a beam of light breaks in

On my departing soul. Alas! I fear

L've been too basty. One powers that seems

I've been too hasty. O ye powers, that search The heart of man, and weigh his inmost thoughts, If I have done amiss, impute it not!— The best may err, but you are good, and—oh!

Luc. There fled the greatest soul that ever warmed A Roman breast. O Cato! O my friend! Thy will shall be religiously observed. But let us bear this awful corpse to Cæsar, And lay it in his sight, that it may stand A fence betwixt us and the victor's wrath; Cato, though dead, shall still protect his friends.

From hence, let fierce contending nations know
What dire effects from civil discord flow.
'Tis this that shakes our country with alarms,
And gives up Rome a prey to Roman arms,
Produces fraud, and cruelty, and strife,
And robs the guilty world of Cato's life.

(From Act 4)

Cowley.

Great Cowley then (a mighty genius) wrote, O'er-run with wit, and lavish of his thought: His turns too closely on the reader press; He more had pleased us, had he pleased us less. An Ode.

The spacious firmament on high,
With all the blue ethereal sky,
And spangled heavens, a shining frame,
Their great Original proclaim:
The unwearied sun from day to day
Does his Creator's power display,
And publishes to every land
The work of an Almighty hand.

Soon as the evening shades prevail,
The moon takes up the wondrous tale,
And nightly to the listening earth
Repeats the story of her birth:
Whilst all the stars that round her burn,
And all the planets, in their turn,
Confirm the tidings as they roll,
And spread the truth from pole to pole.

What though, in solemn silence, all Move round the dark terrestrial ball? What though nor real voice nor sound Amid their radiant orbs be found? In reason's ear they all rejoice, And utter forth a glorious voice, For ever singing, as they shine, 'The hand that made us is Divine.'

Italian Poetry.

e Italian poets, besides the celebrated smoothness ir tongue, have a particular advantage above the s of other nations in the difference of their poetical rose language. There are, indeed, sets of phrases n all countries are peculiar to the poets, but among alians there are not only sentences but a multitude ticular words that never enter into common dis-. They have such a different turn and polishing setical use, that they drop several of their letters, ppear in another form, when they come to be i in verse. For this reason the Italian opera a sinks into a poorness of language, but, amidst e meanness and familiarity of the thoughts, has hing beautiful and sonorous in the expression. ut this natural advantage of the tongue, their it poetry would appear wretchedly low and vulgar, hstanding the many strained allegories that are so much in use among the writers of this nation. The English and French, who always use the same words in verse as in ordinary conversation, are forced to raise their language with metaphors and figures, or, by the pompousness of the whole phrase, to wear off any little-ness that appears in the particular parts that compose it. This makes our blank verse, where there is no rhyme to support the expression, extremely difficult to such as are not masters in the tongue, especially when they write on low subjects; and 'tis probably for this reason that Milton has made use of such frequent transpositions, Latinisms, antiquated words and phrases, that he might the better deviate from vulgar and ordinary expressions.

The comedies that I saw at Venice, or indeed in any other part of Italy, are very indifferent, and more lewd than those of other countries. Their poets have no notion of genteel comedy, and fall into the most filthy double meanings imaginable, when they have a mind to make their audience merry. There is no part generally so wretched as that of the fine gentleman, especially when he converses with his mistress; for then the whole dialogue is an insipid mixture of pedantry and romance. But 'tis no wonder that the poets of so jealous and reserved a nation fail in such conversations on the stage, as they have no patterns of in nature. There are four standing characters which enter into every piece that comes on the stage, the Doctor, Harlequin, Pantaloon, and Coviello. The Doctor's character comprehends the whole extent of a pedant, that with a deep voice and a magisterial air breaks in upon conversation, and drives down all before him: everything he says is backed with quotations out of Galen, Hippocrates, Plato, Virgil, or any author that rises uppermost, and all answers from his companion are looked upon as impertinencies or interruptions. Harlequin's part is made up of blunders and absurdities; he is to mistake one name for another, to forget his errands, to stumble over queens, and to run his head against every post that stands in his way. This is all attended with something so comical in the voice and gestures, that a man who is sensible of the folly of the part can hardly forbear being pleased with it. Pantaloon is generally an old cully, and Coviello a

I have seen a translation of the Cid, acted at Bolonia Bolognal, which would never have taken, had they not found a place in it for these buffoons. All four of them appear in masks that are made like the old Roman personae, as I shall have occasion to observe in another place. The French and Italians have probably derived this custom of showing some of their characters in masks from the Greek and Roman theatre. The old Vatican Terence has at the head of every scene the figures of all the persons that are concerned in it, with the particular disguises in which they acted; and I remember to have seen in the Villa Mattheio an antic statue masked, which was perhaps designed for Gnatho in the Eunuch, for it agrees exactly with the figure he makes in the Vatican manuscript. One would wonder, indeed, how so polite a people as the Romans and Athenians should not look on these borrowed faces as unnatural. They might do very well for a Cyclops, or a satyr, that can have no resemblance in human features; but for a flatterer, a miser, or the like characters, which abound in our own species, nothing is more ridiculous than to represent their looks by a painted vizard. In persons of this nature the turns and motions of the face are often as agreeable as any part of the action. Could we suppose that a mask represented never so naturally the general humour of a character, it can never suit with the variety of passions that are incident to every single person in the whole course of a play. The grimace may be proper on some occasions, but is too steady to agree with all. The rabble, indeed, are generally pleased at the first entry of a disguise, but the jest grows cold even with them too when it comes on the stage in a second scene.

On Quack Doctors.

I do not remember that in any of my lucubrations I have touched upon that useful science of physic, notwithstanding I have declared myself more than once a professor of it. I have indeed joined the study of astrology with it, because I never knew a physician recommend himself to the public who had not a sister art to embellish his knowledge in medicine. It has been commonly observed in compliment to the ingenious of our profession, that Apollo was god of verse as well as physic; and in all ages the most celebrated practitioners of our country were the particular favourites of the Muses. Poetry to physic is indeed like the gilding to a pill; it makes the art shine, and covers the severity of the doctor with the agreeableness of the companion. The very foundation of poetry is good sense, if we may allow Horace to be a judge of the art.

'Scribendi recte sapere est et principium et fons.'

And if so, we have reason to believe that the same man who writes well can prescribe well, if he has applied himself to the study of both. Besides, when we see a man making profession of two different sciences, it is natural for us to believe he is no pretender in that which we are not judges of, when we find him skilful in that which we understand. Ordinary quacks and charlatans are thoroughly sensible how necessary it is to support themselves by these collateral assistances, and therefore always lay their claim to some supernumerary accomplishments which are wholly foreign to their profession. About twenty years ago, it was impossible to walk the streets without having an advertisement thrust into your hand, of a doctor 'who was arrived at the knowledge of the green and red dragon, and had discovered the female fern seed.' Nobody ever knew what this meant; but the green and red dragon so amused the people that the doctor lived very comfortably upon them. About the same time there was pasted a very hard word upon every corner of the streets. This, to the best of my remembrance, was TETRACHYMAGOGON; which drew great shoals of spectators about it, who read the bill that it introduced with unspeakable curiosity; and when they were sick, would have nobody but this learned man for their physician.

I once received an advertisement of one 'who had studied thirty years by candle-light for the good of his countrymen.' He might have studied twice as long by day-light, and never have been taken notice of: but elucubrations cannot be over-valued. There are some who have gained themselves great reputation for physic by their birth, as the 'seventh son of a seventh son'; and others by not being born at all, as the 'unborn doctor,' who, I hear, is lately gone the way of his patients, having died worth five hundred pounds per annum, though he was not 'born' to a halfpenny.

My ingenious friend Dr Saffold succeeded my old contemporary Dr Lilly in the studies both of physic and astrology, to which he added that of poetry, as was to be seen both upon the sign where he lived, and in the bills which he distributed. He was succeeded by Doctor Case, who erased the verses of his predecessor out of the sign-post, and substituted in their stead two of his own, which were as follow:

'Within this Place Lives Doctor Case.'

He is said to have got more by this distich than In Dryden did by all his works. There would be no end of enumerating the several imaginary perfections and maccountable artifices by which this tribe of men ensure the minds of the vulgar, and gain crowds of admires. I have seen the whole front of a mountebank's stage from one end to the other faced with patents, certificates, medals, and great seals, by which the several princes of Europe have testified their particular respect and esteen for the doctor. Every great man with a sounding the has been his patient. I believe I have seen twenty mountebanks that have given physic to the Car of Muscovy. The Great Duke of Tuscany escapes no better. The Elector of Brandenburg was likewise a very good patient.

This great condescension of the doctor draws upon him much good-will from his audience; and it is ten to one, but if any of them be troubled with an aching tooth, his ambition will prompt him to get it drawn by a person who has had so many princes, kings, and emperors under his hands.

I must not leave this subject without observing that, as physicians are apt to deal in poetry, apotheraise endeavour to recommend themselves by oratory, and are therefore without controversy the most eloquent persons in the whole British nation. I would not willingly discourage any of the arts, especially that of which I am an humble professor; but I must confess, for the good of my native country, I could wish there might be a suspension of physic for some years, that our kingdom, which has been so much exhausted by the wars, might have leave to recruit itself.

As for myself, the only physic which has brought me safe to almost the age of man, and which I prescribe to all my friends, is abstinence. This is certainly the best physic for prevention, and very often the most effectual against a present distemper. In short, my recipe is, 'Take nothing.'

Were the body politic to be physicked like particular persons, I should venture to prescribe to it after the same manner. I remember when our whole island was shaken with an earthquake some years ago, there was an impudent mountebank who sold pills, which (as he told the country people) were very good against an earthquake. It may perhaps be thought as absurd to prescribe a diet for the allaying popular commotions and national ferments. But I am verily persuaded that if in such a case a whole people were to enter into a course of abstinence, and eat nothing but water-gruel for a fortnight, it would abate the rage and animosity of parties, and not a little contribute to the cure of a distracted nation. Such a fast would have a natural tendency to the procuring of those ends for which a fast is usually proclaimed. If any man has a mind to enter on such a voluntary abstinence, it might not be improper to give him the caution of Pythagoras in particular: Abstine w fabis, 'Abstain from beans': that is, say the interpreters, meddle not with elections—beans having been made use of by the voters among the Athenians in the choice of magistrates.

(The Tatler, No. 240.)

Lilly the astrologer died in 1681; Thomas Saffold, who left off weaving to become a quack-doctor, died in 1691, refusing all medicines but his own pills; John Case throve on astrology from 1680 to about 1700.

On 'The Spectator.'

It is with much satisfaction that I hear this great city inquiring day by day after these my papers, and receiving my morning lectures with a becoming seriousness and attention. My publisher tells me that there are already three thousand of them distributed every day: so that if I allow twenty readers to every paper, which I look upon as a modest computation, I may reckon about threescore thousand disciples in London and Westminster, who I hope will take care to distinguish themselves from the thoughtless herd of their ignorant and unattentive brethren. Since I have raised to myself so great an audience, I shall spare no pains to make their instruction agreeable, and their diversion useful. which reasons I shall endeavour to enliven morality with wit, and to temper wit with morality, that my readers may, if possible, both ways find their account in the speculation of the day. And to the end that their virtue and discretion may not be short, transient, intermitting starts of thought, I have resolved to refresh their memories from day to day, till I have recovered them out of that desperate state of vice and folly into which the age is fallen. The mind that lies fallow but a single day, sprouts up in follies that are only to be killed by a constant and assiduous culture. It was said of Socrates that he brought Philosophy down from heaven, to inhabit among men; and I shall be ambitious to have it said of me, that I have brought Philosophy out of closets and libraries, schools and colleges, to dwell in clubs and assemblies, at tea-tables and in coffee-houses.

I would therefore in a very particular manner recommend these my speculations to all well-regulated families that set apart an hour of every morning for tea and bread and butter; and would earnestly advise them for their good to order this paper to be punctually served up, and to be looked upon as a part of the tea equipage.

Sir Francis Bacon observes that a well-written book, compared with its rivals and antagonists, is like Moses's serpent, that immediately swallowed up and devoured those of the Egyptians. I shall not be so vain as to think that where the Spectator appears the other public prints will vanish; but shall leave it to my readers' consideration whether is it not much better to be let into the knowledge of one's self than to hear what passes in Muscovy or Poland, and to amuse ourselves with such writings as tend to the wearing out of ignorance, passion, and prejudice, than such as naturally conduce to inflame hatreds and make enmities irreconcilable?

In the next place, I would recommend this paper to the daily perusal of those gentlemen whom I cannot but consider as my good brothers and allies, I mean the fraternity of Spectators, who live in the world without having anything to do in it; and, either by the affluence of their fortunes or laziness of their dispositions, have no other business with the rest of mankind but to look upon them. Under this class of men are comprehended all contemplative tradesmen, titular physicians, fellows of the Royal Society, Templars that are not given to be contentious, and statesmen that are out of business; in short, every one that considers the world as a theatre, and desires to form a right judgment of those who are the actors on it.

There is another set of men that I must likewise lay a claim to, whom I have lately called the blanks of society, as being altogether unfurnished with ideas, till the business and conversation of the day has supplied them. I have often considered these poor souls with an eye of great commiseration, when I have heard them asking the first man they have met with, whether there was any news stirring? and by that means gathering together materials for thinking. These needy persons do not know what to talk of, till about twelve a clock in the morning; for by that time they are pretty good judges of the weather, know which way the wind sits, and whether the Dutch mail be come in. As they lie at the mercy of the first man they meet, and are grave or impertinent all the day long, according to the notions which they have imbibed in the morning, I would earnestly entreat them not to stir out of their chambers till they have read this paper, and do promise them that I will daily instil into them such sound and wholesome sentiments as shall have a good effect on their conversation for the ensuing twelve hours.

But there are none to whom this paper will be more useful than to the female world. I have often thought there has not been sufficient pains taken in finding out proper employments and diversions for the fair ones. Their amusements seem contrived for them, rather as they are women than as they are reasonable creatures; and are more adapted to the sex than to the species. The toilet is their great scene of business, and the right adjusting of their hair the principal employment of their lives. The sorting of a suit of ribbons is reckoned a very good morning's work; and if they make an excursion to a mercer's or a toy-shop, so great a fatigue makes them unfit for anything else all the day after. Their more serious occupations are sewing and embroidery, and their greatest drudgery the preparation of jellies and sweet-meats. This, I say, is the state of ordinary women; though I know there are multitudes of those of a more elevated life and conversation, that move in an exalted sphere of knowledge and virtue, that join all the beauties of the mind to the ornaments of dress, and inspire a kind of awe and respect, as well as love, into their male beholders. I hope to increase the number of these by publishing this daily paper, which I shall always endeavour to make an innocent if not an improving entertainment, and by that means at least divert the minds of my female readers from greater trifles. At the same time, as I would fain give some finishing touches to those which are already the most beautiful pieces in human nature, I shall endeavour to point out all those imperfections that are the blemishes, as well as those virtues which are the embellishments, of the sex. In the meanwhile I hope these my gentle readers, who have so much time on their hands, will not grudge throwing away a quarter of an hour in a day on this paper, since they may do it without any hindrance to business.

I know several of my friends and well-wishers are in great pain for me, lest I should not be able to keep up the spirit of a paper which I oblige myself to furnish every day: but to make them easy in this particular, I will promise them faithfully to give it over as soon as I grow dull. This I know will be matter of great raillery to the small wits; who will frequently put me in mind of my promise, desire me to keep my word, assure me that it is high time to give over, with many other pleasantries of the like nature, which men of a little smart genius cannot forbear throwing out against their best friends, when they have such a handle given them of being witty. But let them remember that I do hereby enter my caveat against this piece of raillery.

(The Spectator, No. 10.)

Of Mixed Wit.

Mr Locke has an admirable reflection upon the difference of wit and judgment, whereby he endeavours to show the reason why they are not always the talents of the same person. His words are as follow: 'And hence, perhaps, may be given some reason of that common observation, that men who have a great deal of wit and prompt memories, have not always the clearest judgment or deepest reason. For wit lying most in the assemblage of ideas, and putting those together with quickness and variety, wherein can be found any resemblance or congruity, thereby to make up pleasant pictures and agreeable visions in the fancy; judgment, on the contrary, lies quite on the other side, in separating carefully one from another ideas wherein can be found the least difference, thereby to avoid being misled by similitude, and by affinity to take one thing for another. This is a way of proceeding quite contrary to metaphor and allusion; wherein for the most part lies that entertainment and pleasantry of wit which strikes so lively on the fancy, and is therefore so acceptable to all people.'

This is, I think, the best and most philosophical account that I have ever met with of wit, which generally, though not always, consists in such a resemblance and congruity of ideas as this author mentions. I shall only add to it, by way of explanation, that every resemblance of ideas is not that which we call wit, unless it be such an one that gives delight and surprise to the reader; these two properties seem essential to wit, more particularly the last of them. In order, therefore, that the resemblance in the ideas be wit, it is necessary that the ideas should not lie too near one another in the nature of things; for where the likeness is obvious, it gives no surprise. To compare one man's singing to that of another, or to represent the whiteness of any object by that of milk and snow, or the variety of its colours by those of the rainbow, cannot be called wit, unless besides this obvious resemblance there be some further congruity discovered in the two ideas, that is capable of giving the reader some surprise. Thus when a poet tells us the bosom of his mistress is as white as snow, there is no wit in the comparison; but when he adds, with a sigh, that it is as cold too, it then grows into wit. Every reader's memory may supply him with innumerable instances of the same nature. For this reason, the similitudes in heroic poets, who endeavour rather to fill the mind with great conceptions than to divert it with such as are new and surprising, have seldom anything in them that can be called wit. Mr Locke's account of wit, with this short explanation, comprehends most of the species of wit, as metaphors, similitudes, allegories, enigmas, mottos, parables, fables, dreams, visions, dramatic writings, burlesque, and all the methods of allusion: as there are many other pieces of wit (how remote soever they may appear at first sight from the foregoing description) which upon examination found to agree with it.

As true wit generally consists in this resemble congruity of ideas, false wit chiefly consists in the blance and congruity sometimes of single letter anagrams, chronograms, lipograms, and acrostics times of syllables, as in echoes and doggerel sometimes of words, as in puns and quibbles; at times of whole sentences or poems, cast into the of eggs, axes, or altars: nay, some carry the new to so far, as to ascribe it even to external mimit to look upon a man as an ingenious person tresemble the tone, posture, or face of another.

As true wit consists in the resemblance of id false wit in the resemblance of words, accordin foregoing instances, there is another kind of w consists partly in the resemblance of ideas, an in the resemblance of words; which, for dis sake, I shall call mixt wit. This kind of wit which abounds in Cowley more than in any that ever wrote. Mr Waller has likewise a gr of it. Mr Dryden is very sparing in it. Mil a genius much above it. Spenser is in the sai with Milton. The Italians, even in their epic are full of it. Monsieur Boileau, who form self upon the ancient poets, has everywhere it with scorn. If we look after mixt wit am Greek writers, we shall find it nowhere but in grammatists. There are, indeed, some strokes the little poem ascribed to Musaeus, which by well as many other marks, betrays itself to be a composition. If we look into the Latin writers, none of this mixt wit in Virgil, Lucretius, or (very little in Horace; but a great deal of it i and scarce anything else in Martial.

Out of the innumerable branches of mixt wit choose one instance which may be met with it writers of this class. The passion of love in it has been thought to resemble fire; for which re words fire and flame are made use of to sign The witty poets, therefore, have taken an a from the doubtful meaning of the word fire, an infinite number of witticisms. Cowley obser cold regard of his mistress's eyes, and at the sa their power of producing love in him, considers burning-glasses made of ice; and, finding him to live in the greatest extremities of love, concl torrid zone to be habitable. When his mistress his letter written in juice of lemon by holding fire, he desires her to read it over a second time When she weeps, he wishes it were flames. heat that distilled those drops from the limbec. she is absent, he is beyond eighty, that is, thirty nearer the pole than when she is with him. bitious love is a fire that naturally mounts u his happy love is the beams of heaven, and his love flames of hell. When it does not let him is a flame that sends up no smoke; when it is by counsel and advice, it is a fire that rages the the wind's blowing upon it. Upon the dying in which he had cut his loves, he observes written flames had burnt up and withered t When he resolves to give over his passion, he that one burnt like him for ever dreads the fi heart is an Ætna that, instead of Vulcan's shop, Cupid's forge in it. His endeavouring to drown wine is throwing oil upon the fire. He would sinuate to his mistress, that the fire of love, like that f the sun (which produces so many living creatures), sould not only warm but beget. Love in another place poks pleasure at his fire. Sometimes the poet's heart i frozen in every breast, and sometimes scorched in very eye. Sometimes he is drowned in tears, and sumt in love, like a ship set on fire in the middle of he sea.

The reader may observe in every one of these instances that the poet mixes the qualities of fire with those of love; and in the same sentence, speaking of it both as a passion and as real fire, surprises the reader with those seeming resemblances or contradictions that make up all the wit in this kind of writing. Mixt wit, therefore, is a composition of pun and true wit, and is more or less perfect as the resemblance lies in the ideas or in the words; its foundations are laid partly in falsehood and partly in truth; reason puts in her claim for one half of it, and extravagance for the other. The only province, therefore, for this kind of wit is epigram, or those little occasional poems that in their own nature are nothing else but a tissue of epigrams. I cannot conclude this head of mixt wit without owning that the admirable poet out of whom I have taken the examples of it, had as much true wit as any author that ever writ; and, indeed, all other talents of an extraordinary genius.

It may be expected, since I am upon this subject, that I should take notice of Mr Dryden's definition of wit; which, with all the deference that is due to the judgment of so great a man, is not so properly a definition of wit as of good writing in general. Wit, as he defines it, is 'a propriety of words and thoughts adapted to the subject.' If this be a true definition of wit, I am apt to think that Euclid was the greatest wit that ever set pen to paper: it is certain there never was a greater propriety of words and thoughts adapted to the subject than what that author has made use of in his Elements. I shall only appeal to my reader if this definition agrees with any notion he has of wit. If it be a true one, I am sure Mr Dryden was not only a better poet, but a greater wit, than Mr Cowley; and Virgil a much more facetious man than either Ovid or Martial.

Bouhours, whom I look upon to be the most penetrating of all the French critics, has taken pains to show that it is impossible for any thought to be beautiful which is not just and has not its foundation in the nature of things; that the basis of all wit is truth; and that no thought can be valuable of which good sense is not the ground-work. Boileau has endeavoured to inalcate the same notion in several parts of his writings, 10th in prose and verse. This is that natural way of rriting, that beautiful simplicity, which we so much dmire in the compositions of the ancients, and which body deviates from but those who want strength of nius to make a thought shine in its own natural auties. Poets who want this strength of genius to give at majestic simplicity to nature, which we so much mire in the works of the ancients, are forced to hunt er foreign ornaments, and not to let any piece of wit, what kind soever, escape them. I look upon these iters as Goths in poetry, who, like those in architure, not being able to come up to the beautiful simcity of the old Greeks and Romans, have endeavoured supply its place with all the extravagances of an irregular fancy. Mr Dryden makes a very handsome observation on Ovid's writing a letter from Dido to Æneas, in the following words: 'Ovid (says he, speaking of Virgil's fiction of Dido and Æneas) takes it up after him, even in the same age, and makes an ancient heroine of Virgil's new-created Dido; dictates a letter for her, just before her death, to the ungrateful fugitive; and, very unluckily for himself, is for measuring a sword with a man so much superior in force to him on the same subject. I think I may be judge of this, because I have translated both. The famous author of the Art of Love has nothing of his own; he borrows all from a greater master in his own profession, and, which is worse, improves nothing which he finds: nature fails him, and being forced to his old shift, he has recourse to witticism. This passes, indeed, with his soft admirers, and gives him the preserence to Virgil in their esteem.'

Were not I supported by so great an authority as that of Mr Dryden, I should not venture to observe, that the taste of most of our English poets, as well as readers, is extremely Gothic. He quotes Monsieur Segrais for a threefold distinction of the readers of poetry: in the first of which he comprehends the rabble of readers, whom he does not treat as such with regard to their quality, but to their numbers and the coarseness of their taste. His words are as follow: 'Segrais has distinguished the readers of poetry, according to their capacity of judging, into three classes. (He might have said the same of writers too, if he had pleased.) In the lowest form he places those whom he calls Les Petits Esprits; such things as are our upper-gallery audience in a play-house; who like nothing but the husk and rind of wit, prefer a quibble, a conceit, an epigram, before solid sense and elegant expression; these are mob-readers. If Virgil and Martial stood for Parliament-men, we know already who would carry it. But though they make the greatest appearance in the field, and cry the loudest, the best on't is, they are but a sort of French Huguenots or Dutch boors, brought over in herds but not naturalized; who have not lands of two pounds per annum in Parnassus, and therefore are not privileged to poll. Their authors are of the same level, fit to represent them on a mountebank's stage, or to be masters of the ceremonies in a beargarden: yet these are they who have the most admirers. But it often happens, to their mortification, that as their readers improve their stock of sense (as they may by reading better books, and by conversation with men of judgment) they soon forsake them.

I must not dismiss this subject without observing, that as Mr Locke, in the passage above-mentioned, has discovered the most fruitful source of wit, so there is another of a quite contrary nature to it, which does likewise branch itself out into several kinds. For not only the resemblance, but the opposition of ideas, does very often produce wit; as I could show in several little points, turns, antitheses, that I may possibly enlarge upon in some future speculation.

(The Spectator, No. 62.)

The allusions are to Locke's Essay (ed. 1690), Chap. xi. p. 68; Cowley's Mistress; Dryden's Apology for Heroic Poetry. Père Bouhours, Jesuit critic and biographer, lived till 1702; his Manière de bien penser dans les ouvrages de l'esprit, indirectly referred to by Addison, appeared in 1687; it was translated into English in 1705. The poet Segrais, secretary to the novelist Mme. de la Fayette, died a year earlier; he translated the Æneid and Georgics into French verse. See Dryden's Dedication to the Æneid.

Sir Roger at the Play.

My friend Sir Roger de Coverley, when we last met together at the club, told me that he had a great mind to see the new tragedy with me, assuring me at the same time that he had not been at a play these twenty years. 'The last I saw,' says Sir Roger, 'was the Committee, which I should not have gone to neither, had not I been told before-hand that it was a good Church of England comedy.' He then proceeded to inquire of me who this Distressed Mother was; and upon hearing that she was Hector's widow, he told me that her husband was a brave man, and that when he was a school-boy he had read his life at the end of the dictionary. My friend asked me, in the next place, if there would not be some danger in coming home late, in case the Mohocks should be abroad. 'I assure you,' says he, 'I thought I had fallen into their hands last night; for I observed two or three lusty black men that followed me half way up Fleet Street, and mended their pace behind me in proportion as I put on to go away from them. You must know (continued the knight with a smile) I sancied they had a mind to hunt me; for I remember an honest gentleman in my neighbourhood, who was served such a trick in King Charles the Second's time; for which reason he has not ventured himself in town ever since. I might have shown them very good sport, had this been their design; for as I am an old fox-hunter, I should have turned and dodged, and have played them a thousand tricks they had never seen in their lives before.' Sir Roger added, that if these gentlemen had any such intention, they did not succeed very well in it; 'for I threw them out (says he) at the end of Norfolk Street, where I doubled the corner, and got shelter in my lodgings before they could imagine what was become of me. However (says the knight), if Captain Sentry will make one with us to-morrow night, and if you will both of you call upon me about four o'clock, that we may be at the house before it is full, I will have my own coach in readiness to attend you, for John tells me he has got the fore-wheels mended.'

The captain, who did not fail to meet me there at the appointed hour, bid Sir Roger fear nothing, for that he had put on the same sword which he had made use of at the battle of Steenkirk. Sir Roger's servants, and among the rest my old friend the butler, had, I found, provided themselves with good oaken plants, to attend their master upon this occasion. When we had placed him in his coach, with myself at his left hand, the captain before him, and his butler at the head of his footmen in the rear, we convoyed him in safety to the play-house; where, after having marched up the entry in good order, the captain and I went in with him, and seated him betwixt us in the pit. As soon as the house was full, and the candles lighted, my old friend stood up and looked about him with that pleasure which a mind seasoned with humanity naturally feels in itself at the sight of a multitude of people who seem pleased with one another, and partake of the same common entertainment. I could not but fancy to myself, as the old man stood up in the middle of the pit, that he made a very proper centre to a tragic audience. Upon the entering of Pyrrhus, the knight told me that he did not believe the King of France himself had a better strut. I was, indeed, very attentive to my old friend's remarks, because I looked upon them as a piece of natural criticism, and was well pleased to hear him at the conclusion of almost every scene telling me that he could not imagine how the play would end. One while he appeared much cocerned for Andromache; and a little while after as made for Hermione; and was extremely puzzled to think what would become of Pyrrhus.

When Sir Roger saw Andromache's obstinate refusal to her lover's importunities, he whispered me in the er that he was sure she would never have him; to which he added, with a more than ordinary vehemence, 'You cannot imagine, sir, what it is to have to do with a widow.' Upon Pyrrhus his threatening afterwards to leave her, the knight shook his head, and muttered to himself, 'Ay, do if you can.' This part dwelt so mach upon my friend's imagination, that at the close of the third act, as I was thinking of something else, he whispered in my ear, 'These widows, sir, are the most perverse creatures in the world. But pray (says he), you that are a critic, is this play according to your dramaic rules, as you call them? Should your people in tngely always talk to be understood? Why, there is not a single sentence in this play that I do not know the meaning of.'

The fourth act very luckily began before I had time to give the old gentleman an answer; 'Well,' says the knight, sitting down with great satisfaction, 'I suppose we are now to see Hector's ghost.' He then renewed his attention, and, from time to time, fell a praising the widow. He made, indeed, a little mistake as to ose of her pages, whom, at his first entering, he took for Astyanax; but he quickly set himself right in that particular, though, at the same time, he owned he should have been very glad to have seen the little boy, 'who,' says he, 'must needs be a very fine child by the account that is given of him.' Upon Hermione's going off with a menace to Pyrrhus, the audience gave a loud clap; to which Sir Roger added, 'On my word, a notable young baggage!'

As there was a very remarkable silence and stillnes in the audience during the whole action, it was natural for them to take the opportunity of the intervals between the acts to express their opinion of the players, and of their respective parts. Sir Roger hearing a cluster d them praise Orestes, struck in with them, and told then that he thought his friend Pylades was a very sensible man. As they were afterwards applauding Pyrrhus, Sr Roger put in a second time, 'And let me tell you (says he), though he speaks but little, I like the old fellow in whiskers as well as, any of them.' Captain Sentry, seeing two or three wags who sat near us lean with see attentive ear towards Sir Roger, and fearing lest they should smoke [make fun of] the knight, plucked him by the elbow, and whispered something in his ear that lasted till the opening of the fifth act. The knight was worderfully attentive to the account which Orestes gives of Pyrrhus his death, and at the conclusion of it told it was such a bloody piece of work that he was glad if was not done upon the stage. Seeing afterwards Oresics in his raving fit, he grew more than ordinary serious, and took occasion to moralize (in his way) upon an evil conscience, adding, that 'Orestes, in his madness, looked as if he saw something.'

As we were the first that came into the house, so we were the last that went out of it; being resolved to have a clear passage for our old friend, whom we did not care to venture among the justling of the crowd. Sir Roger went out fully satisfied with his entertainment, and we narded him to his lodgings in the same manner that we rought him to the play-house; being highly pleased, or my own part, not only with the performance of the scellent piece which had been presented, but with the atisfaction which it had given to the good old man.

(The Spectator, No. 335.)

The Committee, one of Sir Robert Howard's plays (see Vol. I. 197), was very popular after the Restoration, on account of its solitical bias. See Pepys's Diary, 12th June 1663. The Distressed Mother (a version of Racine's Andromague), by Ambrose Philips, was acted on 17th March 1712 and printed in 1713. Steele wrote he Prologue, and Addison and Budgell the Epilogue. It was unhauged by Fielding in his Covent Garden Tragedy (1732).

Nature and Art.

If we consider the works of nature and art, as they are qualified to entertain the imagination, we shall find the last very defective in comparison of the former; for though they may sometimes appear as beautiful or strange, they can have nothing in them of that vastness and immensity, which afford so great an entertainment to the mind of the beholder. The one may be as polite and belicate as the other, but can never show herself so ugust and magnificent in the design. There is somehing more bold and masterly in the rough careless trokes of nature than in the nice touches and embellishments of art. The beauties of the most stately garden r palace lie in a narrow compass, the imagination imrediately runs them over, and requires something else gratify her; but in the wide fields of nature, the sight anders up and down without confinement, and is fed ith an infinite variety of images, without any certain int or number. For this reason we always find the bet in love with a country life, where nature appears in e greatest perfection, and furnishes out all those scenes at are most apt to delight the imagination.

'Scriptorum chorus omnis amat nemus et fugit urbes.'

'Hic secura quies, et nescia fallere vita,
Dives opum variarum, hic latis otia fundis,
Speluncae, vivique lacus, hic frigida Tempe,
Mugitusque boum, mollesque sub arbore somni.'

—VIRGIA.

But though there are several of these wild scenes that re more delightful than any artificial shows; yet we nd the works of nature still more pleasant the more ley resemble those of art: for in this case our pleasure ses from a double principle; from the agreeableness of e objects to the eye, and from their similitude to other Jects: we are pleased as well with comparing their auties as with surveying them, and can represent em to our minds either as copies or originals. Hence is that we take delight in a prospect which is well d out, and diversified with fields and meadows, woods d rivers; in those accidental landscapes of trees, Juds, and cities, that are sometimes found in the veins marble; in the curious fret-work of rocks and Ottos; and, in a word, in anything that hath such a riety or regularity as may seem the effect of design, what we call the works of chance.

If the products of nature rise in value, according as ey more or less resemble those of art, we may be that artificial works receive a greater advantage m their resemblance of such as are natural; because the similitude is not only pleasant, but the pattern re perfect. The prettiest landscape I ever saw was one drawn on the walls of a dark room, which stood opposite on one side to a navigable river, and on the other to a park. The experiment is very common in optics. Here you might discover the waves and fluctuations of the water in strong and proper colours, with the picture of a ship entering at one end, and sailing by degrees through the whole piece. On another there appeared the green shadows of trees, waving to and fro with the wind, and herds of deer among them in miniature, leaping about upon the wall. I must confess, the novelty of such a sight may be one occasion of its pleasantness to the imagination, but certainly the chief reason is its near resemblance to nature, as it does not only, like other pictures, give the colour and figure, but the motion of the things it represents.

We have before observed that there is generally in nature something more grand and august than what we meet with in the curiosities of art. When therefore we see this imitated in any measure, it gives us a nobler and more exalted kind of pleasure than what we receive from the nicer and more accurate productions of art. On this account our English gardens are not so entertaining to the fancy as those in France and Italy, where we see a large extent of ground covered over with an agreeable mixture of garden and forest, which represent everywhere an artificial rudeness, much more charming than that neatness and elegancy which we meet with in those of our own country. It might, indeed, be of ill consequence to the public, as well as unprofitable to private persons, to alienate so much ground from pasturage and the plough in many parts of a country that is so well peopled and cultivated to a far greater advantage. But why may not a whole estate be thrown into a kind of garden by frequent plantations, that may turn as much to the profit as the pleasure of the owner? A marsh overgrown with willows, or a mountain shaded with oaks, are not only more beautiful but more beneficial than when they lay bare and unadorned. Fields of corn make a pleasant prospect, and if the walks were a little taken care of that lie between them, if the natural embroidery of the meadows were helped and improved by some small additions of art, and the several rows of hedges set off by trees and flowers that the soil was capable of receiving, a man might make a pretty landscape of his own possessions.

Writers who have given us an account of China tell us the inhabitants of that country laugh at the plantations of our Europeans, which are laid out by the rule and line; because, they say, any one may place trees in equal rows and uniform figures. They choose rather to show a genius in works of this nature, and therefore always conceal the art by which they direct themselves. They have a word, it seems, in their language, by which they express the particular beauty of a plantation that thus strikes the imagination at first sight, without discovering what it is that has so agreeable an effect. Our British gardeners, on the contrary, instead of humouring nature, love to deviate from it as much as possible. Our trees rise in cones, globes, and pyramids. We see the marks of the scissors upon every plant and bush. I do not know whether I am singular in my opinion, but for my own part I would rather look upon a tree in all its luxuriancy and diffusion of boughs and branches, than when it is thus cut and trimmed into a mathematical figure; and cannot but fancy that an orchard in flower looks infinitely more delightful than all the little labyrinths of the most finished parterre. But as our great modellers of gardens have their magazines of plants to dispose of, it is very natural for them to tear up all the beautiful plantations of fruit trees, and contrive a plan that may most turn to their own profit, in taking off their evergreens and the like moveable plants with which their shops are plentifully stocked.

(The Spectator, No. 414.)

For similar treatment of this topic, see Pope's Moral Essays, Epist. iv. The earlier or formal (or 'Dutch') style, made fashionable by the gardeners London & Wise (Spectator No. 5), was succeeded by a freer style, which was popularised by the gardeners Bridgeman & Kent, and was praised by Walpole and by Pope, who 'twisted and twirled' his garden at Twickenham. This later type became known on the Continent, through the Duc de Nivernois' translation of Walpole's Essay on Modern Gardening, as the jardin à l'anglaise.

On Naked Bosoms.

There are many little enormities in the world, which our preachers would be very glad to see removed, but at the same time dare not meddle with them, for fear of betraying the dignity of the pulpit. Should they recommend the tucker in a pathetic discourse, their audiences would be apt to laugh out. I knew a parish where the top woman of it used always to appear with a patch upon some part of her forehead: the good man of the place preached at it with great zeal for almost a twelvemonth; but instead of fetching out the spot which he perpetually aimed at, he only got the name of Parson Patch for his pains. Another is to this day called by the name of Doctor Topknot for reasons of the same I remember the clergy, during the time of Cromwell's usurpation, were very much taken up in reforming the female world, and showing the vanity of those outward ornaments in which the sex so much delights. I have heard a whole sermon against a whitewash, and have known a coloured ribbon made the mark of the unconverted. The clergy of the present age are not transported with these indiscreet fervours, as knowing that it is hard for a reformer to avoid ridicule, when he is severe upon subjects which are rather apt to produce mirth than seriousness. For this reason, I look upon myself to be of great use to these good men; while they are employed in extirpating mortal sins and crimes of a higher nature, I should be glad to rally the world out of indecencies and venial transgressions. While the Doctor is curing distempers that have the appearance of danger or death in them, the Merry Andrew has his separate packet for the meagrims and the tooth-ache.

Thus much I thought fit to premise before I resume the subject which I have already handled, I mean the naked bosoms of our British ladies. I hope they will not take it ill of me, if I still beg that they will be covered. I shall here present them with a letter on that particular, as it was yesterday conveyed to me through the lion's mouth. It comes from a Quaker, and is as follows:

'NESTOR IRONSIDE,

'Our friends like thee. We rejoice to find thou beginnest to have a glimmering of the light in thee: we shall pray for thee, that thou mayest be more and more enlightened. English Fickleness.

If we may believe the observation which is us by foreigners, there is no nation in Europe; given to change as the English. There are so ascribe this to the fickleness of our climate, and to the freedom of our government. From one of these causes their writers derive that valumours which appears among the people in and that inconsistency of character which is to lead in almost every particular person. But as a manalways be upon his guard against the vices to when most exposed, so we should take more than ordinate to lie at the mercy of the weather in our conduct, nor to make a capricious use of that which we enjoy by the happiness of our civil constitutions.

This instability of temper ought in a p manner to be checked, when it shows itself in affairs, and disposes men to wander from one of government to another; since such a fickl behaviour in public measures cannot but be with very fatal effects to our country.

In the first place, it hinders any great under which requires length of time for its accompl from being brought to its due perfection. The nce in history which better confirms this obthan that which is still fresh in every one's We engaged in the late war with a design an exorbitant growth of power in the most enemy to Great Britain. nutability of mind in the English makes the riends of our nation very backward to engage n such alliances as are necessary for our mutual and security. It is a common notion among s that the English are good consederates in orise which may be despatched within a short of time, but that they are not to be depended a work which cannot be finished without connd perseverance. Our late measures have so I our national credit in this particular, that tentates who are entered into treaties with his Majesty have been solely encouraged to it by fidence in his personal firmness and integrity. l not, after this, suggest to my reader the and reproach that falls upon a nation which shes itself among its neighbours by such a and unsettled conduct.

1 Elizabeth, who makes the greatest figure among our English sovereigns, was most eminently remarkable for that steadiness and uniformity which ran through all her actions, during that long and glorious reign. She kept up to her chosen motto in every part of her life, and never lost sight of those great ends, which she proposed to herself on her accession to the throne, the happiness of her people and the strengthening of the Protestant interest. She often interposed her royal authority to break the cabals which were forming against her first ministers, who grew old and died in those stations which they filled with so great abilities. By this means she baffled the many attempts of her foreign and domestic enemies, and entirely broke the whole force and spirit of that party among her subjects which was popishly affected, and which was not a little formidable in the beginning of her reign.

The frequent changes and alterations in public proceedings, the multiplicity of schemes introduced one upon another, with the variety of short-lived favourites that prevailed in their several turns under the government of her successors, have by degrees broken us into those unhappy distinctions and parties, which have given so much uneasiness to our kings, and so often endangered the safety of their people.

I question not but every impartial reader hath been beforehand with me in considering on this occasion the happiness of our country under the government of his present Majesty, who is so deservedly famous for an inflexible adherence to those counsels which have a visible tendency to the public good, and to those persons who heartily concur with him in promoting these his generous designs.

A prince of this character will be dreaded by his enemies, and served with courage and zeal by his friends; and will either instruct us by his example to fix the unsteadiness of our politics, or by his conduct hinder it from doing us any prejudice.

Upon the whole, as there is no temper of mind more unmanly in a private person, nor more pernicious to the public in a member of a community, than that changeableness with which we are too justly branded by all our neighbours, it is to be hoped that the sound part of the nation will give no further occasion for this reproach, but continue steady to that happy establishment which has now taken place among us. And as obstinacy in prejudices which are detrimental to our country, ought not to be mistaken for that virtuous resolution and firmness of mind which is necessary to our preservation, it is to be wished that the enemies to our constitution would so far indulge themselves in this national humour, as to come into one change more, by falling in with that plan of government which at present they think fit to oppose. At least we may expect they will be so wise as to show a legal obedience to the best of kings, who profess the duty of passive obedience to the worst. (The Frecholder, No. 25.)

G. GREGORY SMITH.

Sir Richard Steele.

Steele (1672-1729) has described himself as 'an Englishman born in Dublin,' and his biographers, after some balancing of contradictory authorities, have established the date of his birth in the month of March 1672. Of his parentage little is known. His mother is said to have been Irish, of a Wexford family; his father appears to have been a lawyer, probably an attorney, in Dublin. What is essential in the facts of his origin is that, like Swift, Goldsmith, Sterne, Burke, and Sheridan, he was one of that brilliant band of Anglo-Irish writers to whom English literature in the eighteenth century owed so much.

The elder Steele died while his son was yet a child, and the memory of the griefstricken household inspired the editor of the Tatler long afterwards to a description which is one of his most admired pathetic passages. An uncle of the name of Gascoigne, secretary to the Duke of Ormonde, Lord - Lieutenant of Ireland, took an interest in the fatherless boy, and sent him to school and college in England. In 1684, through the Duke's nomination, Steele was admitted to the Charterhouse, where, as he himself tells us, he 'suffered very much for two or three false concords,' after the Spartan manner of the place and time. A more notable and profitable experience was the beginning of his almost lifelong friendship with Addison, which may probably be fixed in the years when the two were schoolboys together in cloisters which Thackeray has glorified as 'Greyfriars.' After five years at the Charterhouse, Steele went up to Oxford as an exhibitioner, matriculating there at Christ Church in the beginning of 1690, but removing from that college to Merton in the following year. The sole noteworthy incident of his Oxford days was the composition of a comedy, which, on the advice of a critical fellow-student, was (no doubt wisely) committed to the flames.

In 1694 the martial atmosphere of the times charged with glory and gunpowder from the Boyne and Steinkirk and Landen, seems to have fired Steele's brain, for, like Coleridge a century afterwards, he disappeared from college and elisted as a private soldier in the Life Guards. It was as 'a gentleman of the army' that he sex year published a set of verses on the death of Queen Mary, entitled The Procession-a fneil effusion of fervid loyalty, but notable in the way of biography and bibliography as his first volume. and also as the first utterance of that sturdy Whiggism which was his lifelong political creed. Good fortune followed the dedication of the poem to Lord Cutts, the 'Salamander' of Namu fame, who almost immediately took the author into his service as secretary, and ere log got him a pair of colours in the Coldstream Guards There is no evidence that Steek ever saw active military service, in Flanders or elsewhere: but some time before the end of the century he had rises from the rank of ensign to that of captain in Lord Lucas's regiment of Fusiliers. He must have become also one of the recognised wits of Will's Coffee-house, for in 1700 we find him, along with Vanbrugh, Garth, and others, replying to a ponderous sature of Sir Richard Blackmore's, and addressing himself particularly to the defence of his friend Addison.

In the year 1701 appeared his Christian Horn a tract of some eighty or ninety pages, essaying to prove that 'no principles but those of religion are sufficient to make a great man.' It was written, he tells us, at first for his own private use, to fix upon his own mind a strong impression of virtue and religion in opposition to a stronger propensity towards unwarrantable pleasures,' etcouraged by the temptations incident to his position as 'an Ensign of the Guards,' a way of his exposed to much irregularity. Practically, it is a crude rehearsal of the moralisings of the 1 Spectator, illustrated by 'a view of some eathen, by a distant admiration of the life viour, and a near examination of that of le St Paul,' and concluding with a kind parallel, or rather contrast, between 7. and William III. Naturally there was rical criticism of the discrepancy between hing and the preacher's own conductof which the imperfection was habitually ankly owned by Steele himself. 'Everysays, speaking of himself in the third neasured the least levity in his words and th the character of a Christian Hero, while of his acquaintance thought fit to misuse try their valour upon him.' Perhaps it 'misuse' that brought about his only duel-an occurrence of rather uncertain apparently belonging, by a most awkcidence, to this very time. In justice to e 'Christian Hero,' however, it must be ed that the only version of this rather ory represents him as drawn into the ith great reluctance, as accepting his 's challenge most unwillingly, and runthrough in a well-meant effort to disarm has to be added that in after-years, in r and the Spectator, Steele was incess ridicule and denunciation of the duel. ne year which saw the publication of the Hero witnessed the appearance—on the all events-of Steele's first play, The or, Grief à la Mode. This was followed by The Lying Lover, in 1705 by The lusband, and in 1722 by The Conscious These four comedies, though they do Steele a high place among our dramatic ender him an important figure in the f the English stage. In 1697 Jeremy famous diatribe had given utterance eneral disgust at the indecencies of y and Congreve; and in the first year ew century a very salutary reactiont least so far as concerned the morals ama-began to set in. In this reaction is a principal agent, and he became, e founder of that 'Sentimental Comedy' the early Georgian times, supplanted the on comedy of wit and intrigue. from the modern standpoint of manners Is his plays seem anything but faultless, g, as they do, not only frequent examples ness in language, but also some dubious and scenes. These, however, are but l defects, which no way impair the soundness of the morality inculcated by or or diminish the force of the contrast s comedies present to their immediate ors. With Steele the patient or deluded is no longer the butt of ridicule, nor do of the marriage tie furnish the material ots. On the contrary, his theme is the honourable and faithful love of youths and maidens: his heroines, whether sentimental or worldly, are never immodest; his heroes at the worst are only foolish and reckless young sparks, while at the best they tend to be priggish.

It is noteworthy that in every one of the four plays the dénouement involves the foiling of some mercenary matrimonial design and the substitution of a true-love match in its stead, and that in two of them the evils of the duel are exposed. The moral purpose is, indeed, only too apparent, and it is not surprising that the Lying Lover was 'damned,' as Steele himself confesses, 'for its piety.' The comic vein is seen mainly in such minor characters as Humphrey Gubbin, a kind of earlier Tony Lumpkin, and Biddy Tipkin, in whom there is a clear suggestion of Sheridan's Lydia Languish.

There are but scanty notices of Steele's life during the time when the first three of his plays were written. He himself asserted that his name in 1702 was down in King William's last 'tablebook' for promotion; but the king's death deferred any such advancement for some years. Chemical experiments in search of the philosopher's stone seemed to have consumed some of his time and money, and he is believed to have been one of the earliest members of the Kit-Cat Club. In 1705 he married a Mrs Margaret Stretch, a widow with some West Indian property, who, however, died not long after the marriage. In 1706 the office of Gentleman Waiter to Prince George of Denmark, the consort of Queen Anne, was bestowed upon him; and in May of the next year he obtained the then important post of Gazetteer, or editor of the London Gazette. In September 1707 he was married again, this time to a Welsh lady of some fortune, named Mary Scurlock, who plays rather an important part in his biography thenceforth. She was evidently a somewhat peevish and capricious beauty, who delighted in finding fault with her not impeccable husband; and Steele seems to have led very much the same kind of life with his 'dear Prue,' as he called her, as his hero, the great Duke of Marlborough, had with the termagant Duchess. A collection of his letters, written to her both before and after marriage, which was published by Nichols the antiquary in 1787, gives a very intimate revelation of his character. It shows him the most affectionate and generous of men, guilty of too frequent convivial excesses, after the manner of the time, 'hopelessly sanguine, restless, and impulsive,' and well-nigh as great a spendthrift as Sheridan or Goldsmith. In spite of what must have been a fairly good income, he was always in debt, and sometimes in the hands of the bailiffs; but it would seem that Macaulay's picture of him 'dicing himself into a spunging-house and drinking himself into a fever' is somewhat of an exaggeration.

It was doubtless partly the journalistic opportunities possessed by Steele in his character of Gazetteer that suggested to him the project of The Tatler, with which the periodical literature of England takes its rise. English journalism, of course, is older than the Tatler by more than halfa-century, beginning, as it practically does (for one need hardly go back to Nathaniel Butters), with the 'Mercuries'-Mercurius Aulicus, Politicus Britannicus, Anti-Britannicus, Pragmaticus, and so on-that came forth in shoals at the outbreak of the great Civil War. In the reign of Queen Anne there were in London plenty of newspapers, or rather meagre news-sheets, in addition to the official Gazetteer, which endeavoured to report the politics-and especially the foreign politics-of the day. The crazed upholsterer, for example, whom Addison sketched in some of the later issues of the Tatler had his poor brain turned by much speculation on the movements of Marlborough and Prince Eugene and the King of Sweden, as reported in the Postman, the Post-Boy, the Daily Courant, the Supplement, and the English Post. Besides these there was Defoe's Review, started in 1704, which may be described as the first of our organs of opinion on politics, giving, as it did, political criticism in addition to bare news. And, lastly, the obliging sheets which undertook, after the example of John Dunton's Athenian Mercury (1690-97), to resolve 'all the most nice and curious questions proposed by the ingenious of either sex,' had started that line of journalistic development which is still continued in the 'answers to correspondents' in provincial weekly newspapers.

The Tatler, however, was altogether different from these, and represented a departure which in the end was to issue, not in the modern newspaper, but in the magazine. Its descent from the news-sheets is shown by the scraps of political tidings which Steele borrowed from the Gazette for its earlier numbers; but its essential purpose from the first was the description and criticism of polite society in London. notice prefixed to the opening numbers, Steele describes himself as writing 'for the use of politic persons, who are so publick spirited as to neglect their own affairs to look into transactions of state.' Something is to be offered whereby 'such worthy and well-affected members of the commonwealth may be instructed, after their reading, what to think;' and there is to be something also 'which may be of entertainment to the fair sex,' in honour of whom the title of the paper is declared to be invented. The contents of the numbers are dated, according to their subjects, from the various social 'All accounts of gallantry, resorts about town. pleasure, and entertainment,' for example, are 'under the article of White's Chocolate-House; Poetry under that of Will's Coffee-House; Learning under the title of Grecian; Foreign and Domestick News from St James's Coffee-House.' This last kind of intelligence was inserted to give sober ballast and actuality to the paper; but, being evidently found superfluous, it was gradually excluded, and the Tatler became entirely a description and criticism of the manners and morals of the day.

The first number—a double-columned folio sheet—appeared on the 12th of April 1709, and its successors came out regularly three times a week, on Tuesdays, Thursdays, and Saturdays, at the price of a penny, until the 2nd of January 1711. They were written in the character of an imaginary Isaac Bickerstaff, a benevolent old bachelor, whose name, in the preceding year, had been made famous by Swift's employment of it in his mystification of the astrologer Partridge Steele was now on terms of friendship with Swift, who for about eighteen months had been in London on ecclesiastical business, and a few of the papers in the Tatler are from the Vicar's caustic pen. A far more important contributor was Addison, whose assistance was acknowledged by Steele with characteristic and exaggerated generosity. The forty-two papers known or be-lieved to have been written by him contain, doubtless, some of the finest thoughts and most finished writing in the Tatler; yet Steele spoke rather as a friend than a critic when he said, 'I fared like a distressed prince who calls in a powerful neighbour to his aid: I was undone by my auxiliary; when I had once called him in I could not subsist without dependence on him' Other contributors—but only to a very trifling extent-were Congreve, Hughes, Ambrose Philips, and Harrison. Of the two hundred and seventyone numbers, Steele wrote about one hundred and eighty-eight himself, and twenty-five in cooperation with Addison; and he was editorially responsible, as we should now say, for the whole

The contents of the Tatler, which were inmediately republished in successive volumes as The Lucubrations of Isaac Bickerstaff, Esq., are as various as the aspects of the life it professed to describe and criticise. In its numbers a dramatic criticism is followed by an imaginary character-sketch of a pair of beauties; a pathetic love-story or scene of domestic life is found alongside a gentle satire on fopperies in dress and conversation; a serious discourse on the evils of gaming and duelling is relieved by a picture of some odd frequenter of the coffee-houses or the Mall. In his self-imposed rôle of observer and censor of polite society, Mr Bickerstaff takes note of every social foible and vice and humour from the 'nice conduct of a clouded cane' or the exorbitant circumference of a hooped petticoat to the evils of loveless marriages for an establishment, and from the insipid affectations of the visitingday and the noisy utterance of responses in church to the arts of the well-bred cheat and the brutality of the bully. The treatment of these subjects is, as a rule, much less formal and elaborate than in the Spectator, where every paper substantive essay, usually on a set theme. s later days, indeed, the Tatler assumed this ; but its earlier numbers each dealt with three ur subjects, which of course were lightly and exhaustively handled. As a consequence, : the Spectator has a more solid literary ; the Tatler gives us perhaps the more r picture of the varied life of the period. ing over its pages, one can see Betterton ove for Love, and Wilkes as Sir Harry air, and watch Tom Modely and Will tly tapping their snuff-boxes at White's or g Chloe and Clarinda in Pall Mall. The s, patched and powdered, trip to and from sedan-chairs and coaches; the preacher at aul's or St Clement Dane's holds forth for or ist Dr Sacheverell; at the Grecian the Temdiscuss tragedy and epic according to the of Aristotle and Bossu; the Mohocks scour Il-lit streets at night. The bluff country squire es the coffee-house by calling for a morning ght of ale and Dyer's newsletter; at the rich s table the poor parson rises ruefully before lessert, and in the long stage-coach journey ristol or Exeter the travellers are bored and I into a state of sullen ennui mitigated only read of the highwayman's pistol. Through it oo, there comes an echo of the great events ne time-the tramp of the armies of Marlugh and Vendôme, and the distant thunder e cannon of Malplaquet and Pultowa.

eele's share in the Tatler is so marked and onderant as to have caused the general assoon of the paper with his name, and withany disparagement of the invaluable aid 1 by Addison, it must be owned that the and main features of the venture were mined by Steele. To him, for one thing, trong moral purpose was due. Steele was itially a preacher, ever bent on the reformaof society, and in the Tatler he set himself only with energy, but also with much tactical to make assault on the many flagrant corons of the age. Conspicuous among his ks were those on gaming and duelling, of h he says himself, with justifiable complaie, 'that in spight of all the force of fashion prejudice, in the face of all the world, I alone iled the condition of an English gentleman, e fortune and life are at this day precarious, : his estate is liable to the demands of esters through a false sense of justice, and ife to the demands of duellists through a sense of honour.'

It his best service to morality was rendered in persistent efforts to raise the general estimate omen and the level of feminine culture and espect. Steele's chivalrous regard for women one of the finest points in his character, and upted perhaps his best and most famous ince in eulogy of Aspasia (Lady Elizabeth ings), of whom he said in the 49th Tatler that to love her was 'a liberal education.' In striving to rectify the position of what he called 'the fair sex,' he struck deep and straight at the worst evils of the day, for undoubtedly the frivolity of fashionable women in the late Stuart period was both cause and effect of the profligacy and brutality of the Rochesters and Sedleys and Mohuns. From the first, Steele made his appeal to women equally with men, and throughout he was never weary of urging on them the duty of acquiring mental culture, of taking a sensible view of life, and acquiring a proper conception of the seriousness and sanctity of marriage. His 'message' on this head is well summarised in a few sentences of the admirable 248th Tatler:

'It is with great indignation that I see such crowds of the female world lost to human society, and condemned to a laziness which makes life pass away with less relish than in the hardest labour. . . . Those who are in the quality of gentlewomen should propose to themselves some suitable method of passing away their time. This would furnish them with reflections and sentiments proper for the companions of reasonable men, and prevent the unnatural marriages which happen every day between the most accomplish'd women and the veriest oafs, the worthiest men and the most insignificant females. Were the general turn of women's education of another kind than it is at present, we should want one another for more reasons than we do as the world now goes.'

It was natural that a man who wrote thus should glorify all cleanly and kindly sentiments, as they are glorified in the Tatler. Sometimes indeed, in pathetic pictures of true lovers' woes like the stories of Philander and Chloe (No. 94), the sentiment is a trifle maudlin; but in the charming domestic pictures as a rule—in such masterpieces as the account of his father's death (No. 181), the description of the family where Mr Bickerstaff visits as an old friend (Nos. 95 and 114), and the relation of the little matrimonial jars of Tranquillus and Jenny (No. 85)—the pathos and tenderness of Steele are unerring. No man has written more simply and beautifully of the love of husband and wife and parents and children, and of the innocent joys of home.

Of the other features of Steele's work in the Tatler one need only notice the uniform kindliness of satire (it was Steele's creed that every satirist should be a good-natured man); the humour, broader and less refined than Addison's; the negligently easy style so free from sententiousness despite the moral burden of the content; and the justice of the literary and dramatic criticism. Steele, it is true, seldom or never analyses his judgments, and shows nothing that can be called a critical theory; but his judgments themselves are sound; his taste is good. He frankly admires what is admirable, and transcribes it generously for the reader's benefit. Hardly any one of our writers quotes Shakespeare so often.

Two months after the Tatler, to the great regret of the town, had been discontinued, there appeared (1st March 1711) the more famous Spectator, which ran until the 6th of December in the next year. It came out every week-day, and, like its predecessor, cost a penny until the Stamp Act passed by Harley's Government caused its price to be doubled. It was a signal proof of the paper's popularity that it continued to exist, though with a diminished circulation, in spite of a tax which killed most of the journals of the day. Its highest circulation seems to have been 14,000 copies, and even after the half-penny tax had been laid on, 10,000 copies of it were sold on an average every day. The honours of the Spectator have fallen mainly to Addison; yet Steele's part in it was far from unimportant. Of the 555 numbers, 236 (signed with the letter R. or T.) were written by him, as against Addison's 274. Among the other contributors were Ambrose Philips (who signs X.), Pope (whose Messiah appeared in No. 378), Hughes, Tickell, Parnell, and Eusden. Steele, it should be added, had no hand in Addison's brief revival of the Spectator in June 1714.

The idea of the Spectator's Club, which is described in the second number, was Steele's invention, and from him consequently came not only the pictures of Sir Andrew Freeport, Will Honeycomb, and Captain Sentry, but also the first sketch of Sir Roger de Coverley, which was afterwards developed in the immortal series of papers forming Addison's masterpiece. To Steele also belong one or two of the most pleasing papers ordinarily reckoned in that series, containing (Nos. 113 and 118) the account of Sir Roger's hopeless passion for the widow; and to him, according to the best critical opinion, must not be attributed the degradation of the knight's character by showing him in an adventure with a woman of the town. The well-known tale of Inkle and Yarico, one of the oftenest-quoted examples of Steele's pathos, is to be found in the Spectator (No. 11); and there also, as first-rate specimens of his humour, criticism, and satire, we may instance the amusing narrative of the stage-coach journey with the Quaker and the brisk captain (No. 132), the account of Raphael's cartoons (Nos. 226 and 244), and the peculiarly vigorous and plain-spoken attack (No. 51) on the grossness of the stage. The steady moral purpose which had guided the Tatler is maintained in numerous papers on the evils of profaneness, profligacy, female frivolity, and even the blessedness of keeping out of debt. Poor Steele always preached much better than he practised, and it can well be believed that there was some truth in the ingenuous confession with which he closed the Tatler, that as 'severity of manners was absolutely necessary for him who would censure others,' the purpose of the paper was 'wholly lost' by his 'being so long understood as the author.'

To the Spectator, on the 12th of March 1713, succeeded the comparatively short-lived Guardian, the last of the three great periodicals of Queen Anne's reign. It also appeared daily at the price of a penny, running till the 1st of October in the same year. Nearly half the papers were by Steek, rather less than a third by Addison, and most of the rest by Dr George (afterwards Bishop) Berkeley. The place of Isaac Bickerstaff and Mr Spectator's here taken by an equally imaginary Nestor Imside, and the reader at the outset is informed that his chief entertainment will arise from what pass at the tea-table of My Lady Lizard, to whose family Mr Ironside stands in loco parentis. Briefly, the Guardian may be described as showing, with a inevitable lack of freshness, the same kind of contents and qualities as had made the fortune of its predecessor. The introduction of party politics spoiled it for its own day and for posterity. Always a very militant Whig, Steele had allowed hits # the Tories even in the Tatler; and Swift, when ratting to the side of Harley and St John in 1712, grumbled that he had been 'mighty imperinent of late in his Spectators.' The greatly intensifed rage of faction in the last years of Queen Anne had its effect on the Guardian, which was often little better than a party pamphlet.

In politics, indeed, Steele had become ever more and more deeply engaged during those stormy years which saw the downfall of Godolphin and Marlborough, the administration of Oxford and Bolingbroke, and the ending of the great war by the Peace of Utrecht. The dismissal of the Whigs had deprived him of his post of Gazetteer, but not of the commissionership of stamps which had been bestowed on him in 1710, and which he retained till 1713. His gradual breach with Swift, who in the former of these years had turned pamphleter on the Tory side, is traceable in the Journal to Stella, which contains some graphic and caustic 'He is notices of his character and habits. governed by his wife,' we read, 'most abominably. I never saw her since I came, nor has he ever made me an invitation; either he does not, or is such a thoughtless Tisdall fellow that he never minds it. So what care I for his wit? for he is the worst company in the world till he has a bottle of wine in his head.' 'Once, when he was to have made one of a tavern party,' we are told that he 'came not, nor never did twice, since I knew him, to any appointment.' In 1713 the Guardies brought the two into open paper-warfare, Swift attacking Steele in the Examiner and also in a tract called The Importance of the Guardian considered. When the Guardian came to an end, Steele carried on his campaign against the Government in its successor, The Englishman (October 1713-February 1714), memorable only because its twenty-sixth number contains the account of Alexander Selkirk which is supposed to have given Defoe the hint for Robinson Crusoe. In January 1714 Steele published the pamphlet entitled The Crisis, and followed it up with The Lover and The Reader, two polemical periodicals which had the very shortest life. The climax was reached in his election to the Parliament of 1714 and his almost instant expulsion by a vote of the House of Commons on the 12th of March for 'seditious' paragraphs in the Crisis and the Englishman. Addison prompted him in the three hours' speech of 'great temper, modesty, and unconcern' which he made in his defence, and Stanhope and Walpole were among his supporters; but the Tory majority were resolved, after the fashion of the day, to have their revenge on the leading Whig pamphleteer. The persecution had one good result in the publication of the Apology for Himself and his Writings (October 1714), which contains many interesting biographical details.

In a very few months, however, came a turn of the wheel of political fortune. The accession of George I. brought the Whigs again to the top, and with them, of course, rose Steele. By the goodwill of the actors, who gratefully remembered his Tatler criticisms, he became a patentee and manager of Drury Lane Theatre, with a substantial share of the profits. In the beginning of 1715 he entered Parliament again, and in April of the same year he was knighted. Soon afterwards a place was found for him on the commission for inquiring into the estates forfeited by the rebels of 1715; and this appointment necessitated a journey to Edinburgh in 1718, when he was welcomed in verse by Allan Ramsay and Alexander Pennecuik. His literary activity was maintained in a new volume of the Englishman (1715) and one or two other ephemeral periodicals—Town Talk, Tea-Table, Chit-Chat-in that and the next year.

Yet withal, prosperity was not secured. Steele's thriftless habits and his proneness to speculation, manifested conspicuously in a luckless project for the carriage of live fish by sea, kept him in his normal state of impecuniosity and debt. But there were worse misfortunes still. 'Dear Prue' died in 1718, and next year came the end of that friendship with Addison of which he had boasted so often with a touching humility and generosity that are among the best proofs of his real excellence of character. Addison's decorous instincts must often have been shocked by Steele's prodigality, and there seems no reason to doubt the well-known story which represents him reclaiming a loan by means of an execution on his friend, to teach him a lesson in frugality—a lesson which is said to have been accepted with perfect good humour, but of course without any good result. The quarrel, however, was not about money, but politics, for the two friends differed, and proceeded to a paper-war on the question of Stanhope's Peerage Bill. Steele attacked the bill in the Plebeian, Addison replied with acrimony in the Old Whig, and the two were still unreconciled when Addison died in June 1719. Steele lived ten years longer, publishing The Theatre, another shortlived periodical, in 1720, and, after one or two pamphlets, his fourth play, The Conscious Lovers, in 1722. Another play was announced but never completed, although a few fragments of it have been preserved.

Steele's debts seem to have so accumulated as to make it prudent for him to leave London, whether for fear of duns or desire of retrenchment and repayment; and apparently he did not return to the capital after 1723. His last years were spent partly at Hereford, where his friend Hoadly was bishop, and partly at Carmarthen, where 'Prue's' property lay. Stricken by paralysis, he suffered partial loss of mind; and at Carmarthen, on 1st September 1729, he died. It is said that 'he retained his cheerful sweetness of temper to the last, and would often be carried out in a summer's evening, where the country lads and lasses were assembled at their rural sports, and with his pencil write an order for a new gown to the best dancer' -surely no unfitting final glimpse of the kindliest sentimentalist in our literature.

Love, Grief, and Death.

The first sense of sorrow I ever knew was upon the death of my father, at which time I was not quite five years of age; but was rather amazed at what all the house meant, than possessed with a real understanding why nobody was willing to play with me. I remember I went into the room where his body lay, and my mother sat weeping alone by it. I had my battledoor in my hand, and fell a-beating the coffin, and calling 'Papa, for I know not how I had some slight idea that he was locked up there. My mother catched me in her arms, and transported beyond all patience of the silent grief she was before in, she almost smothered me in her embrace, and told me, in a flood of tears, papa could not hear me, and would play with me no more, for they were going to put him under ground, whence he could never come to us again. She was a very beautiful woman, of a noble spirit, and there was a dignity in her grief amidst all the wildness of her transport, which methought struck me with an instinct of sorrow, which, before I was sensible what it was to grieve, seized my very soul, and has made pity the weakness of my heart ever since. The mind in infancy is, methinks, like the body in embryo, and receives impressions so forcible that they are as hard to be removed by reason as any mark with which a child is born is to be taken away by any future application. (From The Tatler, No. 181.)

Agreeable Companions and Flatterers.

An old acquaintance who met me this morning seemed overjoyed to see me, and told me I looked as well as he had known me do these forty years; but, continued he, not quite the man you were when we visited together at Lady Brightly's. Oh! Isaac, those days are over. Do you think there are any such fine creatures now living as we then conversed with? He went on with a thousand incoherent circumstances, which, in his imagination, must needs please me; but they had the quite contrary effect. The flattery with which he began, in telling me how well I wore, was not disagreeable; but his indiscreet mention of a set of acquaintance we had outlived, recalled ten thousand things to my memory, which made me reflect upon my present condition with regret. Had he indeed been so kind as, after a long absence, to felicitate me upon an indolent and easy old age, and mentioned how much he and I had to thank for, who at our time of day could walk firmly, eat heartily, and converse cheerfully, he had kept up my pleasure in myself. But of all mankind, there are none so shocking as these injudicious civil people. They ordinarily begin upon something that they know must be a satisfaction; but then, for fear of the imputation of flattery, they follow it with the last thing in the world of which you would be reminded. It is this that perplexes civil persons. The reason that there is such a general outcry among us against flatterers is, that there are so very few good ones. It is the nicest art in this life, and is a part of eloquence which does not want the preparation that is necessary to all other parts of it, that your audience should be your well-wishers; for praise from an enemy is the most pleasing of all commendations.

It is generally to be observed, that the person most agreeable to a man for a constancy, is he that has no shining qualities, but is a certain degree above great imperfections, whom he can live with as his inferior, and who will either overlook or not observe his little defects. Such an easy companion as this, either now and then throws out a little flattery, or lets a man silently flatter himself in his superiority to him. If you take notice, there is hardly a rich man in the world who has not such a led friend of small consideration, who is a darling for his insignificancy. It is a great case to have one in our own shape a species below us, and who, without being listed in our service, is by nature of our retinue. These dependents are of excellent use on a rainy day, or when a man has not a mind to dress; or to exclude solitude, when one has neither a mind to that nor to company. There are of this good-natured order who are so kind as to divide themselves, and do these good offices to many. Five or six of them visit a whole quarter of the town, and exclude the spleen, without fees, from the families they frequent. If they do not prescribe physic, they can be company when you take it. Very great benefactors to the rich, or those whom they call people at their ease, are your persons of no consequence. I have known some of them, by the help of a little cunning, make delicious flatterers. They know the course of the town, and the general characters of persons; by this means they will sometimes tell the most agreeable falsehoods imaginable. They will acquaint you that such an one of a quite contrary party said, that though you were engaged in different interests, yet he had the greatest respect for your good sense and address. When one of these has a little cunning, he passes his time in the utmost satisfaction to himself and his friends; for his position is never to report or speak a displeasing thing to his friend. As for letting him go on in an error, he knows advice against them is the office of persons of greater talents and less discretion.

The Latin word for a flatterer (assentator) implies no more than a person that barely consents; and indeed such an one, if a man were able to purchase or maintain him, cannot be bought too dear. Such a one never contradicts you, but gains upon you, not by a fulsome way of commending you in broad terms, but liking whatever you propose or utter; at the same time is ready to beg your pardon, and gainsay you if you chance to speak ill of yourself. An old lady is very seldom without such a companion as this, who can recite the names of all her lovers, and the matches refused by her in the days when she minded such vanities—as she is pleased to call them, though she so much approves the mention of them. It is to be noted, that a woman's flatterer is generally elder than herself, her years serving at once to recommend her patroness's age, and to add weight to her complaisance in all other particulars.

We gentlemen of small fortunes are extremely necessitous in this particular. I have indeed one who smokes with me often; but his parts are so low, that all the incense he does me is to fill his pipe with me, and to be out at just as many whiffs as I take. This is all the praise or assent that he is capable of, yet there are more hours when I would rather be in his company than that of the brightest man I know. It would be an hard matter to give an account of this inclination to be flattered; but if we go to the bottom of it, we shall find that the pleasure in it is something like that of receiving money which lay out. Every man thinks he has an estate of reputation, and is glad to see one that will bring any of it home to him; it is no matter how dirty a bag it is conveyed to him in, or by how clownish a messenger, so the money is good. All that we want to be pleased with flattery, is to believe that the man is sincere who gives it us. It is by this one accident that absurd creatures often outrun the most skilful in this art. Their want of ability is here an advantage, and their bluntness, as it is the seeming effect of sincerity, is the best cover to artifice. . . .

It is, indeed, the greatest of injuries to flatter any but the unhappy, or such as are displeased with themselves for some infirmity. In this latter case we have a member of our club, that, when Sir Jeffrey falls asleep, wakes him with snoring. This makes Sir Jeffrey hold up for some moments the longer, to see there are men younger than himself among us, who are more lethargic than he is.

When flattery is practised upon any other consideration, it is the most abject thing in nature; nay, I cannot think of any character below the flatterer, except be that envies him. You meet with fellows prepared to be as mean as possible in their condescensions and expressions; but they want persons and talents to rise up to such a baseness. As a coxcomb is a fool of parts, so a flatterer is a knave of parts.

The best of this order that I know is one who disguises it under a spirit of contradiction or reproof. He told an arrant driveller the other day, that he did not care for being in company with him, because he heard he turned his absent friends into ridicule. And upon Lady Autumn's disputing with him about something that happened at the Revolution, he replied with a very angry tone: 'Pray, madam, give me leave to know more of a thing in which I was actually concerned, than you who were then in your nurse's arms.'

Quack Advertisements.

It gives me much despair in the design of reforming the world by my speculations, when I find there always arise, from one generation to another, successive cheats and bubbles, as naturally as beasts of prey and those which are to be their food. There is hardly a man in the world, one would think, so ignorant as not to know that the ordinary quack-doctors, who publish their abilities in little brown billets, distributed to all who pass by, are to a man impostors and murderers; yet

e credulity of the vulgar, and the impudence ofessors, that the affair still goes on, and new f what was never done before are made every it aggravates the jest is, that even this promise nade as long as the memory of man can trace nothing performed, and yet still prevails. . . . something unaccountably taking among the 10se who come from a great way off. Ignorant quality, as many there are of such, dote exhis way; many instances of which every uggest to himself, without my enumeration of e ignorants of lower order, who cannot, like ones, be profuse of their money to those re-1 by coming from a distance, are no less coman the others; for they venture their lives for dmiration.

I will not answer tempers called 'sea-voyages, and campaigns,' resay those of green-sickness and lying-in as well taken care of if the doctor ore. But the art of managing mankind is ake them stare a little to keep up their nt; to let nothing be familiar to them, but ve something in their sleeve, in which they you are deeper than they are. There is an sellow, a barber, of my acquaintance, who, broken fiddle and a dried sea-monster, has a , strained with two nails at each end, over v, and the words 'rainy, dry, wet,' and so ten to denote the weather, according to the alling of the cord. We very great scholars t to wonder at this; but I observed a very ow, a chance customer, who sat in the chair to be shaved, fix his eye upon this miraculous e during the operation upon his chin and en those and his head also were cleared of all ces and excrescences, he looked at the fish, ne fiddle, still grubling in his pockets, and eye again at the twine, and the words writ on then altered his mind as to farthings, and gave a silver sixpence. There is a doctor in Mouse r Wapping, who sets up for curing cataracts credit of having, as his bill sets forth, lost an e emperor's service. His patients come in and he shews his muster-roll, which confirms as in his imperial majesty's troops; and he their eyes with great success. Who would at a man should be a doctor for the cure of ildren, by declaring that his father and grande born bursten? But Charles Ingoltson, next e Harp in Barbican, has made a pretty penny severation. You may be sure it is I go, when sometimes, let it be to the purpose keep a Latin sentence in my front; and I was e pleased when I observed one of my readers g his eye on my twentieth paper, 'More Latin hat a prodigious scholar is this man!' But as I have here taken much liberty with this learned doctor, I must make up all I have said by repeating what he seems to be in earnest in, and honestly promise to those who will not receive him as a great man, to wit, 'That from eight to twelve, and from two till six, he attends for the good of the public to bleed for threepence.'

Story-telling.

I have often thought that a story-teller is born, as well as a poet. It is, I think, certain that some men have such a peculiar cast of mind, that they see things in another light than men of grave dispositions. Men of a lively imagination and a mirthful temper will represent things to their hearers in the same manner as they themselves were affected with them; and whereas serious spirits might perhaps have been disgusted at the sight of some odd occurrences in life, yet the very same occurrences shall please them in a well-told story, where the disagreeable parts of the images are concealed, and those only which are pleasing exhibited to the fancy. Story-telling is therefore not an art, but what we call a 'knack;' it doth not so much subsist upon wit as upon humour; and I will add, that it is not perfect without proper gesticulations of the body, which naturally attend such merry emotions of the mind. I know very well that a certain gravity of countenance sets some stories off to advantage, where the hearer is to be surprised in the end. But this is by no means a general rule; for it is frequently convenient to aid and assist by cheerful looks and whimsical agitations. I will go yet further, and affirm that the success of a story very often depends upon the make of the body, and formation of the features, of him who relates it. I have been of this opinion ever since I criticised upon the chin of Dick Dewlap. I very often had the weakness to repine at the prosperity of his conceits, which made him pass for a wit with the widow at the coffee-house, and the ordinary mechanics that frequent it; nor could I myself forbear laughing at them most heartily, though upon examination I thought most of them very flat and insipid. I found, after some time, that the merit of his wit was founded upon the shaking of a fat paunch, and the tossing up of a pair of rosy jowls. Poor Dick had a fit of sickness, which robbed him of his fat and his fame at once; and it was full three months before he regained his reputation, which rose in proportion to his floridity. He is now very jolly and ingenious, and hath a good constitution for wit.

Those who are thus adorned with the gifts of nature, are apt to show their parts with too much ostentation. I would therefore advise all the professors of this art never to tell stories but as they seem to grow out of the subject-matter of the conversation, or as they serve to illustrate or enliven it. Stories that are very common are generally irksome, but may be aptly introduced, provided they be only hinted at, and mentioned by way of allusion. Those that are altogether new should never be ushered in without a short and pertinent character of the chief persons concerned, because, by that means, you make the company acquainted with them; and it is a certain rule, that slight and trivial accounts of those who are familiar to us administer more mirth than the brightest points of wit in unknown characters. A little circumstance in the complexion of dress of the man you are talking of sets his image before the hearer, if it be chosen aptly for the story. Thus, I remember Tom Lizard, after having made his sisters merry with an account of a formal old man's way of complimenting, owned very frankly that his story would not have been worth one farthing if he had made the hat of him whom he represented one inch narrower. Besides the marking distinct characters, and selecting pertinent circumstances, it is likewise necessary to leave off in time, and end smartly; so that there is a kind of drama in the forming of a story; and the manner of conducting and pointing it is the same as in an epigram. It is a miserable thing, after one hath raised the expectation of the company by humorous characters and a pretty conceit, to pursue the matter too far. There is no retreating; and how poor is it for a story-teller to end his relation by saying, 'That's all!' (From The Guardian, No. 42.)

A Domestic Scene.

There are several persons who have many pleasures and entertainments in their possession which they do not enjoy. It is therefore a kind and good office to acquaint them with their own happiness, and turn their attention to such instances of their good fortune which they are apt to overlook. Persons in the married state often want such a monitor, and pine away their days by looking upon the same condition in anguish and murmur, which carries with it in the opinion of others a complication of all the pleasures of life, and a retreat from its inquietudes.

I am led into this thought by a visit I made an old friend, who was formerly my school-fellow. He came to town last week with his family for the winter, and yesterday morning sent me word his wife expected me to dinner. I am as it were at home at that house, and every member of it knows me for their well-wisher. I cannot indeed express the pleasure it is to be met by the children with so much joy as I am when I go thither: The boys and girls strive who shall come first, when they think it is I that am knocking at the door; and that child which loses the race to me runs back again to tell the father it is Mr Bickerstaff. This day I was led in by a pretty girl that we all thought must have forgot me; for the family has been out of town these two years. Her knowing me again was a mighty subject with us, and took up our discourse at the first entrance. After which, they began to rally me upon a thousand little stories they heard in the country, about my marriage to one of my neighbour's daughters: upon which the gentleman, my friend, said, 'Nay, if Mr Bickerstaff marries a child of any of his old companions, I hope mine shall have the preference; there is Mrs Mary is now sixteen, and would make him as fine a widow as the best of them: but I know him too well; he is so enamoured with the very memory of those who flourished in our youth, that he will not so much as look upon the modern beauties. I remember, old gentleman, how often you went home in a day to refresh your countenance and dress, when Teraminta reigned in your heart. As we came up in the coach, I repeated to my wife some of your verses on her.' With such reflections on little passages which happened long ago, we passed our time during a cheerful and elegant meal. dinner his lady left the room, as did also the children. As soon as we were alone, he took me by the hand; Well, my good friend, says he, I am heartily glad to see thee; I was afraid you would never have seen all the company that dined with you to-day again. Do not you think the good woman of the house a little altered since you followed her from the playhouse, to find out who she was for me? I perceived a tear fall down in cheek as he spoke, which moved me not a little. Be to turn the discourse, said I, she is not indeed quite that creature she was when she returned me the letter I carried from you; and told me she hoped, as I was a gentleman, I would be employed no more to trouble her, who had never offended me; but would be so much the gentleman's friend as to dissuade him from a pursuit which he could never succeed in. You may remember, I thought her in earnest; and you were forest to employ your cousin Will, who made his sister get acquainted with her for you. You cannot expect her to be for ever fifteen. Fifteen! replied my good friest: Ah! you little understand, you that have lived a backeto, how great, how exquisite a pleasure there is in being really beloved! It is impossible that the most besites face in nature should raise in me such pleasing ides as when I look upon that excellent woman. That fading in her countenance is chiefly caused by her watching with me in my fever. This was followed by a fit of sickness, which had like to have carried her off int winter. I tell you sincerely, I have so many obligations to her that I cannot with any sort of moderation think of her present state of health. But as to what you my of fifteen, she gives me every day pleasures beyond what I ever knew in the possession of her beauty, when I was in the vigour of youth. Every moment of her life bring me fresh instances of her complacency to my inclinations, and her prudence in regard to my fortune. Her face is to me much more beautiful than when I first saw it; there is no decay in any feature, which I cannot trace from the very instant it was occasioned by some anxious concern for my welfare and interests. Thus at the same time, methinks, the love I conceived towards her for what she was, is heightened by my gratitude for what she is The love of a wife is as much above the idle passion commonly called by that name, as the loud laughter of buffoons is inferior to the elegant mirth of gentlemen. Oh! she is an inestimable jewel. In her examination of her household affairs, she shews a certain fearfulness to find a fault, which makes her servants obey her like children; and the meanest we have has an ingenuous shame for an offence, not always to be seen in children in other families. I speak freely to you, my old friend; ever since her sickness, things that gave me the quickest joy before, turn now to a certain anxiety. As the children play in the next room, I know the poor things by their steps, and am considering what they must do should they lose their mother in their tender years. The pleasure I used to take in telling my boy stories of battles, and asking my girl questions about disposal of her baby [doll], and the gossiping of it, is turned into inward reflection and melancholy.

He would have gone on in this tender way, when the good lady entered, and with an inexpressible sweetness in her countenance told us she had been searching her closet for something very good, to treat such an old friend as I was. Her husband's eyes sparkled with pleasure at the chearfulness of her countenance; and I saw all his fears vanish in an instant. The lady observing something in our looks which shewed we had been more serious than ordinary, and seeing her husband receive eat concern under a forced chearfulness, imuessed at what we had been talking of; and rself to me, said, with a smile. Mr Bickerstaff, eve a word of what he tells you; I shall still you for my second, as I have often promised he takes more care of himself than he has his coming to town. You must know, he at he finds London is a much more healthy the country; for he sees several of his old e and school-fellows are here young fellows ill-bottomed periwigs. I could scarce keep orning from going out open breasted. My is always extremely delighted with her iumour, made her sit down with us. She that easiness which is peculiar to women of to keep up the good humour she had brought turned her raillery upon me: Mr Bickerstaff, er you followed me one night from the playpose you should carry me thither to-morrow lead me into the front-box. This put us field of discourse about the beauties who ers to the present, and shined in the boxes s ago. I told her I was glad she had transiny of her charms, and I did not question but daughter was within half a year of being a pleasing ourselves with this fantastical prehe young lady, when on a sudden we were th the noise of a drum, and immediately little godson to give me a point of war. His ween laughing and chiding, would have put the room; but I would not part with him so. on conversation with him, though he was y in his mirth, that the child had excellent as a great master of all the learning on the ght years old. I perceived him a very great Æsop's Fables: but he frankly declared to d, that he did not delight in that learning, did not believe they were true; for which nd he had very much turned his studies, for lve-month past, into the lives and adventures ianis of Greece, Guy of Warwick, the Seven and other historians of that age. I could erve the satisfaction the father took in the of his son; and that these diversions might e profit, I found the boy had made remarks, t be of service to him during the course of fe. He would tell you the mismanagements kathrift, find fault with the passionate temper Southampton, and loved Saint George for ampion of England; and by this means had insensibly moulded into the notions of disue, and honour. I was extolling his accomwhen the mother told me that the little girl e in this morning was in her way a better 1 he: Betty, says she, deals chiefly in fairies s, and sometimes in a winter-night will naids with her accounts, until they are afraid

In this pensive mood I returned to my family; that is to say, to my maid, my dog, and my cat, who only can be the better or worse for what happens to me.

Inkle and Yarico.

I was the other day amusing myself with Ligon's account of Barbadoes; and in answer to your well-wrought tale, I will give you (as it dwells upon my memory) out of that honest traveller, in his fifty-fifth page, the history of Inkle and Yarico.

Mr Thomas Inkle, of London, aged twenty years, embarked in the Downs on the good ship called the Achilles, bound for the West-Indies, on the 16th of June, 1647, in order to improve his fortune by trade and merchandise. Our adventurer was the third son of an eminent citizen, who had taken particular care to instil into his mind an early love of gain, by making him a perfect master of numbers, and consequently giving him a quick view of loss and advantage, and preventing the natural impulses of his passions, by prepossession towards his interests. With a mind thus turned, young Inkle had a person every way agreeable, a ruddy vigour in his countenance, strength in his limbs, with ringlets of fair hair loosely flowing on his shoulders. It happened, in the course of the voyage, that the Achilles, in some distress, put into a creek on the main of America, in search of provisions. The youth, who is the hero of my story, among others went ashore on this occasion. From their first landing they were observed by a party of Indians, who hid themselves in the woods for that purpose. The English unadvisedly marched a great distance from the shore into the country, and were intercepted by the natives, who slew the greatest number of them. Our adventurer escaped among others, by flying into a forest. Upon his coming into a remote and pathless part of the wood, he threw himself, tired and breathless, on a little hillock, when an Indian maid rushed from a thicket behind him. After the first surprize, they appeared mutually agreeable to each other. If the European was highly charmed with the limbs, features, and wild graces of the naked American, the American was no less taken with the dress, complexion, and shape of an European, covered from head to foot. The Indian grew immediately enamoured of him, and consequently solicitous for his preservation. She therefore conveyed him to a cave, where she gave him a delicious repast of fruits, and led him to a stream to slake his thirst. In the midst of these good offices, she would sometimes play with his hair, and delight in the opposition of its colour to that of her fingers; then open his bosom, then laugh at him for covering it. She was, it seems, a person of distinction, for she every day came to him in a different dress, of the most beautiful shells, bugles, and bredes [braids]. She likewise brought him a great many spoils, which her other lovers had presented to her, so that his cave was richly adorned with all the spotted skins of beasts, and most party-coloured feathers of fowls, which that world afforded. To make his confinement more tolerable, she would carry him in the dusk of the evening, or by the favour of the moon-light, to unfrequented groves and solitudes, and shew him where to lie down in safety, and sleep amidst the falls of waters and melody of nightingales. Her part was to watch and hold him awake in her arms, for fear of her countrymen, and awake him on occasions to consult his safety. In this manner did the lovers pass away their time, till they had learned a language of their own, in which the voyager communicated to his mistress how happy he should be to have her in his own country, where she should be clothed in such silks as his waistcoat was made of, and be carried in houses drawn by horses, without being exposed to wind and weather. All this he promised her the enjoyment of, without such fears and alarms as they were tormented with. In this tender correspondence these lovers lived for several months, when Yarico, instructed by her lover, discovered a vessel on the coast, to which she made signals; and in the night, with the utmost joy and satisfaction, accompanied him to a ship's crew of his countrymen, bound for When a vessel from the main arrives in Barbadoes. that island, it seems the planters come down to the shore, where there is an immediate market of the Indians and other slaves, as with us of horses and oxen.

To be short, Mr Thomas Inkle, now coming into English territories, began seriously to reflect upon his loss of time, and to weigh with himself how many days interest of his money he had lost during his stay with Yarico. This thought made the young man very pensive, and careful what account he should be able to give his friends of his voyage. Upon which consideration, the prudent and frugal young man sold Yarico to a Barbadian merchant; notwithstanding the poor girl, to commiserate her condition, told him that she was with child by him; but he only made use of that information to rise in his demands upon the purchaser.

(From the Spectator, No. 11.)

Richard Ligon, a London Royalist merchant ruined by the Civil War, undertook at sixty to begin life anew in the West Indies, sailed to Barbadoes in 1647, and, driven home by ill-health in three years, was by his creditors clapped in prison, where he wrote his History of the Barbadoes (1657; new ed. 1673). There Steele (who had financial interests in the West Indies, through his wife) found the bones of poor Yarico's story; but the novelette is mainly Steele's own creation. Inkle (named from an old word for a kind of tape) is entirely his invention, and is unkindly made to sail by the ship Ligon was passenger on; it was Steele also, not Ligon, who discovered nightingales in Barbadoes! From the Spectator the story found its way into such compilations as Knox's Elegant Extracts and Masson's Collection, where Burns knew it ere he had the chance of seeing at Dumfries in 1794 the 'opera' or musical comedy of Inkle and Yarico, by George Colman the younger. In the Spectator form the tale attracted notice on the Continent also; was retold in German by Gellert, by Bodmer, and by Gessner; and had its share in securing a victory for the Swiss or Natural school over the Leipzig school of French sympathies and formal standards.

The Quaker in the Stage-coach.

Having notified to my good friend Sir Roger that I should set out for London the next day, his horses were ready at the appointed hour in the evening; and attended by one of his grooms, I arrived at the county town at twilight, in order to be ready for the stage-coach the day following. As soon as we arrived at the inn, the servant, who waited upon me, inquired of the chamberlain in my hearing what company he had for the coach? The fellow answered, Mrs Betty Arable the great fortune, and the widow her mother; a recruiting officer, who took a place because they were to go; young Squire Quickset her cousin, that her mother wished her to be married to; Ephraim the quaker, her guardian; and a gentleman that had studied himself dumb from Sir Roger de Coverley's. I observed by what he said of myself, that according to his office he dealt much in intelligence; and doubted not but there was some foundation for his reports of the rest of the company, as well as for the whimsical account he gave of me. The next morning at day-break we were all called; and I, who know my own natural shyness, and endeavour to be as little liable to be disputed with as possible, dressed immediately, that I might make no one wait. The first preparation for our setting-out was, that the captain's half-pike was placed near the coachman, and a drum behind the coach. In the mean time the drummer, the captain's equipage, was very loud that none of the captain's things should be placed so as to be spoiled; upon which his cloke-beg was fixed in the seat of the coach: and the captain himself, according to a frequent though invidious behaviour of military men, ordered his man to look sharp, that none but one of the ladies should have the place he had taken fronting the coach-box.

We were in some little time fixed in our sests, and sat with that dislike which people not too good-natural usually conceive of each other at first sight. jumbled us insensibly into some sort of familiarity: and we had not moved above two miles, when the widow asked the captain what success he had in his recruiting? The officer, with a frankness he believed very graceful, told her, 'that indeed he had but very little luck, and had suffered much by desertion, therefore should be glad to end his warfare in the service of her or her far daughter. In a word, continued he, I am a soldier, and to be plain is my character: you see me, madam, yours. sound, and impudent; take me yourself, widow, or give me to her; I will be wholly at your disposal. I am 1 soldier of fortune, ha!' This was followed by a vain laugh of his own, and a deep silence of all the rest of the company. I had nothing left for it but to fall fest asleep, which I did with all speed. 'Come, said beresolve upon it, we will make a wedding at the next town: we will awake this pleasant companion who is fallen asleep, to be the bride-man,' and, giving the quaker a clap on the knee, he concluded, 'This sly saint, who, I will warrant, understands what is what as well as you or I, widow, shall give the bride as father.' The quaker, who happened to be a man of smartness, answered, 'Friend, I take it in good part that thou hast given me the authority of a father over this comely and virtuous child; and I must assure thee, that if I have the giving her, I shall not bestow her on thee. Thy mirth, friend, savoureth of folly: thou art a person of a light mind; thy drum is a type of thee, it soundeth because it is empty. Verily, it is not from thy fulness, but thy emptiness that thou hast spoken this day. Friend, friend, we have hired this coach in partnership with thee, to carry us to the great city; we cannot go any other way. This worthy mother must hear thee if thou wilt needs utter thy follies; we cannot help it, friend, I say: if thou wilt, we must hear thee; but if thou wert a man of understanding, thou wouldst not take advantage of thy courageous countenance to abash us children of peace. Thou art, thou sayest, a soldier; give quarter to us, who cannot resist thee. Why didst thou fleer at our friend, who feigned himself asleep? he said nothing; but how dost thou know what he containeth? If thou speakest improper things in the hearing of this virtuous young virgin, consider it as an outrage against a distressed person that cannot get from thee: to speak indiscreetly what we are obliged to hear, by being hasped up with thee in this public vehicle, is in some degree assaulting on the high road.'

Here Ephraim paused, and the captain with an happy and uncommon impudence, which can be convicted and support itself at the same time, cries, 'Faith, friend, I thank thee; I should have been a little impertinent if thou hadst not reprimanded me. Come, thou art, I see, a smoky [knowing] old fellow, and I will be very orderly the ensuing part of my journey. I was going to give myself airs, but, ladies, I beg pardon.'

The captain was so little out of humour, and our company was so far from being soured by this little ruffle, that Ephraim and he took a particular delight in being agreeable to each other for the future, and assumed their different provinces in the conduct of the company. Our reckonings, apartments, and accommodation fell under Ephraim; and the captain looked to all disputes on the road, as the good behaviour of our coachman, and the right we had of taking place as going to London of all vehicles coming from thence. The occurrences we met with were ordinary, and very little happened which could entertain by the relation of them; but when I considered the company we were in, I took it for no small good-fortune that the whole journey was not spent in impertinences, which to the one part of us might be an entertainment, to the other a suffering. What therefore Ephraim said when we were almost arrived at London, had to me an air not only of good understanding but good breeding. Upon the young lady's expressing her satisfaction in the journey, and declaring how delightful it had been to her, Ephraim delivered himself as follows: 'There is no ordinary part of human life which expresseth so much a good mind, and a right inward man, as his behaviour upon meeting with strangers, especially such as may seem the most unsuitable companions to him: such a man, when he falleth in the way with persons of simplicity and innocence, however knowing he may be in the ways of men, will not vaunt himself thereof; but will the rather hide his superiority to them, that he may not be painful unto them. My good friend, continued he, turning to the officer, thee and I are to part by and by, and peradventure we may never meet again: but be advised by a plain man; modes and apparel are but trifles to the real man, therefore do not think such a man as thyself terrible for thy garb, nor such a one as me contemptible for mine. When two such as thee and I meet with affections as we ought to have towards each other, thou shouldst rejoice to see my peaceful demeanour, and I should be glad to see thy strength and ability to protect me in it.

There are biographies of Steele by Austin Dobson (1886) and G. A. Aitken (1889), the latter of whom has also published an edition of his plays (1893). An annotated selection from his periodical essays was issued in 1885 by the Clarendon Press. There are recent annotated editions of the Tatler, in 8 vols., by G. A. Aitken (1898), and of the Spectator, in 1 vol., by Henry Morley (1868); G. Gregory Smith, in 8 vols (1897-98); and G. A. Aitken, in 8 vols. (1898).

ROBERT AITKEN.

Ambrose Philips (c. 1675-1749) was one of the poets of the day whom Addison's friendship and Pope's enmity raised to temporary importance. Born in Shropshire of Leicestershire ancestry, and educated at St John's College, Cambridge, he made his appearance as a poet in the same year and in the same volume as Pope—the Pastorals of Philips being the first poem, and the Pastorals of Pope the last, in Tonson's Miscellany for 1709.

Tickell praised Philips's Pastorals as the finest in the language, and Pope resented this absurd depreciation of his own poetry by an ironical paper in the Guardian. Pretending to criticise the rival Pastorals and compare them, Pope gives the preference to Philips, but quotes all his worst passages as his best, and places by the side of them his own finest lines, which he says want rusticity and deviate into downright poetry. Philips felt the satire keenly, and even vowed to take personal vengeance on his adversary by whipping him with a rod which he hung upfor the purpose in Button's Coffee-House. Pope, faithful to the maxim that a man never forgives another whom he has injured, continued to pursue Philips with hatred and satire to the close of his life. The pastoral poet had the good sense not to enter the lists with his formidable assailant, and his character and talents soon procured him public employment. In 1715 he was appointed a commissioner for the Lottery; he was afterwards secretary to the Primate of Ireland, and sat for County Armagh in the Irish Parliament. In 1734 he was made registrar of the Prerogative Court. From these appointments, Philips was able to purchase an annuity of £400 per annum, with which he hoped, as Johnson says, 'to pass some years of life [in England] in plenty and tranquillity; but his. hope deceived him: he was struck with a palsy, and died June 18, 1749.' The Pastorals of Philips. are but poor things on the whole; but Goldsmith eulogised the opening of his Epistle to the Larl of Dorset as 'incomparably fine'—a judgment Mr Gosse contradicts, while Mr Leslie Stephen thinks the genuine description of nature quite remarkable for the time. His rendering of a fragment of Sappho was voted so excellent that Addison. was thought to have assisted in its composition:

Fragment from Sappho.

Blessed as the immortal gods is he, The youth who fondly sits by thee, And hears and sees thee all the while Softly speak and sweetly smile.

'Twas this deprived my soul of rest, And raised such tumults in my breast; For while I gazed in transport tost, My breath was gone, my voice was lost;

My bosom glowed; the subtle flame Ran quick through all my vital frame; O'er my dim eyes a darkness hung; My ears with hollow murmurs rung.

In dewy damps my limbs were chilled, My blood with gentle horrors thrilled; My feeble pulse forgot to play; I fainted, sunk, and died away.

Philips, who translated also from Pindar and Anacreon, produced three tragedies, but only one —The Distressed Mother, from the Andromaque of Racine—was successful, and was praised by

Addison in the Spectator; he wrote in the Whig journal The Freethinker (1718-19), which was his own venture, and he translated some Persian tales. A series of short complimentary pieces, by which Philips paid court, as Johnson says, 'to all ages and characters, from Walpole, the steerer of the realm, to Miss Pulteney in the nursery,' procured him the nickname of Namby Pamby from Harry Carey (see page 330 below), a nickname cordially adopted by Pope as suited to Philips's 'eminence in the infantile style.' Of Philips's own achievement in the namby-pamby rhythm, the 'Dimply damsel, sweetly smiling,' addressed to Miss Margaret Pulteney, is one good example, and this is another:

To Miss Charlotte Pulteney, in her Mother's Arms.

Timely blossom, infant fair, Fondling of a happy pair, Every morn and every night Their solicitous delight, Sleeping, waking, still at ease, Pleasing, without skill to please; Little gossip, blithe and hale, Tattling many a broken tale, Singing many a tuneless song, Lavish of a heedless tongue; Simple maiden, void of art, Babbling out the very heart, Yet abandoned to thy will, Yet imagining no ill, Yet too innocent to blush, Like the linnet in the bush, To the mother linnet's note Moduling her slender throat, Chirping forth thy petty joys, Wanton in the change of toys, Like the linnet green, in May, Flitting to each bloomy spray; Wearied then, and glad of rest, Like the linnet in the nest. This thy present happy lot, This in time will be forgot: Other pleasures, other cares, Ever busy Time prepares; And thou shalt in thy daughter see This picture once resembled thee.

Epistle to the Earl of Dorset.

COPENHAGEN, March 9, 1709.
From frozen climes, and endless tracts of snow,
From streams which northern winds forbid to flow,
What present shall the Muse to Dorset bring,
Or how, so near the pole, attempt to sing?
The hoary winter here conceals from sight
All pleasing objects which to verse invite.
The hills and dales and the delightful woods,
The flowery plains and silver-streaming floods,
By snow disguised, in bright confusion lie,
And with one dazzling waste fatigue the eye.

No gentle-breathing breeze prepares the spring, No birds within the desert region sing. The ships, unmoved, the boisterous winds defy, While rattling chariots o'er the ocean fly. The vast leviathan wants room to play, And spout his waters in the face of day.

The starving wolves along the main sea prowl, And to the moon in icy valleys howl.

O'er many a shining league the level main Here spreads itself into a glassy plain:

There solid billows of enormous size,

Alps of green ice, in wild disorder rise.

And yet but lately have I seen, even here, The winter in a lovely dress appear, Ere yet the clouds let fall the treasured snow, Or winds begun through hazy skies to blow: At evening a keen eastern breeze arose, And the descending rain unsullied froze. Soon as the silent shades of night withdrew, The ruddy morn disclosed at once to view The face of nature in a rich disguise, And brightened every object to my eyes: For every shrub, and every blade of grass, And every pointed thorn seemed wrought in glas In pearls and rubies rich the hawthorns show, While through the ice the crimson berries glow. The thick-sprung reeds which watery marshes yi Seemed polished lances in a hostile field. The stag in limpid currents with surprise Sees crystal branches on his forehead rise: The spreading oak, the beech, and towering pin Glazed over, in the freezing ether shine. The frighted birds the rattling branches shun, Which wave and glitter in the distant sun.

When, if a sudden gust of wind arise, The brittle forest into atoms flies; The crackling wood beneath the tempest bends, And in a spangled shower the prospect ends: Or, if a southern gale the region warm, And by degrees unbind the wintry charm, The traveller a miry country sees, And journeys sad beneath the dropping trees: Like some deluded peasant Merlin leads Through fragrant bowers and through delicious While here enchanted gardens to him rise, And airy fabricks there attract his eyes, His wandering feet the magick paths pursue, And, while he thinks the fair illusion true, The trackless scenes disperse in fluid air, And woods, and wilds, and thorny ways appea A tedious road the weary wretch returns, And as he goes the transient vision mourns.

From the First Pastoral-'Lobbin.'

If we, O Dorset, quit the city throng
To meditate in shades the rural song
By your command, be present; and O bring
The Muse along! The Muse to you shall sing
Her influence, Buckhurst, let me there obtain,
And I forgive the famed Sicilian swain.

Begin.—In unluxurious times of yore, When flocks and herds were no inglorious ston Lobbin, a shepherd boy, one evening fair, As western winds had cooled the sultry air, His numbered sheep within the fold now pent, Thus plained him of his dreary disconteht; Beneath a hoary poplar's whispering boughs, He solitary sat to breathe his vows. hilips (1676 - 1709), author of The villing, which Addison pronounced 'the sque poem in the English language,' of the vicar of Brampton in Oxfordwas also Archdeacon of Salop. Vinchester and Christ Church, Oxford; nly devoted to literature, was cut short ption. His early love of Milton is re-I his poems. The Splendid Shilling, a : poem in Miltonic blank verse, is not designed disrespectfully to burlesque om Philips reverenced. He wrote also bration of the battle of Blenheim; but onsiderable effort in serious verse was imitation of Virgil's Georgics. hilling is a classic, read and reprinted ther poems are forgotten.

The Splendid Shilling.

Happy the man who, void of cares and strife, In silken or in leathern purse retains A Splendid Shilling. He nor hears with pain New oysters cried, nor sighs for cheerful ale; But with his friends, when nightly mists arise, To Juniper's Magpie or Town-hall repairs: Where, mindful of the nymph whose wanton eye Transfixed his soul and kindled amorous flames, Chloe or Phillis, he each circling glass Wishes her health, and joy, and equal love. Meanwhile he smokes, and laughs at merry tale, Or pun ambiguous, or conundrum quaint. But I, whom griping penury surrounds, And hunger, sure attendant upon want, With scanty offals, and small acid tiff, Wretched repast! my meagre corps sustain: Then solitary walk, or doze at home In garret vile, and with a warming puff Regale chilled fingers; or from tube as black As winter-chimney, or well-polished jet, Exhale mundungus, ill-perfuming scent : Not blacker tube nor of a shorter size Smokes Cambro-Briton, versed in pedigree, Sprung from Cadwalador and Arthur, kings Full famous in romantic tale, when he O'er many a craggy hill and barren cliff, Upon a cargo of famed Cestrian cheese, High overshadowing rides, with a design To vend his wares, or at th' Arvonian mart, Or Maridunum, or the ancient town Ycleped Brechinia, or where Vaga's stream Encircles Ariconium, fruitful soil! Whence flows nectareous wines that well may vie With Massic, Setin, or renowned Falern.

Thus, while my joyless minutes tedious flow With looks demure and silent pace, a dun, Horrible monster! hated by gods and men, To my aerial citadel ascends. With vocal heel thrice thundering at my gate, With hideous accent thrice he calls; I know The voice ill-boding, and the solemn sound. What should I do? or whither turn? Amazed, Confounded, to the dark recess I fly Of wood-hole; straight my bristling hairs erect Thro' sudden fear: a chilly sweat bedews My shuddering limbs, and, wonderful to tell! My tongue forgets her faculty of speech; So horrible he seems! His faded brow Entrench'd with many a frown, and conic beard, And spreading band, admired by modern saints, Disastrous acts forebode; in his right hand Long scrolls of paper solemnly he waves, With characters and figures dire inscribed, Grievous to mortal eyes; ye gods, avert Such plagues from righteous men! Behind him stalks Another monster, not unlike himself, Sullen of aspect, by the vulgar called A catchpole, whose polluted hands the gods With force incredible and magic charms First have endued: if he his ample palm Should haply on ill-fated shoulder lay Of debtor, straight his body, to the touch Obsequious, as whilom knights were wont, To some enchanted castle is conveyed, Where gates impregnable and coercive chains

In durance strict detain him till, in form Of money, Pallas sets the captive free.

Beware, ye debtors; when ye walk, beware, Be circumspect! oft with insidious ken This caitiff eyes your steps aloof, and oft Lies perdue in a nook or gloomy cave, Prompt to enchant some inadvertent wretch With his unhallowed touch. So, poets sing, Grimalkin, to domestic vermin sworn An everlasting foe, with watchful eye Lies nightly brooding o'er a chinky gap, Protending her fell claws, to thoughtless mice Sure ruin. So her disembowelled web Arachne in a hall or kitchen spreads Obvious to vagrant flies: she secret stands Within her woven cell; the humming prey, Regardless of their fate, rush on the toils Inextricable; nor will aught avail Their arts, or arms, or shapes of lovely hue; The wasp insidious, and the buzzing drone, And butterfly, proud of expanded wings Distinct with gold, entangled in her snares, Useless resistance make: with eager strides She tow'ring flies to her expected spoils: Then with envenomed jaws the vital blood Drinks of reluctant foes, and to her cave Their bulky carcasses triumphant drags.

So pass my days. But when nocturnal shades This world envelop and th' inclement air Persuades men to repel benumbing frosts With pleasant wines and crackling blaze of wood, Me lonely sitting, nor the glimmering light Of make-weight candle, nor the joyous talk Of loving friend delights; distressed, forlorn, Amidst the horrors of the tedious night, Darkling I sigh, and feed with dismal thoughts My anxious mind; or sometimes mournful verse Indite, and sing of groves and myrtle shades, Or desperate lady near a purling stream, Or lover pendent on a willow-tree. Meanwhile I labour with eternal drought, And restless wish, and rave; my parchéd throat Finds no relief, nor heavy eyes repose: But if a slumber haply does invade My weary limbs, my fancy's still awake; Thoughtful of drink, and eager, in a dream, Tipples imaginary pots of ale, In vain; awake, I find the settled thirst Still gnawing, and the pleasant phantom curse.

Thus do I live, from pleasure quite debarred, Nor taste the fruits that the sun's genial rays Mature, John-apple, nor the downy peach, Nor walnut in rough-furrowed coat secure, Nor medlar fruit delicious in decay. Afflictions great! yet greater still remains. My galligaskins, that have long withstood The winter's fury and encroaching frosts, By time subdued (what will not time subdue!) An horrid chasm disclosed with orifice Wide, discontinuous; at which the winds Eurus and Auster, and the dreadful force Of Boreas, that congeals the Cronian waves, Tumultuous enter with dire chilling blasts, Portending agues. Thus, a well-fraught ship, Long sailed secure, or through th' Ægean deep, Or the Ionian, till, cruising near

The Lilybean shore, with hideous crush
On Scylla or Charybdis, dangerous rocks,
She strikes rebounding; whence the shattered oak,
So fierce a shock unable to withstand,
Admits the sea; in at the gaping side
The crowding waves gush with impetuous rage,
Resistless, overwhelming; horrors seize
The mariners; death in their eyes appears;
They stare, they lave, they pump, they swear, they pray.
Vain efforts! still the battering waves rush in,
Implacable; till, deluged by the foam,
The ship sinks foundering in the vast abyss.

Ynniper's Magpie and the Town-hall were Oxford alchouse. Mundangus, for tobacco, is from Span. mondongo, tripe, panch. Cestrian is a Latinised adjective for 'of Chester' or of Cheshin; Arvonia is Carnarvon; Maridanum, Carmarthen; Breckinock; Vaga, the Wye; Ariconium is Kenchester (possible, Ross); Massic, Setinian, and Falernian were old wines of Italy, beloved of the Romans. Arachue is the spider; John-apple, apple-john, is a variety best for use when long preserved and shrivelled. Cronian, from Kronos, Saturn, means simply Artic; Lilybeau, from the promontory of Lilybeau at the western end of Sicily, is here used for Sicilian at large.

Eustace Budgell (1686-1737) was a cousin of Addison, and from Trinity College, Oxford, entered the Temple. He accompanied Addison to Ireland as clerk, and afterwards rose to be Under-Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant and a member of the Irish Parliament. Thirty-seven numbers of the Spectator are ascribed to Budgel; Dr Johnson reported them to have been so much 'mended' by Addison as to be almost his own No doubt in style and humour they resemble those of Addison; but it was probable enough that Budgell should have tried his best to imitate In 1717 Budgell, who was vain and Addison. vindictive, quarrelled with the Irish Secretary, and wrote pamphlets on his grievances; the result of which was his dismissal from office and return to England. He lost a fortune in the South See Scheme, in a series of law-suits, and in attempts to gain a seat in the English House of Commons, and subsequently figured principally as a pamphleteer writer for the Craftsman and Grub Street hack, being at times 'disordered in his senses' His declining reputation suffered a mortal blow by a charge of having forged a testament in his own favour. By the will of Dr Matthew Tinds, the deist, it appeared (1733) that a legacy of £2000 had been left to Budgell. The will was set aside and the unhappy author disgraced. To this Pope alludes in the couplet:

Let Budgell charge low Grub Street on my quill, And write whate'er he please—except my will.

In May 1737 this wretched man, involved in debts and difficulties, and dreading an execution in his house, committed suicide by leaping from a boat while shooting London Bridge. On his desk was found a slip of paper, on which he had written:

What Cato did, and Addison approved, Cannot be wrong.

In this he misrepresented Addison, who made the dying Cato say:

et methinks a beam of light breaks in arting soul. Alas! I fear oo hasty. O ye powers that search of man, and weigh his inmost thoughts, one amiss, impute it not.

ay err, but you are good.

he Art of Growing Rich.

d most infallible method towards the s end is thrift; all men are not equally etting money, but it is in the power of to practise this virtue; and I believe few persons who, if they please to reflect res, will not find, that had they saved all is which they have spent unnecessarily, present have been masters of a compe-Diligence justly claims the next place to oth these excellently well recommended in the three following Italian proverbs: by proxy which you can do yourself;' hat until to-morrow which you can do r neglect small matters and expenses.' rument in growing rich is method in , as well as the two former, is also rsons of the meanest capacities.

De Witt, one of the greatest statesmen which he lived, being asked by a friend ole to despatch that multitude of affairs is engaged, replied, That his whole art ing one thing at once. If, says he, I ssary despatches to make, I think of atil those are finished; if any domestic ny attention, I give myself up wholly to are set in order.

often see men of dull and phlegmatick g to great estates, by making a regular sposition of their business; and that, greatest parts and most lively imaginazle their affairs than bring them to an rom what has been said, I think I may s a maxim, that every man of good may, if he pleases, in his particular most certainly be rich. The reason why see that men of the greatest capacities either because they despise wealth in something else, or at least are not getting an estate unless they may do it, and at the same time enjoy all the ratifications of life.

hese ordinary forms of growing rich, it d that there is room for genius as well other circumstances of life. Though the money were long since very numerous, many new ones have been found out of e is certainly still remaining so large a n, that a man of an indifferent head might and draw up such a plan for the conduct its life as was never yet once thought of.

methods put in practice by hungry and which demonstrate the power of invention ar. It is reported of Scaramouche, the lian comedian, that being in Paris, and the bethought himself of constantly plying of a noted perfumer in that city, and came out who had been buying snuff, desire a taste of them: when he had by this means got together a quantity made up of several different sorts, he sold it again at a lower rate to the same perfumer, who, finding out the trick, called it tabac de mille fleurs, or snuff of a thousand flowers. The story further tells us, that by this means he got a very comfortable subsistence, until, making too much haste to grow rich, he one day took such an unreasonable pinch out of the box of a Swiss officer as engaged him in a quarrel, and obliged him to quit this ingenious way of life. Nor can I in this place omit doing justice to a youth of my own country, who, though he is scarce yet twelve years old, has, with great industry and application, attained to the art of beating the Grenadiers' March on his chin. I am credibly informed, that by this means he does not only maintain himself and his mother, but that he is laying up money every day, with a design, if the war continues, to purchase a drum at least, if not a pair of colours.

I shall conclude these instances with the device of the famous Rabelais, when he was at a great distance from Paris, and without money to bear his expenses thither. This ingenious author being thus sharp set, got together a convenient quantity of brick-dust, and having disposed of it into several papers, writ upon one, 'Poyson for Monsieur;' upon a second, 'Poyson for the Dauphin;' and on a third, 'Poyson for the King.' Having made this provision for the royal family of France, he laid his papers so that his landlord, who was an inquisitive man and a good subject, might get a sight of them. The plot succeeded as he desired; the host gave immediate intelligence to the secretary of state. The secretary presently sent down a special messenger, who brought up the traitor to court, and provided him at the king's expense with proper accommodations on the road. As soon as he appeared, he was known to be the celebrated Rabelais; and his powder upon examination being found very innocent, the jest was only laught at; for which a less eminent droll would have been sent to the galleys.

Trade and commerce might doubtless be still varied a thousand ways, out of which would arise such branches as have not yet been touched. The famous Doily is still fresh in every one's memory, who raised a fortune by finding out materials for such stuffs as might at once be cheap and genteel. I have heard it affirmed, that, had not he discovered this frugal method of gratifying our pride, we should hardly have been able to carry on the last war. I regard trade not only as highly advantagious to the commonwealth in general, but as the most natural and likely method of making a man's fortune, having observed, since my being a Spectator in the world, greater estates got about 'Change than at Whitehall or St James's. I believe I may also add, that the first acquisitions are generally attended with more satisfaction, and as good a conscience.

I must not, however, close this essay without observing, that what has been said is only intended for persons in the common ways of thriving, and is not designed for those men who, from low beginnings, push themselves up to the top of states and the most considerable figures in life. My maxim of saving is not designed for such as these, since nothing is more usual than for thrift to disappoint the ends of ambition; it being almost impossible that the mind should be intent upon trifles while it is, at the same time, forming some great design.

(From The Spectator, No. 283.)

The story about Rabelais is quite apocryphal, though it was long current; the Scaramouch (scaramsuccia, skirmish) was not a person, but a character in the old Italian comedy, who was drubbed by the harlequin; Doily's achievements are noted under Gay, at page 175.

The Earl of Halifax (1661-1715) was, under his own name of Charles Montagu, famous as a wit in the days of Charles II., but survived to be the patron of Congreve, Addison, Steele, Rowe, and Tickell. Grandson of the parliamentary Earl of Manchester, he was born at Horton, Northamptonshire, and passed from Westminster to Trinity His most notable poetical College, Cambridge. achievement was his share in the parody on Dryden's Hind and Panther, called The Town and Country Mouse (1687), of which he was jointauthor with Matthew Prior. His career in Parliament as financier and Chancellor of the Exchequer is beyond the scope of these pages, where he is commemorated rather as a patron of literature than as a poet. In 1697 he became Premier, but his arrogance and vanity soon made him unpopular, and on the Tories coming into power in 1699 he was obliged to accept the auditorship of the Exchequer and withdraw from the Commons as Baron Halifax. He strongly supported the union with Scotland and the Hanoverian succession; and on George I.'s arrival became an earl and Prime-Minister.

Edward Cave (1691-1754), an enterprising and far-sighted editor, deserves mention here as the original 'Sylvanus Urban.' He was born at Newton near Rugby, where he received some schooling; and after many vicissitudes he became apprentice to a printer. Obtaining money enough to set up a small printing-office, in 1731 he started the Gentleman's Magazine, for which Samuel Johnson became parliamentary reporter in 1740; and amidst his endless periodicals and other undertakings, Cave published Johnson's Rambler, his Irene, London, and Life of Savage. He died with his hand in Johnson's.

Lord Lansdowne (1667-1735), made a peer by Queen Anne, and imprisoned for a year and a half after the Hanoverian succession, was born at Hornby the son of a Yorkshire squire. As George Granville (or Grenville) he wrote many poems to 'Myra' (or 'Mira;' the Countess of Newburgh), and produced a comedy, a tragedy, an adaptation of the Merchant of Venice, a masque, and an opera—none of any permanent interest. He went into Parliament and public life in 1702. Waller, whom he imitated, commended him; and Pope commemorated 'Granville the polite' among his pretty numerous patrons.

John Oldmixon (1673-1742), one of the heroes of the Dunciad, was of an old Somersetshire family. He began to publish poems at twenty-two, but was better known as a pamphleteer and the author of dull partisan histories of the British Empire in America, and of England (against Clarendon and for Burnet); as also of 'memoirs' of France, Scotland, and Ireland, designed to 'shew up' the plans of the French, the Stewars, and the 'Papists.' In his Essay on Criticism he attacked Addison, Swift, Pope, and others, and thus and in other ways provoked Pope's antipath.

Thomas Hearne (1678-1735), 'who studied and preserved Antiquities,' was born at White Waltham in Berkshire, studied at St Edmund Hal, Oxford, and in 1712 became second keeper d the Bodleian Library—a post he had to resign a a Jacobite in 1716, though he continued to live # Oxford till his death. He compiled and edited forty-one works, full of laborious learning but poor in style. Among them were Reliquie Bodleianæ, Leland's Itinerary and Collecten, Curious Discourses upon English Antiquitie; and the editions of Camden's Annals, William of Newburgh, Fordun's Scotichronicon, Robert & Gloucester's Chronicle, and that of Peter Langual. The Bibliotheca Hearniana was published in 1848; the Reliquiæ Hearnianæ in 1857. His autobiography is to be found in the Lives of Leland, Hearne, and Wood (1772). His Collectiors were edited for the Oxford Historical Society (vols. i-ii. by Doble, 1885-89; vols. iv.-v. by Rannie, 1902).

Thomas Carte (1686-1754) was born # Clifton-upon-Dunsmore vicarage, near Rugh, and educated at University College, Oxford After taking orders, he was appointed reader at the Abbey Church, Bath; nevertheless in 174 he resigned rather than take the oaths to the Hanoverian Government. In 1722 he was suspected of complicity in the conspiracy of Atterbury, whose secretary he was, and £1000 was offered for his apprehension; but he escaped to France, where he remained till 1728. After is return he published a Life of James, Dukt Ormande (2 vols. 1736), and a History of England to 1654 (4 vols. 1747-55), whose prospects were blighted by an unlucky note ascribing to the Pretender the gift of touching for the king's evil. Subscribers withdrew their names, and the historian was 'left forlorn and abandoned amid his extensive collections.' His style was not attractive, but Carte's laborious history was a rel triumph of research, and greatly above the level of any work that had yet appeared in England Till now the most considerable had been the (partisan Whig) Compleat History, finally issued in 1706 by White Kennett; Echard's (1707); and the clear, methodical, and comparatively impartial English history by Paul Rapin de Thoyras, a French Protestant who had come to England with William III. and had fought at the Boyne and at Limerick. It was at the Hague and at Wesel that Rapin wrote his eight-volume Histoire d'Angleterre (1724), which was soon translated (1726-31) and became the standard work even in England. Against it Carte justly complained that Rapin had no knowledge of documents save those in Rymer's Fædera, and had never looked at the luable materials in the rolls of Parliament, e Cottonian MSS., and other available sources, arte really did make an attempt to utilise e documents at his command; and though s work failed, it proved invaluable to many coessors.

William Stukeley (1687 1765), called the arch-Druid,' was born at Holbeach; studied at orpus, Cambridge; and practised as a doctor at oston, London, and Grantham. In 1729 he took ders, and in 1747 became a London rector. is twenty works (1720-26), dealing with Stoneinge, Avebury, and antiquities generally, enshrine uch that is credulous as well as curious. His viery and Correspondence was published by the urtees Society in 1884-87.

Benjamin Moadly (1676-1761), successively ishop of Bangor, Hereford, Salisbury, and Wintester, was a prelate of great controversial ability, ho threw the weight of his talents into the ale of Whig politics when fiercely attacked by ories and Jacobites. Born at Westerham in Kent, 1 1697 he was elected a Fellow of Catharine Hail, lambridge. In 1706, while rector of St Peter-le-'oor, London, he attacked a sermon by Atterbury, and thus incurred the enmity and ridicule of Swift and Pope. He defended the Revolution of 1688, and attacked the doctrines of divine right and passive obedience with such vigour and perseretance that, in 1709, the House of Commons recommended him to the favour of the queen. Her successor, George I., elevated him in 1715 to the see of Bangor. Shortly after his elevation to the Bench Hoadly published a work against the Nonjurors, and a sermon preached before the king at St James's, on the 'Nature of the Kingdom or Church of Christ,' from the text, 'My kingdom is not of this world.' The latter excited a long and vehement dispute, known by the name of the Bangorian Controversy, in which an endless series of tracts was published. The Lower House of Convocation censured Hoadly's views, as calculated to subvert the government and discipline of the Church, and to impugn and impeach the royal supremacy in matters ecclesiastical. The controversy was conducted with unbecoming vioence, and several bishops and other grave tymes Sherlock among the number-forgot the ligalty of their station and the spirit of Christian harity in the heat of party warfare. Pope alludes arcastically to Hoadly's sermon in the Dunciad:

Toland and Tindal, prompt at priests to jeer, Yet silent bowed to Christ's no kingdom here.

et Hallam held that there was 'nothing whatever Hoadly's sermon injurious to the established downents and privileges, nor to the discipline d government of the English Church, even in 20ry. If this had been the case, he might we been reproached with some inconsistency in coming so large a partaker of her honours and toluments. He even admitted the usefulness of censures for open immoralities, though denying all Church authority to oblige any one to external communion, or to pass any sentence which should determine the condition of men with respect to the favour or displeasure of God. Another great question in this controversy was that of religious liberty as a civil right, which the Convocation explicitly denied. And another related to the much-debated exercise of private judgment in religion, which, as one party meant virtually to take away, so the other perhaps unreasonably exaggerated. Hoadly was author of several other works, as on the reasonableness of conformity and on the sacrament. The following is from the famous sermon on John xviii. 36:

The Kingdom of Christ not of this World,

If, therefore, the church of Christ be the kingdom of Christ, it is essential to it that Christ himself be the sole lawgiver and sole judge of his subjects, in all points relating to the favour or displeasure of Almighty God; and that all his subjects, in what station soever they may be, are equally subjects to him; and that no one of them, any more than another, bath authority either to make new laws for Christ's subjects, or to impose a sense upon the old ones, which is the same thing; or to judge, censure, or punish the servants of another master, in matters relating purely to conscience or salvation. If any person hath any other notion, either through a long use of words with inconsistent meanings, or through a negligence of thought, let him but ask himself whether the church of Christ be the kingdom of Christ or not; and if it be, whether this notion of it doth not absolutely exclude all other legislators and judges in matters relating to conscience or the favour of God, or whether it can be his kingdom if any mortal men have such a power of legislation and judgment in it. This inquiry will bring us back to the first, which is the only true account of the church of Christ, or the kingdom of Christ, in the mouth of a Christian; that it is the number of men, whether small or great, whether dispersed or united, who truly and sincerely are subjects to Jesus Christ alone as their lawgiver and judge in matters relating to the favour of God and their eternal salvation.

The next principal point is, that, if the church be the kingdom of Christ, and this 'kingdom be not of this world, this must appear from the nature and end of the laws of Christ, and of those rewards and punishments which are the sanctions of his laws. Now, his laws are declarations relating to the favour of God in another state after this. They are declarations of those conditions to be performed in this world on our part, without which God will not make us happy in that to come. And they are almost all general appeals to the will of that God; to his nature, known by the common reason of mankind, and to the imitation of that nature, which must be our perfection. The keeping his commandments is declared the way to life, and the doing his will the entrance into the kingdom of heaven. The being subjects to Christ is to this very end, that we may the better and more effectually perform the will of God. The laws of this kingdom, therefore, as Christ left them, have nothing of this world in their view; no tendency either to the exaltation of some in worldly pomp and dignity, or to their absolute dominion over the faith and religious conduct of others of his subjects, or to the erecting of any sort of temporal kingdom under the covert and name of a spiritual one.

The sanctions of Christ's law are rewards and punishments. But of what sort? Not the rewards of this world; not the offices or glories of this state; not the pains of prisons, banishments, fines, or any lesser and more moderate penalties; nay, not the much lesser and negative discouragements that belong to human society. He was far from thinking that these could be the instruments of such a persuasion as he thought acceptable to God. But as the great end of his kingdom was to guide men to happiness after the short images of it were over here below, so he took his motives from that place where his kingdom first began, and where it was at last to end; from those rewards and punishments in a future state, which had no relation to this world; and to shew that his 'kingdom was not of this world,' all the sanctions which he thought fit to give to his laws were not of this world at all.

St Paul understood this so well, that he gives an account of his own conduct, and that of others in the same station, in these words: 'Knowing the terrors of the Lord, we persuade men:' whereas, in too many Christian countries since his days, if some who profess to succeed him were to give an account of their own conduct, it must be in a quite contrary strain: 'Knowing the terrors of this world, and having them in our power, we do not persuade men, but force their outward profession against their inward persuasion.'

Now, wherever this is practised, whether in a great degree or a small, in that place there is so far a change from a kingdom which is not of this world, to a kingdom which is of this world. As soon as ever you hear of any of the engines of this world, whether of the greater or the lesser sort, you must immediately think that then, and so far, the kingdom of this world takes place. For, if the very essence of God's worship be spirit and truth, if religion be virtue and charity, under the belief of a Supreme Governour and Judge, if true real faith cannot be the effect of force, and if there can be no reward where there is no willing choice-then, in all or any of these cases, to apply force or flattery, worldly pleasure or pain, is to act contrary to the interests of true religion, as it is plainly opposite to the maxims upon which Christ founded his kingdom; who chose the motives which are not of this world, to support a kingdom which is not of this world. And indeed it is too visible to be hid, that wherever the rewards and punishments are changed from future to present, from the world to come to the world now in possession, there the kingdom founded by our Saviour is in the nature of it so far changed that it is become in such a degree what he professed his kingdom was not, that is, of this world; of the same sort with other common earthly kingdoms, in which the rewards are worldly honours, posts, offices, pomp, attendance, dominion; and the punishments are prisons, fines, banishments, galleys and racks, or something less of the same sort.

See the Life in the edition of his works by Hoadly's son (3 vols. folio, 1773).

Daniel Waterland (1683-1740), born at Waseley rectory, Lincolnshire, was elected in 1704 a Fellow of Magdalen College, Cambridge, and in 1730 became Archdeacon of Middlesex and vicar of Twickenham. He was a controversial theologian of great ability and acuteness, and as champion of Trinitarian orthodoxy vindicated the doctrines of the Church of England from Arian and desir assailants. His several publications on the Trinity constitute a valuable series of treatises. A complete edition of his works, with a Life of the author by Bishop Van Mildert, was published at Oxford, in eleven volumes, in 1823.

Conyers Middleton (1683-1750), rector of Hascombe in Surrey, was very eminent as a controversialist; and even Parr, who proved that his famous and eulogistic Life of Cicero (1741) was largely plagiarised from William Bellenden, a Scottish seventeenth century author, held that is a writer of English Middleton was, excelled by Addison alone. It is long since he ceased to hold this proud eminence; but he was a very conspicuous personage in his lifetime. A native of Richmond in Yorkshire, Fellow and librarian of the University of Cambridge, he was early engaged in a personal feud with Bentley, and ultimately had to apologise for libel. A Letter from Rome shewing an exact conformity between Popery and Paganism (1729) was ostensibly an attack on Catholic ritual, but raised grievous suspicions of the writer's soundness in the Christian faith. In a controversy with Waterland he professed to be answering the deists, but gave up the literal accuracy of Scripture and was by many regarded as little better than a dangerous freethinker. An Introductory Discourse and a Free Inquiry (1747-49) denied the credibility of all miracles later than the first age of the Church, but was by most thought to cast doubt on all miracles. In the Life of Cicero, admiration of the rounded style and flowing periods of the Roman orator seems to have produced in his biographer a desire to attain to similar excellence; certainly few contemporaries wrote English with the same careful finish and sustained dignity. A few sentences from his panegyrical summary of Cicero's character will exemplify his style:

He [Cicero] made a just distinction between bearing what we cannot help, and approving what we ought to condemn; and submitted, therefore, yet never consented to those usurpations; and when he was forced to comply with them, did it always with a reluctance that he expresses very keenly in his letters to his friends. But whenever that force was removed, and he was at liberty to pursue his principles and act without controll, as in his consulship, in his province, and after Cæsar's death (the only periods of his life in which he was truly master of himself), there we see him shining out in his genuine character of an excellent citizen, a great magistrate, a glorious patriot; there we see the man who could declare of himself with truth, in an appeal to Atticus as to the best witness of his conscience, that he had always done the greatest services to his country when it was in his power; or when it was not, had never harboured a thought of it but what was divine. If we must needs compare him, therefore, with Cato, as some writers affect to do, it is certain that if Cato's irtue seem more splendid in theory, Cicero's will be ound superior in practice; the one was romantic, the ther was natural; the one drawn from the refinements of the schools, the other from nature and social life; he one always unsuccessful, often hurtful; the other ulways beneficial, often salutary to the republic.

To conclude: Cicero's death, though violent, cannot be called untimely, but was the proper end of such a ife; which must also have been rendered less glorious f it had owed its preservation to Antony. It was, thereore, not only what he expected, but, in the circumtances to which he was reduced, what he seems even o have wished. For he, who before had been timid in langers and desponding in distress, yet, from the time If Cæsar's death, roused by the desperate state of the epublic, assumed the fortitude of a hero, discarded all ar, despised all danger, and when he could not free his ountry from a tyranny, provoked the tyrants to take at life which he no longer cared to preserve. Thus, ke a great actor on the stage, he reserved himself, as were, for the last act; and after he had played his art with dignity, resolved to finish it with glory.

The Bellenden with whose heifer Middleton ploughed was not hn Bellenden (Vol. I. p. 215) but William Bellenden, sometime ofessor at Paris, who wrote in Latin more than one work on cero, the last giving Cicero's history in Cicero's own words, and d about 1633. Middleton thus found not merely his plan ready ide, but his materials collected.

Nathaniel Lardner (1684-1768), an English onconformist divine who ultimately became a nitarian, was born and died at Hawkhurst in ent. He wrote a number of theological works, cluding The Credibility of the Gospel History vols. 1727 and 12 vols. 1733-55), long a notable art of English apologetics, and a large collector of Jewish and Heathen Testimonies to the ruth of Christianity (1764-67).

William Law (1686-1761) was a great writer English, a consummate controversialist, and a owerful and permanent spiritual influence. Born grocer's son at Kingscliffe, Northamptonshire, entered Emmanuel College, Cambridge, and ecame a Fellow in 1711. He was unable to subribe the oath of allegiance to George I., and rfeited his fellowship. About 1727 he became itor to the father of Edward Gibbon, and for ten ears was 'the much-honoured friend and spiritual rector of the whole family.' The elder Gibbon ied in 1737, and three years later Law retired to ingscliffe, where he was joined by his disciples, liss Hester Gibbon, sister of his pupil, and Irs Hutcheson-ladies whose united income of pout £3000 a year was mostly spent in works f charity. About 1733 Law had begun to study acob Boehme, and most of his later books are epositions of Boehme's mysticism or adaptations f it. Law won his first triumphs against Bishop loadly in the famous Bangorian Controversy ith his Three Letters (1717). His Remarks n Mandeville's Fable of the Bees (1723) is a nasterpiece of caustic wit and vigorous English. only less admirable is the Case of Reason 1732), in answer to Tindal the deist. eld that Locke's philosophy led to freethinking, and regarded Warburton's defence of Christianity as worse than useless. His most famous work remains the Serious Call to a Devout and Holy Life (1729), written before the 'mystical period, which profoundly influenced Dr Johnson and the Wesleys, as well as the early evangelicals such as Venn, Scott, and Newton. His position, theologically and otherwise, was somewhat isolated, and was puzzling even to the more spiritual tempers in an unspiritual age. He was a High Churchman but an 'enthusiast'-characters not then thought compatible; his asceticism seemed to smack of Puritanism; his later mysticism alienated the Wesleys, and as a Churchman he was a controversial anti-Methodist. But his character and his writings produced marked effects on English intellectual life. His thought and his style were equally vigorous; his reasoning logical and keen; his expression lucid, brilliant, and often highly humorous; and, like most of his contemporaries, he had no dislike to forms of argument that would now be accounted too personal, as in the following extract from his attack

On Mandeville's 'Fable of the Bees.'

Sir, I have read your several compositions in favour of the vices and corruptions of mankind, and hope I need make no apology for presuming to offer a word or two on the side of virtue and religion. I shall spend no time in preface or general reflections, but proceed directly to the examination of such passages as expose moral virtue as a fraud and imposition, and render all pretences to it as odious and contemptible. Though I direct myself to you, I hope it will be no offence if I sometimes speak as if I was speaking to a Christian, or show some ways of thinking that may be owing to that kind of worship which is professed amongst us. Ways of thinking derived from revealed religion are much more suitable to our low capacities than any arrogant pretences to be wise by our own light. Moral virtue, however disregarded in practice, has hitherto had a speculative esteem amongst men; her praises have been celebrated by authors of all kinds, as the confessed beauty, ornament, and perfection of human nature. On the contrary, immorality has been looked upon as the greatest reproach and torment of mankind; no satyr has been thought severe enough upon its natural baseness and deformity, nor any wit able to express the evils it occasions in private life and public societies. Your goodness would not suffer you to see this part of Christendom deluded with such false notions of I know not what excellence in virtue or evil in vice, but obliged you immediately to compose a system (as you call it) wherein you do these three things. 1st. You consider man merely as an animal, having, like other animals, nothing to do but to follow his appetites. 2dly. You consider man as cheated and flattered out of his natural state by the craft of moralists, and pretend to be very sure that the 'moral virtues are the political offspring which flattery begot upon pride.' So that man and morality are here both destroyed together; man is declared to be only an animal, and morality an imposture. According to this doctrine, to say that a man is dishonest is making him just such a criminal as a horse that does not dance. But this is not all, for you dare further affirm in praise of immorality, 'that evil, as well moral as natural, is the solid basis, the life and support of all trades and employments without exception; that there we must look for the true origin of all arts and sciences; and that the moment evil ceases, the society must be spoiled, if not dissolved.' These are the principal doctrines which with more than fanatic zeal you recommend to your readers; and if lewd stories, profane observations, loose jests, and haughty assertions might pass for arguments, few people would be able to dispute with you.

I shall begin with your definition of man. my part, say you, without any compliment to the courteous reader or myself, I believe man (besides skin, flesh, bones, &c. that are obvious to the eye) to be a compound of various passions, that all of them as they are provoked and come uppermost, govern him by turns whether he will or no.' Surely this definition is too general, because it seems to suit a wolf or a bear as exactly as your self or a Grecian philosopher. You say 'you believe man to be,' &c.; now I cannot understand to what part of you this believing faculty is to be ascribed; for your definition of man makes him incapable of believing anything, unless believing can be said to be a passion, or some faculty of skin or bones. But supposing such a belief as yours, because of its blindness, might justly be called a passion, yet surely there are greater things conceived by some men than can be ascribed to mere passions, or skin and flesh, That reach of thought and strong penetration which has carried Sir Isaac Newton through such regions of science must truly be owing to some higher principle. Or will you say that all his demonstrations are only so many blind sallies of passion? If man had nothing but instincts and passions, he could not dispute about them; for to dispute is no more an instinct or a passion than it is a leg or an arm. If therefore you would prove vourself to be no more than a brute or an animal, how much of your life you need alter I cannot tell, but you must at least forbear writing against virtue, for no mere animal ever hated it. But however, since you desire to be thought only skin and flesh, and a compound of passions, I will forget your better part, as much as you have done, and consider you in your own way. You tell us, 'that the moral virtues are the political offspring, which flattery begot upon pride.' You therefore, who are an advocate for moral vices, should by the rule of contraries be supposed to be acted by humility; but that being (as I think) not of the number of the passions, you have no claim to be guided by it. The prevailing passions, which you say have the sole government of man in their turns, are pride, shame, fear, lust, and anger; you have appropriated the moral virtues to pride, so that your own conduct must be ascribed either to fear, shame, anger, or lust, or else to a beautiful union and concurrence of them all. I doubt not but you are already angry that I consider you only as an animal that acts as anger, or lust, or any other passion moves it, although it is your own assertion that you are no better. But to proceed, "Sagacious moralists, say you, draw men like angels, in hopes that the pride at least of some will put them upon copying after the beautiful originals which they are represented to be. I am loth to charge you with sagacity, because I would not accuse you falsely; but if this remark is well made, I can help you to another full as just; viz. 'that sagacious advocates for immorality draw men like brutes, in hopes that the depravity at least of some will put them upon copying after the base originals, which they are represented to be.' The province you have chose for yourself is to deliver man from the asgarty of moralists, the encroachments of virtue, and to replace him in the rights and privileges of brutality; to read him from the giddy heights of rational dignity and angele likeness to go to grass or wallow in the mire. Had the excellence of man's nature been only a false insinuation of crafty politicians, the very falseness of the thing had made some men at peace with it; but his doctrine coming from heaven, its being a principle of religion and a foundation of solid virtue, has roused up all this zeal against it.

There are two collected editions of Law's works—that of 1763 and that by Moreton (1893 et seq.). See Walton's Materials for a Complete Biography (1848), Overton's William Law, Nonpres and Mystic (1881), and Dr A. Whyte's Characters of William Law(1891)

Thomas Parnell (1679-1718), one of a billiant circle of wits, was born and educated in Dublin, his father, a native of Congleton in Cheshire, having estates in Ireland. He took holy orders in 1700, and in 1706 was appointed Arddeacon of Clogher, to which office was afterwards added, through the influence of Swift, the vicange of Finglass, estimated by Goldsmith (extravagantly) at £400 a year. Parnell, like Swift, disliked leland, and seems to have considered his situation there a cheerless and irksome banishment; but as permanent residence at their livings was not the required from the Irish clergy, he lived for the most part in London. He little guessed that by-and-by the fame of Parnell the poet would be obscured by that of his brother's descendant, Parnell the uncrowned king of Ireland, and that Parnellite and anti-Parnellite would be watchwords not in poety but politics. His grief for the loss of his young wife (five years after their marriage in 1706) projet upon his spirits which had always been unequaland drove him into intemperance, though he was an accomplished scholar and a delightful companion He died at Chester on his way back to Ireland, and there was buried. His Life was written by Goldsmith, who was proud of his distinguished countryman, and reputed him the last of the great school that had modelled itself upon the ancients Parnell's works are miscellaneous in charactertranslations, songs, hymns, epistles, eclogue, tales in verse, and various kinds of occasional poems. The Bookworm is a satirical joke; Chlors appearing in a Looking-glass is a trifle. In the song quoted below there is more of Irish vivac'ny than of eighteent century didacticism, and we seem to hear a conrade of Tommy Moore sin 'ging. But Parnell's best known piece is The Her.' The Hermit.

unknown to public view, age a reverend Hermit grew; bed, the cave his humble cell, ruits, his drink the crystal well; men, with God he passed the days, business, all his pleasure praise. :red, such serene repose, n itself, till one suggestion rose; ıld triumph, virtue vice obey. ome doubt of Providence's sway; more a certain prospect boast, nor of his soul is lost. ooth expanse receives imprest image on its watery breast, e banks, the trees depending grow, eath with answering colours glow;

But if a stone the gentle sea divide,
Swift ruffling circles curl on every side,
And glimmering fragments of a broken sun,
Banks, trees, and skies, in thick disorder run.
To clear this doubt, to know the world by sight,
To find if books, or swains, report it right
(For yet by swains alone the world he knew,
Whose feet came wandering o'er the nightly dew),
He quits his cell; the pilgrim-staff he bore,
And fixed the scallop in his hat before;
Then, with the rising sun, a journey went,
Sedate to think, and watching each event.

The morn was wasted in the pathless grass, And long and lonesome was the wild to pass; But when the southern sun had warmed the day, A youth came posting o'er a crossing way; His raiment decent, his complexion fair, And soft in graceful ringlets waved his hair; Then near approaching, 'Father, hail!' he cried, 'And hail, my son!' the reverend sire replied. Words followed words, from question answer flowed, And talk of various kind deceived the road; Till each with other pleased, and loth to part, While in their age they differ, join in heart. Thus stands an aged elm in ivy bound, Thus youthful ivy clasps an elm around.

Now sunk the sun; the closing hour of day Came onward, mantled o'er with sober gray; Nature in silence bid the world repose, When near the road a stately palace rose. There by the moon through ranks of trees they pass, Whose verdure crowned their sloping sides of grass. It chanced the noble master of the dome Still made his house the wandering stranger's home; Yet still the kindness, from a thirst of praise, Proved the vain flourish of expensive ease. The pair arrive; the liveried servants wait; Their lord receives them at the pompous gate; The table groans with costly piles of food, And all is more than hospitably good. Then led to rest, the day's long toil they drown, Deep sunk in sleep, and silk, and heaps of down. At length 'tis morn, and, at the dawn of day, Along the wide canals the zephyrs play; Fresh o'er the gay parterres the breezes creep, And shake the neighbouring wood to banish sleep. Up rise the guests, obedient to the call, An early banquet decked the splendid hall; Rich luscious wine a golden goblet graced, Which the kind master forced the guests to taste. Then, pleased and thankful, from the porch they go; And, but the landlord, none had cause of woe; His cup was vanished; for in secret guise, The younger guest purloined the glittering prize.

As one who spies a serpent in his way,
Glistening and basking in the summer ray,
Disordered stops to shun the danger near,
Then walks with faintness on, and looks with fear;
So seemed the sire, when, far upon the road,
The shining spoil his wily partner shewed.
He stopped with silence, walked with trembling heart,
And much he wished, but durst not ask to part;
Murmuring he lifts his eyes, and thinks it hard
That generous actions meet a base reward.
While thus they pass, the sun his glory shrouds,
The changing skies hang out their sable clouds;

A sound in air presaged approaching rain, And beasts to covert scud across the plain. Warned by the signs, the wandering pair retreat To seek for shelter at a neighbouring seat. Twas built with turrets, on a rising ground, And strong, and large, and unimproved around; Its owner's temper, timorous and severe, Unkind and griping, caused a desert there. As near the miser's heavy doors they drew, Fierce rising gusts with sudden fury blew; The nimble lightning, mixed with showers, began, And o'er their heads loud rolling thunder ran; Here long they knock, but knock or call in vain, Driven by the wind, and battered by the rain. At length some pity warmed the master's breast ('Twas then his threshold first received a guest), Slow creaking turns the door with jealous care, And half he welcomes in the shivering pair; One frugal faggot lights the naked walls, And Nature's fervour through their limbs recalls; Bread of the coarsest sort, with eager wine, Each hardly granted, served them both to dine; And when the tempest first appeared to cease, A ready warning bid them part in peace. With still remark, the pondering hermit viewed, In one so rich, a life so poor and rude; And why should such, within himself he cried, Lock the lost wealth a thousand want beside? But what new marks of wonder soon take place In every settling feature of his face, When, from his vest, the young companion bore That cup the generous landlord owned before, And paid profusely with the precious bowl, The stinted kindness of this churlish soul!

But now the clouds in airy tumult fly; The sun emerging opes an azure sky; A fresher green the smelling leaves display, And, glittering as they tremble, cheer the day: The weather courts them from their poor retreat, And the glad master bolts the weary gate. While hence they walk, the pilgrim's bosom wrought With all the travail of uncertain thought: His partner's acts without their cause appear; Twas there a vice, and seemed a madness here: Detesting that, and pitying this, he goes, Lost and confounded with the various shows. Now night's dim shades again involve the sky; Again the wanderers want a place to lie; Again they search, and find a lodging nigh. The soil improved around, the mansion neat, And neither poorly low, nor idly great; It seemed to speak its master's turn of mind, Content, and not for praise, but virtue, kind. Hither the walkers turn their weary feet, Then bless the mansion, and the master greet. Their greeting fair, bestowed with modest guise, The courteous master hears, and thus replies:

'Without a vain, without a grudging heart,
To him who gives us all, I yield a part;
From him you come, for him accept it here,
A frank and sober, more than costly cheer!'
He spoke, and bid the welcome table spread,
Then talked of virtue till the time of bed;
When the grave household round his hall repair,
Warned by a bell, and close the hour with prayer.
At length the world, renewed by calm repose,

Was strong for toil, the dappled morn arose. Before the pilgrims part, the younger crept Near a closed cradle where an infant slept, And writhed his neck: the landlord's little pride O strange return! grew black, and gasped, and d Horror of horrors! what! his only son! How looked our hermit when the fact was done! Not hell, though hell's black jaws in sunder part And breathe blue fire, could more assault his he Confused, and struck with silence at the deed, He flies, but trembling, fails to fly with speed. His steps the youth pursues: the country lay Perplexed with roads; a servant shewed the way A river crossed the path; the passage o'er Was nice to find; the servant trod before: Long arms of oaks an open bridge supplied, And deep the waves beneath them bending glide. The youth, who seemed to watch a time to sin, Approached the careless guide, and thrust him it Plunging he falls, and rising, lifts his head, Then flashing turns, and sinks among the dead.

While sparkling rage inflames the father's eye He bursts the bands of fear, and madly cries: 'Detested wretch!'-but scarce his speech begu When the strange partner seemed no longer man His youthful face grew more serenely sweet; His robe turned white, and flowed upon his feet Fair rounds of radiant points invest his hair; Celestial odours breathe through purpled air; And wings, whose colours glittered on the day, Wide at his back their gradual plumes display. The form ethereal bursts upon his sight, And moves in all the majesty of light. Though loud at first the pilgrim's passion grew, Sudden he gazed, and wist not what to do; Surprise, in secret chains, his words suspends, And in a calm, his settling temper ends; But silence here the beauteous angel broke-The voice of music ravished as he spoke:

Tickell (1686-1740) was one of hom Addison's friendship shed a t. Born at Bridekirk vicarage near vent up to Queen's College, Oxford, held a fellowship there in 1710-26. iter in the Spectator and Guardian; dison went to Ireland as secretary to land, Tickell accompanied him, and i under him. He published a transfirst book of the Iliad at the same time with Pope. Addison and the Whigs were rumoured to have pronounced it the better version of the two, while the Tories ranged under the banner of Pope; and hence originally came about the famous quarrel between Pope and Addison. Gay told Pope that Steele said Addison had called Tickell's work the best translation that ever was in any language. Pope professed to believe Tickell's translation as really by Addison, designed to eclipse his, and wrote the satire on 'Atticus;' and so sputtered on the feud, which was never quenched. Addison continued his patronage of Tickell; when made Secretary of State in 1717, he appointed his friend Under-Secretary, and further left him the charge of publishing his works. Tickell seems to have held himself at liberty to make occasional alterations in Addison's words; and to his edition —long the standard one—of Addison's collected works he prefixed an elegy on his friendly patron, which was justly reckoned his best poem and one of the best things of the kind. He wrote a number of addresses, epistles, odes, and occasional poems. His ballad of Colin and Lucy was rendered into Latin by Vincent Bourne. Both Gray and Goldsmith pronounced Colin and Lucy one of the best ballads in the language; though Gray thought Tickell 'a poor, short-winded imitator of Addison,' with but three or four notes of his own, sweet but tiresomely repeated. In 1722 Tickell published a poem, chiefly allegorical, entitled Kensington Gardens; but having been in 1724 appointed secretary to the Lords-Justices of Ireland, he seems to have abandoned the Muses. He died at Bath in 1740, and was buried at Glasnevin near Dublin, where he had his home. The memorial tablet in Glasnevin Church records that 'his highest honour was that of having been the friend of Addison.' The elegy and Colin and Lucy would have served to perpetuate his name; even Pope admitted that he was an 'honest man.'

From the Elegy on Addison.

Can I forget the dismal night that gave
My soul's best part for ever to the grave?
How silent did his old companions tread,
By midnight lamps, the mansions of the dead,
Through breathing statues, then unheeded things,
Through rows of warriors, and through walks of kings?
What awe did the slow solemn knell inspire;
The pealing organ, and the pausing choir;
The duties by the lawn-robed prelate paid:
And the last words, that dust to dust conveyed!
While speechless o'er thy closing grave we bend,
Accept these tears, thou dear departed friend.
Oh, gone for ever! take this long adieu;
And sleep in peace next thy loved Montague.
To stream fresh laurals, lat the task be mine.

To strew fresh laurels, let the task be mine, A frequent pilgrim at thy sacred shrine; Mine with true sighs thy absence to bemoan, And grave with faithful epitaphs thy stone. If e'er from me thy loved memorial part, May shame afflict this alienated heart; Of thee forgetful if I form a song,

My lyre be broken, and untuned my tongue, My griefs be doubled from thy image free, And mirth a torment, unchastised by thee!

Oft let me range the gloomy aisles alone,
Sad luxury to vulgar minds unknown,
Along the walls where speaking marbles shew
What worthies form the hallowed mould below;
Proud names, who once the reins of empire held;
In arms who triumphed, or in arts excelled;
Chiefs graced with scars and prodigal of blood;
Stern patriots who for sacred freedom stood;
Just men by whom impartial laws were given;
And saints who taught and led the way to heaven;
Ne'er to these chambers, where the mighty rest,
Since their foundation came a nobler guest;
Nor e'er was to the bowers of bliss conveyed
A fairer spirit or more welcome shade.

In what new region to the just assigned, What new employments please th' unbodied mind? A winged virtue, through th' ethereal sky From world to world unwearied does he fly? Or curious trace the long laborious maze Of heaven's decrees, where wondering angels gaze? Does he delight to hear bold seraphs tell How Michael battled, and the dragon fell; Or, mixed with milder cherubim, to glow In hymns of love, not ill essayed below? Or dost thou warn poor mortals left behind, A task well suited to thy gentle mind? Oh if sometimes thy spotless form descend, To me thy aid, thou guardian genius, lend! When rage misguides me, or when fear alarms, When pain distresses or when pleasure charms, In silent whisperings purer thoughts impart, And turn from ill a frail and feeble heart : Led through the paths thy virtue trod before, Till bliss shall join, nor death can part us more.

That awful form which, so the heavens decree, Must still be loved and still deplored by me, In nightly visions seldom fails to rise, Or, roused by fancy, meets my waking eyes. If business calls or crowded courts invite, Th' unblemished statesman seems to strike my sight; If in the stage I seek to soothe my care, I meet his soul which breathes in Cato there; If pensive to the rural shades I rove, His shape o'ertakes me in the lonely grove; Twas there of just and good he reasoned strong, Cleared some great truth, or raised some serious song: There patient shewed us the wise course to steer, A candid censor, and a friend severe; There taught us how to live, and (oh! too high The price for knowledge) taught us how to die.

Thou hill whose brow the antique structures grace, Reared by bold chiefs of Warwick's noble race, Why, once so loved, whene'er thy bower appears, O'er my dim eyeballs glance the sudden tears? How sweet were once thy prospects fresh and fair, Thy sloping walks, and unpolluted air! How sweet the glooms beneath thy aged trees, Thy noontide shadow, and thy evening breeze! His image thy forsaken bowers restore; Thy walks and airy prospects charm no more; No more the summer in thy glooms allayed, Thy evening breezes, and thy noonday shade. . . .

('To the Earl of Warwick on the Death of Mr Addison.')

Colin and Lucy.

Of Leinster, famed for maidens fair, Bright Lucy was the grace, Nor e'er did Liffey's limpid stream Reflect so sweet a face; Till luckless love and pining care Impaired her rosy hue, Her coral lips and damask cheeks, And eyes of glossy blue.

Oh! have you seen a lily pale
When beating rains descend?
So drooped the slow-consuming maid,
Her life now near its end.
By Lucy warned, of flattering swains
Take heed, ye easy fair!
Of vengeance due to broken vows,
Ye perjured swains, beware.

Three times all in the dead of night A bell was heard to ring,
And shricking, at her window thrice
The raven flapped his wing.
Too well the love-lorn maiden knew
The solemn boding sound,
And thus in dying words bespoke
The virgins weeping round:

'I hear a voice you cannot hear,
Which says I must not stay;
I see a hand you cannot see,
Which beckons me away.
By a false heart and broken vows
In early youth I die.
Was I to blame because his bride
Was thrice as rich as I?

'Ah, Colin! give not her thy vows,
Vows due to me alone;
Nor thou, fond maid! receive his kiss,
Nor think him all thy own.
To-morrow in the church to wed,
Impatient both prepare;
But know, fond maid, and know, false ma
That Lucy will be there.

'Then bear my corpse, my comrades, bear
This bridegroom blithe to meet;
He in his wedding trim so gay,
I in my winding-sheet.'
She spoke, she died, her corse was borne
The bridegroom blithe to meet;
He in his wedding trim so gay,
She in her winding-sheet.

Then what were perjured Colin's thoughts
How were these nuptials kept?
The bridesmen flocked round Lucy dead,
And all the village wept.
Confusion, shame, remorse, despair,
At once his bosom swell;
The damps of death bedewed his brow;
He shook, he groaned, he fell.

From the vain bride, ah, bride no more!
The varying crimson fled,
When stretched before her rival's corse
She saw her husband dead.

John, Earl of Mar—here 'Jocky,' with which Inverlochy is forced into rhyme—was nicknamed 'Bobbing Joan.' The estimates of the loyal leaders have not all been confirmed by history.

The Countess of Winchilsea, who died in 1720 aged about sixty, was regarded by Wordsworth as eminently meritorious in at least one respect. 'It is remarkable,' he says, 'that excepting the Nocturnal Reverie, and a passage or two in the Windsor Forest of Pope, the poetry of the period intervening between the publication of Paradise Lost and the Seasons does not contain a single new image of external nature.' Even if we do not accept this all but universal (and uncomplimentary) negative, a poem so honoured by contrast has a special interest in the history of The Nocturnal Reverie was written by Anne, daughter of Sir William Kingsmill of Kidminton near Southampton, and wife of the second Earl of Winchilsea. She was a friend of Pope and Rowe, and wrote, somewhat in Cowley's manner, one longish poem, The Spleen, which she called 'a Pindarique Ode' (1701; Matthew Green's Hudibrastic verses under that name are better known), and a volume of Miscellany Poems (1713). A line in The Spleen, 'We faint beneath the aromatic pain,' was borrowed by Pope for a familiar passage in his Essay on Man.

A Nocturnal Reverie.

In such a night, when every louder wind Is to its distant cavern safe confined, And only gentle zephyr fans his wings, And lonely Philomel still waking sings; Or from some tree, famed for the owl's delight, She, holloaing clear, directs the wanderer right: In such a night, when passing clouds give place, Or thinly veil the heaven's mysterious face; When in some river overhung with green, The waving moon and trembling leaves are seen; When freshened grass now bears itself upright, And makes cool banks to pleasing rest invite, Whence springs the woodbine, and the bramble rose, And where the sleepy cowslip sheltered grows; Whilst now a paler hue the foxglove takes, Yet checkers still with red the dusky brakes; When scattered glowworms, but in twilight fine, Shew trivial beauties, watch their hour to shine; Whilst Salisbury stands the test of every light, In perfect charms and perfect virtue bright: When odours which declined repelling day, Through temperate air uninterrupted stray; When darkened groves their softest shadows wear, And falling waters we distinctly hear; When through the gloom more venerable shews Some ancient fabrick, awful in repose; While sunburnt hills their swarthy looks conceal, And swelling haycocks thicken up the vale: When the loosed horse now, as his pasture leads, Comes slowly grazing through the adjoining meads, Whose stealing pace and lengthened shade we fear, Till torn-up forage in his teeth we hear; When nibbling sheep at large pursue their food, And unmolested kine rechew the cud; When curlews cry beneath the village walls, And to her straggling brood the partridge calls; Their short-lived jubilee the creatures keep, Which but endures whilst tyrant man does sleep; When a sedate content the spirit feels, And no fierce light disturbs, whilst it reveals; But silent musings urge the mind to seek Something too high for syllables to speak; Till the free soul to a composedness charmed, Finding the elements of rage disarmed, O'er all below a solemn quiet grown, Joys in the inferiour world, and thinks it like her own: In such a night let me abroad remain, Till morning breaks, and all's confused again; Our cares, our toils, our clamours are renewed, Or pleasures, seldom reached, again pursued.

A collected edition of the Countess's works, including an unacted tragedy, Aristomenes, was published in 1713.

Lady Mary Wortley Montagu (1689-1762), united as few men or women have done solid sense and learning to wit, fancy, and lively powers of description; in letter-writing she has very few equals, and scarcely a superior. Horace Walpole may be more witty and sarcastic, and Cowper more unaffectedly natural, tender, and delightful; yet if we consider the variety and novelty of the matters described in Lady Mary's letters, the fund of anecdote and observation they display, and the idiomatic clearness of her style, we shall hesitate to place her below any letter-writer that England has yet produced. She was the eldest daughter of Evelyn Pierrepont, who became next year fifth Earl, and in 1715 Duke, of Kingston, and was brought up at Thoresby, Notts. Even in childhood she showed exceptional gifts, was very carefully educated, and from her youth up was a close student and indefatigable reader. Bishop Burnet encouraged her in her unusually wide course of study, which included Greek philosophy in Latin translations. In 1712 she married - against her father's wishes - Edward Wortley (later Wortley Montagu), and on his being appointed in 1714 a commissioner of the Treasury, she was introduced to the courtly and polished circles. Her personal beauty and the charms of her conversation secured the friendship of Addison, Congreve, Pope, and the In 1716 her husband was appointed literati. ambassador to the Porte, and Lady Mary accompanied him to Constantinople (1717-18), going by way of Vienna, and returning by Tunis, Gence, and Paris. During her journey and her residence in the Levant, she corresponded with her sister the Countess of Mar, Lady Rich, Pope, and other, brilliantly describing and contrasting European and Turkish scenery and manners. Having noted among the villagers in Turkey the results of inoculating for the smallpox, she confidently submitted her own son, at that time four years old, to this protective method, then practically unknown to European medical art; and by her zealous effort afterwards established the practice of inoculation in England and in Europe. In 1718, her husband being recalled from his embassy, she returned to England, and, by Pope's advice, settled at Twickenham. The rival wits did not long continue friends. Pope wrote high-flown panegyrics and half-concealed love-letters to Lady Mary, and she treated them with silence or ridicule. On one occasion he is said to have made a tender and formal declaration, which threw the lady into a immoderate fit of laughter; henceforth the sensitive poet became her implacable enemy. Lady Mary also wrote verses, town eclogues, and epigrams, and Pope confessed that she had too much wit for him. The cool self-possession of the lady of rank and fashion, joined to her sarcastic powers, proved an overmatch for the jealous retired author, tremblingly alive to the shafts of ridicule. In 1739, for reasons unknown, Lady y left England and her husband to travel live abroad. She visited Venice, Florence, ne, and Naples, and settled first at Avignon then at Lovere, on the Lago d'Iseo. Mr stagu having died in 1761, Lady Mary was railed upon by her daughter, the Countess of e, to return to England, but died in the twing year.

Some her objectionable letters, published even in rd Wharnchiffe's and, with corrective notes, Mr Moy Thomas's editions, were assuredly not tten by Lady Mary, but are forgeries presumly by John Cleland, son of Pope's friend Major sland, a clever but notoriously unprincipled Crateur.

Restern Manners and Language

I no longer look upon Theocritus as a romantic writer; he has only given a plain image of the way of life amongst the peasants of his country, who, before oppression had reduced them to want, were, I suppose, all employed as the better sort of them are now. I don't doubt, had he been born a Briton, his Idylliums had been filled with descriptions of thrashing and churning, both which are unknown here, the corn being all trod out by oxen; and butter (I speak it with sorrow) unheard of.

I read over your Homer here with an infinite pleasure, and find several little passages explained that I did not before entirely comprehend the beauty of; many of the customs and much of the dress then in fashion being yet retained, and I don't wonder to find more remains here of an age so distant than is to be found in any other country, the Turks not taking that pains to introduce their own manners as has been generally practised by other nations that imagine themselves more polite. It would be too tedious to you to point out all the passages that relate to present customs. But I can assure you that the princesses and great ladies pass their time at their looms, embroidering veils and robes, surrounded by their maids, which are always very numerous, in the same manner as we find Andromache and Helen described. The description of the belt of Menelaus exactly resembles those that are now worn by the great men, fastened before with broad golden clasps, and embroidered round with rich work. The snowy veil that Helen throws over her face is still fashionable; and I never see half-a-dozen of old pashas (as I do very often), with their reverend beards, sitting basking in the sun but I recollect good king Priam and his counsellors. Their manner of dancing is certainly the same that Diana is sung to have danced on the banks of the Eurotas. The great lady still leads the dance, and is followed by a troop of young girls, who imitate her steps, and if she sings, make up the chorus. The tunes are extremely gay and lively, yet with something in them wonderfully soft. The steps are varied according to the pleasure of her that leads the dance, but always in exact time, and infinitely more agreeable than any of our dances, at least in my opinion. I sometimes make one in the train, but am not skilful enough to lead; these are Grecian dances, the Turkish being very different.

I should have told you, in the first place, that the eastern manners give a great light into many Scripture passages that appear odd to us, their phrases being commonly what we should call Scripture language. The vulgar Turk is very different from what is spoken at court, or amongst the people of figure, who always mix so much Arabic and Persian in their discourse that it may very well be called another language. And 'tis as ridiculous to make use of the expressions commonly used in speaking to a great man or lady, as it would be to speak broad Yorkshire or Somersetshire in the draw-Besides this distinction, they have what they call the sublime, that is, a style proper for poetry, and which is the exact Scripture style. I believe you will be pleased to see a genuine example of this; and I am very glad I have it in my power to satisfy your curiosity, by sending you a faithful copy of the verses that Ibrahim Pasha, the reigning favourite, has made for the young princess, his contracted wife, whom he is not yet permitted to visit without witnesses, though she is gone home to his house. He is a man of wit and learning; and whether or no he is capable of writing good verse himself, you may be sure that on such an occasion he would not want the assistance of the best poets in the empire. Thus the verses may be looked upon as a sample of their finest poetry; and I don't doubt be of my mind, that it is most wonderfully resen the Song of Solomon, which was also addressed to a

On Inoculation for Small-pox.

Apropos of distempers, I am going to tell thing that will make you wish yourself here. small-pox, so fatal and so general amongst us, i entirely harmless, by the invention of ingrafting, is the term they give it. There is a set of old v who make it their business to perform the ope every autumn, in the month of September, who great heat is abated. People send to one anot know if any of their family has a mind to ha small-pox; they make parties for this purpose, and are met (commonly fifteen or sixteen together) the woman comes with a nut-shell full of the matter he best sort of small-pox, and asks what veins you ise to have opened. She immediately rips open that offer to her with a large needle (which gives you more pain than a common scratch), and puts into vein as much venom as can lie upon the head of needle, and after that binds up the little wound h a hollow bit of shell; and in this manner opens r or five veins. The Grecians have commonly the erstition of opening one in the middle of the fored, one in each arm, and one on the breast, to mark sign of the cross; but this has a very ill effect, these wounds leaving little scars, and is not done those that are not superstitious, who choose to have m in the legs, or that part of the arm that is conded. France in 1718.

I cannot give my dear Lady R. [Rich] a better proof the pleasure I have in writing to her than choosing do it in this seat of various amusements, where I am :able with visits, and those so full of vivacity and mpliment that 'tis full employment to hearken, whether e answers or not. The French embassadress at Conuntinople has a very considerable and numerous family re, who all come to see me, and are never weary of tking enquiries. The air of Paris has already had a od effect upon me; for I was never in better health, ough I have been extremely ill all the road from Lyons this place. You may judge how agreeable the journey s been to me, which did not need that addition to make dislike it. I think nothing so terrible as objects of sery, except one had the Godlike attribute of being Pable to redress them; and all the country villages France shew nothing else. While the post-horses are anged, the whole town comes out to beg, with such serable starved faces, and thin tattered clothes, they ed no other eloquence to persuade one of the wretchedness of their condition. This is all the French magnificence till you come to Fontainebleau. There you begin to think the country rich, when you are shewed one thousand five hundred rooms in the king's huntingpalace. The apartments of the royal family are very large, and richly gilt; but I saw nothing in the architecture or painting worth remembering. . . . A propos of countenances, I must tell you something of the French ladies; I have seen all the beauties, and such --- (I can't help making use of the coarse word) nauseous [creatures]! so fantastically absurd in their dress! so monstrously unnatural in their paint! their hair cut short, and curled round their faces, and so loaded with powder, that makes it look like white wool! and on their cheeks to their chins, unmercifully laid on, a shining red japan, that glistens in a most flaming manner, that they seem to have no resemblance to human faces, and I am apt to believe that they took the first hint of their dress from a fair sheep newly ruddled. 'Tis with pleasure I recollect my dear pretty countrywomen: and if I was writing to anybody else, I should say that these grotesque daubers give me still a higher esteem of the natural charms of dear Lady R.'s auburn hair, and the lively colours of her unsullied complexion. (From a letter to Lady Rich, dated Paris, October 10, O.S., 1718.)

To the Countess of Bute—On Female Education. Lovere, Yan. 28, N.S. 1753.

DEAR CHILD-You have given me a great deal of satisfaction by your account of your eldest daughter. I am particularly pleased to hear she is a good arithmetician; it is the best proof of understanding: the knowledge of numbers is one of the chief distinctions between us and the brutes. If there is anything in blood, you may reasonably expect your children should be endowed with an uncommon share of good sense. Mr Wortley's family and mine have both produced some of the greatest men that have been born in England; I mean Admiral Sandwich, and my grandsather, who was distinguished by the name of Wise William. I have heard Lord Bute's father mentioned as an extraordinary genius, though he had not many opportunities of shewing it; and his uncle the present Duke of Argyll has one of the best heads I ever knew. I will therefore speak to you as supposing Lady Mary not only capable, but desirous of learning; in that case, by all means let her be indulged in it. You will tell me I did not make it a part of your education; your prospect was very different from hers. As you had no defect either in mind or person to hinder, and much in your circumstances to attract the highest offers, it seemed your business to learn how to live in the world, as it is hers to know how to be easy out of it. It is the common error of builders and parents to follow some plan they think beautiful (and perhaps is so) without considering that nothing is beautiful that is displaced. Hence we see so many edifices raised that the raisers can never inhabit, being too large for their fortunes. Vistas are laid open over barren heaths, and apartments contrived for a coolness very agreeable in Italy, but killing in the north of Britain; thus every woman endeavours to breed her daughter a fine lady, qualifying her for a station in which she will never appear, and at the same time incapacitating her for that retirement to which she is destined. Learning, if she has a real taste for it, will not only make her contented, but happy in it. No entertainment is so cheap as reading, nor any pleasure so lasting. She will not want new fashions, nor regret the loss of expensive diversions, or variety of company, if she can be amused with an author in her closet. To render this amusement extensive she should be permitted to learn the languages. I have heard it lamented that boys lose so many years in mere learning of words: this is no objection to a girl, whose time is not so precious: she cannot advance herself in any profession, and has therefore more hours to spare; and as you say her memory is good, she will be very agreeably employed this way.

There are two cautions to be given on this subject: first, not to think herself learned when she can read Latin, or even Greek. Languages are more properly to be called vehicles of learning than learning itself, as may be observed in many schoolmasters, who, though perhaps critics in grammar, are the most ignorant fellows upon earth. True knowledge consists in knowing things, not words. I would no further wish her a linguist than to enable her to read books in their originals, that are often corrupted, and always injured, by translations. Two hours' application every morning will bring this about much sooner than you can imagine, and she will have leisure enough besides to run over the English poetry, which is a more important part of a woman's education than it is generally supposed. Many a young damsel has been ruined by a fine copy of verses, which she would have laughed at if she had known it had been stolen from Mr Waller. I remember, when I was a girl, I saved one of my companions from destruction, who communicated to me an epistle she was quite charmed with. As she had naturally a good taste, she observed the lines were not so smooth as Prior's or Pope's, but had more thought and spirit than any of theirs. She was wonderfully delighted with such a demonstration of her lover's sense and passion, and not a little pleased with her own charms, that had force enough to inspire such elegancies. In the midst of this triumph, I shewed her that they were taken from Randolph's poems, and the unfortunate transcriber was dismissed with the scorn he deserved. To say truth, the poor plagiary was very unlucky to fall into my hands: that author, being no longer in fashion, would have escaped any one of less universal reading than myself. You should encourage your daughter to talk over with you what she reads; and as you are very capable of distinguishing, take care she does not mistake pert folly for wit and humour, or rhyme for poetry, which are the common errors of young people, and have a train of ill consequences.

The second caution to be given her (and which is most absolutely necessary) is to conceal whatever learning she attains, with as much solicitude as she would hide crookedness or lameness: the parade of it can only serve to draw on her the envy, and consequently the most inveterate hatred, of all he and she fools, which will certainly be at least three parts in four of her acquaintance. The use of knowledge in our sex, beside the amusement of solitude, is to moderate the passions, and learn to be contented with a small expense, which are the certain effects of a studious life; and it may be preferable even to that fame which men have engrossed to themselves, and will not suffer us to share. You will tell me I have not observed this rule myself; but you are mistaken; it is only inevitable accident that has given me any reputation that way. I have always carefully avoided it, and ever thought it a misfortune. The explanation of this paragraph would occasion a long digression, which I will not trouble you with, it being my present design only to say what I think useful for the instruction of my granddaughter, which ! have much at heart. If she has the same inclination (! should say passion) for learning I was born with, history, geography, and philosophy will furnish her with materials to pass away cheerfully a longer life than is allotted to mortals. I believe there are few heads capable of making Sir I. Newton's calculations, but the result of them is not difficult to be understood by a moderate capacity. Do not fear this should make her affect the character of Lady ----, or Lady ----, or Mrs --- (the blanks at in the original]; these women are ridiculous not became they have learning, but because they have it not. One thinks herself a complete historian after reading Echarts Roman History, another a profound philosopher aler having got by heart some of Pope's unintelligible essen, and the third an able divine on the strength of Whitefield's sermons; thus you hear them screaming politis and controversy.

It is a saying of Thucydides, ignorance is bold and knowledge reserved. Indeed it is impossible to be far advanced in it without being more humbled by a conviction of human ignorance than elated by learing. At the same time I recommend books, I neither exclude work nor drawing. I think it is as scantalous for a woman not to know how to use a needle, s for a man not to know how to use a sword. I was once extremely fond of my pencil, and it was a great mortication to me when my father turned off my mate, having made a considerable progress for a short time! learnt. My over-eagerness in the pursuit of it brought a weakness on my eyes, that made it necessity to leave it off; and all the advantage I got was the improvement of my hand. I see by hers that practice will make her a ready writer: she may attain it by seving you for a secretary, when your health or affairs make it troublesome to you to write yourself; and custom will make it an agreeable amusement to her. She cannot have too many for that station of life which will probably be her fate. The ultimate end of your education was to make you a good wife (and I have the comfort to her that you are one); hers ought to be to make her happy in a virgin state. I will not say it is happier, but it is undoubtedly safer than any marriage. In a lotter, where there are (at the lowest computation) ten thousand blanks to a prize, it is the most prudent choice not to venture. I have always been so thoroughly persuaded of this truth, that, notwithstanding the flattering views I had for you (as I never intended you a sacrifice to my vanity), I thought I owed you the justice to lay before you all the hazards attending matrimony: you mil recollect I did so in the strongest manner. Perhaps you may have more success in the instructing your daughter; she has so much company at home, she will not seed seeking it abroad, and will more readily take the notions you think fit to give her. As you were alone in " family, it would have been thought a great cruelty to suffer you no companions of your own age, especially having so many near relations, and I do not words their opinions influenced yours. I was not sorry to see you not determined on a single life, knowing it was not your father's intention; and contented myself with endeavouring to make your home so easy that you might not be in haste to leave it.

am afraid you will think this a very long insignifit letter. I hope the kindness of the design will use it, being willing to give you every proof in my rer that I am lore complete than the surreptitious edition of Lady Mary's its in 1763 was that of 1803 (5 vols.), and still better that edited er great-grandson, Lord Wharncliffe (1837). This was further aded and improved by Mr Moy Thomas (1861; revised, 1887). letters from Constantinople and from France have appeared arious shapes. The editor of the surreptitious 1763 edition ols.) was probably John Cleland (1709-89); the forged letters, smably by him, were issued as a fourth volume in 1767.

Your most affectionate mother.

John Norris (1657-1711), an English Platonist I 'mystic divine,' was one of the earliest ponents of the philosophy of Locke. Educated Oxford, in 1689 he took a Somersetshire living, t from 1692 he held George Herbert's old rectory Bemerton near Salisbury. He was an intimate Henry More. Hallam described him as 'more roughly Platonic than Malebranche, to whom, wever, he pays great deference, and adopts his idamental hypothesis of seeing all things in d.' More noteworthy is it that he carried into eighteenth century much of the spirit of Henry ore, something of the mood of Crashaw and ughan. His first original work was An Idea of appiness (1683); his poems, essays, discourses, d letters, entitled A Collection of Miscellanies ig, went through nine editions. His verses e quaint and full of conceits. One simile of his, 'The Parting,' was copied or annexed by two tter-known poets-by Blair in The Grave, and Thomas Campbell in The Pleasures of Hope:

How fading are the joys we dote upon! Like apparitions seen and gone: But those which soonest take their flight, Are the most exquisite and strong: Like angel visits short and bright; Mortality's too weak to bear them long.

In 'Lines to the Memory of my dear Neece' orns repeats the idea in other words:

Angels, as 'tis but seldom they appear, So neither do they make long stay; They do but visit and away.

rain, when Campbell wrote 'Tis distance lends chantment to the view,' he certainly had before i mind this from Norris's 'Infidel:'

Distance presents the objects fair, With charming features and a graceful air, But when we come to seize th' inviting prey, Like a shy ghost, it vanishes away.

the same poem, with its unpromising title, we d the rather memorable stanza:

So to the unthinking boy the distant sky
Seems on some mountain's surface to rely:
He with ambitious haste climbs the ascent
Curious to touch the firmament;
But when with an unwearied pace,
Arrived he is at the long wished-for place,
With sighs the sad event he does deplore—
His Heaven is still as distant as before.

Some of his verses are prosaic and tuneless enough to recall Zachary Boyd's paraphrases of Scripture at their worst. Thus 'Adam Turned out of Paradise' complains in these words:

O whither now, whither shall I repair,
Exiled from this angelic coast?
There's nothing left that's pleasant, good, or fair;
The world can't recompence for Eden lost.
'Tis true, I've here a universal sway,
The creatures me as their chief lord obey,
Yet the world, tho' all my seat,
Can't make me happy, tho' it makes me great.

His twenty-three publications include The Picture of Love Unveiled (a translation from Waring's Latin, 1682); The Theory and Regulation of Love, a Moral Essay (1688); four volumes of Practical Discourses (1690-93); essays on reason and religion, on schism, against Quakerism; a Theory of the Ideal and Intelligible World (1701-4); and A Philosophical Discourse concerning the Immortality of the Soul (1708).

Dr Grosart edited Norris's Poems in 1871 for Vol. III. of the Miscellanies of the 'Fuller Worthies Library,' where he suggests many parallelisms between Norris and later writers, and insists on the debt of Blair and Campbell especially.

Christopher Pitt (1699-1748) was admitted by Johnson into his gallery of English poets. His best-known work is his translation (1725) of Vida's Art of Poetry; and in 1740 he produced a complete English Æneid. He also imitated some of the satires and epistles of Horace, and helped with Creech's Lucretius and Pope's Odyssey. 'Pitt pleases the critics, and Dryden the people; Pitt is quoted, and Dryden read.' Such was Johnson's report; but even the critics have long ceased to delight in him. From New College, Oxford, he was presented to the rectory of Pimperne in his native county of Dorset, and there he spent the rest of his life. 'Diamond Pitt,' Lord Chatham's grandfather, was his cousin.

Gilbert West (1700?-1756) translated the Odes of Pindar (1749), prefixing a dissertation on the Olympic games, praised by Gibbon. He wrote Education, a Poem; The Institution of the Garter; and a number of other miscellaneous pieces of poetry. One On the Abuse of Travelling, professedly in imitation of Spenser's manner (1739), was noticed by Gray with very warm commendation. For his Observations on the Resurrection, the University of Oxford conferred on him the degree of D.C.L.; and Lyttelton addressed to him his treatise on St Paul. Pope left West a sum of f_{1200} , payable after the death of Martha Blount, and he did not live to receive it. son of a prebendary of Winchester, he was educated at Eton and Christchurch, and found a post under the Secretary of State for the time. By the influence of Pitt, he was appointed (1752) one of the clerks of the Privy Council, and under-treasurer of Chelsea Hospital. Johnson included his miscellaneous poems in his collection.

Edward Young.

author of the Night Thoughts, was born towards the end of June 1683 at Upham in Hampshire. where his father-afterwards Dean of Salisburywas rector. He was educated at Winchester School, and subsequently at New, Corpus, and All Souls Colleges, Oxford. In 1712 he commenced as poet and courtier of the great, and he continued both professions till he was over eighty. One of his patrons was the notorious Duke of Wharton, the scorn and wonder of his days,' whom Young accompanied to Ireland in 1716-17. He was for a while tutor in the family of the Marquis of Exeter, but was induced by Wharton to stand as parliamentary candidate for Cirencester, receiving a bond for £600 to defray expenses. Young was defeated, Wharton died (1731), but the courts sustained Young's claim to two annuities (worth £200 a year) promised by the Duke. His first tragedy. Businis (afterwards burlesqued in Fielding's Tom Thumb), was produced in 1719; in 1721 his second and best, The Revenge; his last, The Brothers, not till 1753. Significantly enough, the three tragedies of the future author of the Night Thoughts all end in suicide. The Revenge contains, amidst some rant and hyperbole, passages of strong passion and eloquent declamation in Young's sonorous blank verse; like Othello, it is founded on jealousy, and the principal character, Zanga, is a Moor. Young's satires, seven in number, appeared in 1725 28 under the title of The Love of Fame, the Universal Passion. Doubtless his own experiences must have been valuable, for as the associate and toady of Bubb Dodington and the like his humiliations and disappointments must have been name and grievous. In 1727 Young entered the Church wrote a panegyric on the king, and was made one of His Majesty's chaplains. In 1730 he obtained from his college the living of Welwyn in Hertfielshire, where he was destined to close his days though always eager for further preferment. He marriage with the (widowed) daughter of the End of Lichfield proved a happier union than runor represented the noble alliances of Dryden and Addison. The lady had a daughter by her first marriage, to whom Young was warmly attached That daughter and her husband died; and when the mother followed, the lonely survivor's Night Thoughts (1742-44) showed that years and sorrow had but enriched his poetic gift. In 1761 be was made clerk of the closet to the Princess-Downger of Wales; and he lived on till the 5th of April 1765.

In his youth Young was gay and dissipated; all his life he was an indefatigable flatter and courtier; in his poetry only is he a sever moralist and ascetic divine. Even if he felt the emotions he describes, he hardly allowed the to influence his conduct. He was not would from the world till age overtook him; and the epigrammatic point and wit and gloom of his Night Thoughts show the poetic artist rather than the devout Christian. The bereavements even the which the poem was based were deliberately the aggerated for poetical effect:

Insatiate archer! could not one suffice?
Thy shafts flew thrice, and thrice my peace was sim!
And thrice, ere thrice you moon had filled her hore.

This tale of sorrows was a poetical license; one of the shafts struck after an interval of four years. The gay Lorenzo is overdrawn. Like the characte of Childe Harold in the hands of Byron, it afforded its creator scope for dark and powerful pamus and was made the vehicle for bursts of infignant virtue, sorrow, regret, and admonition. artificial character pervades the whole poem, and is an essential part of its structure; yet there are many noble and sublime passages, where, is with the voice of one crying in the wildeness, Young prophesies of life, death, and immorbity-Epigram and repartee are then forgotten; fact yields to feeling, and the imagery is natural and appropriate. But the poet-preacher seldow remains long at a time in his loftier mood; has desire to say witty and smart things, to load his picture with supernumerary horrors, and conduct his personages to their 'sulphureous or ambrosid seats,' soon converts him into the scene-painter or epigrammatist. Poetry disappears in verbage and sentimentalism, which cloying antithesis and magniloquence make more tedious. Many of bis sententious lines and short passages have become proverbial; some of his reflections make atmirable copy-lines, such as 'Procrastination's the thief of time.' Young's great work, like Hudibras, is too full of compressed reflection and to be read continuously with pleasure. o plot or progressive interest; each of ooks is independent of the other. The ks out favourite passages, or contents ith a single excursion into a wide ated field. The worst fault is the inggestion of insincerity, or at least of d sentiment. But the more the work the more marvellous seem the fertility he pregnancy of wit and wisdom, the pnjunction of sound and sense, of symnderness and everlasting truth, clearly through the gloomy recesses of the ncholious imagination: orious fragments of a fire immortal, ubbish mixed, and glittering in the dust. nificent apostrophe had hardly been

An angel's arm can't snatch me from the grave; Legions of angels can't confine me there.

'Tis past conjecture; all things rise in proof:
White o'er my limbs sleep's soft dominion spread;
What though my soul fantastic measures trod
O'er fairy fields; or mourned along the gloom
Of pathless woods; or down the craggy steep
Hurled headlong, swam with pain the mantled pool;
Or scaled the cliff; or danced on hollow winds,
With antic shapes, wild natives of the brain?
Her ceaseless flight, though devious, speaks her nature
Of subtler essence than the trodden clod. . . .
Even silent night proclaims my soul immortal! . . .

Why, then, their loss deplore that are not lost?...
This is the desert, this the solitude:
How populous, how vital is the grave!
This is creation's melancholy vault,
The vale funereal, the sad cypress gloom;
The land of apparitions, empty shades!
All, all on earth, is shadow, all beyond
Is substance; the reverse is folly's creed:
How solid all, where change shall be no more!

This is the bud of being, the dim dawn,
The twilight of our day, the vestibule;
Life's theatre as yet is shut, and death,
Strong death alone can heave the massy bar,
This gross impediment of clay remove,
And make us embryos of existence free
From real life; but little more remote
Is he, not yet a candidate for light,
The future embryo, slumbering in his sire.
Embryos we must be till we burst the shell,
Yon ambient azure shell, and spring to life,
The hie of gods, O transport! and of man.
Yet man, fool man! here buries all his thoughts;

Inters celestial hopes without one sigh. Prisoner of earth, and pent beneath the moon, Here pinions all his wishes; winged by heaven To fly at infinite; and reach it there Where seraphs gather immortality, On life's fair tree, fast by the throne of God. What golden joys ambrosial clustering glow In his full beam, and ripen for the just, Where momentary ages are no more! Where time, and pain, and chance, and death expire! And is it in the flight of three score years To push eternity from human thought, And smother souls immortal in the dust? A soul immortal, spending all her fires, Wasting her strength in strenuous idleness, Thrown into tumult, raptured or alarmed, At aught this scene can threaten or indulge, Resembles ocean into tempest wrought, To wast a feather, or to drown a fly.

(From The Complaint-Night I.)

On Time.

The bell strikes one. We take no note of time But from its loss: to give it then a tongue Is wise in man. As if an angel spoke,
I feel the solemn sound. If heard aright,
It is the knell of my departed hours.
Where are they? With the years beyond the flood.
It is the signal that demands dispatch:
How much is to be done? My hopes and fears
Start up alarmed, and o'er life's narrow verge
Look down—on what? A fathomless abyss.
A dread eternity! how surely mine!
And can eternity belong to me,
Poor pensioner on the bounties of an hour?

(From The Complaint—Night I.)

O time! than gold more sacred; more a load
Than lead to fools, and fools reputed wise.
What moment granted man without account?
What years are squandered, wisdom's debt unpaid?
Our wealth in days all due to that discharge.
Haste, haste, he lies in wait, he's at the door;
Insidious Death! should his strong hand arrest,
No composition sets the prisoner free.
Eternity's inexorable chain
Fast binds, and vengeance claims the full arrear.

Youth is not rich in time; it may be poor;
Part with it as with money, sparing; pay
No moment, but in purchase of its worth;
And what it's worth, ask death-beds; they can tell.
Part with it as with life, reluctant; big
With holy hope of nobler time to come;
Time higher aimed, still nearer the great mark
Of men and angels, virtue more divine.

Ah! how unjust to nature and himself
Is thoughtless, thankless, inconsistent man!
Like children babbling nonsense in their sports,
We censure Nature for a span too short;
That span too short we tax as tedious too;
Torture invention, all expedients tire,
To lash the lingering moments into speed,
And whirl us (happy riddance!) from ourselves.

Time, in advance, behind him hides his wings, And seems to creep, decrepit with his age; Behold him when passed by; what then is seen But his broad pinions swifter than the winds? And all mankind, in contradiction strong, Rueful, aghast! cry out on his career.

We waste, not use our time; we breathe, not live Time wasted is existence; used, is life:
And bare existence man, to live ordained,
Wrings and oppresses with enormous weight.
And why? since time was given for use, not wa
Enjoined to fly, with tempest, tide, and stars,
To keep his speed, nor ever wait for man.
Time's use was doomed a pleasure, waste a pair
That man might feel his error if unseen,
And, feeling, fly to labour for his cure;
Not blundering, split on idleness for ease.

We push time from us, and we wish him back; Lavish of lustrums, and yet fond of life; Life we think long and short; death seek and s Body and soul, like peevish man and wife, United jar, and yet are loth to part.

Oh the dark days of vanity! while here. How tasteless! and how terrible when gone! Gone? they ne'er go; when past, they haunt at The spirit walks of every day deceased, And smiles an angel, or a fury frowns. Nor death nor life delight us. If time past, And time possest, both pain us, what can pless That which the Deity to please ordained, Time used. The man who consecrates his how By vigorous effort, and an honest aim, At once he draws the sting of life and death: He walks with nature, and her paths are peace.

'Tis greatly wise to talk with our past hours,
And ask them what report they bore to heaven
And how they might have borne more welcom
Their answers form what men experience call;
If wisdom's friend her best, if not, worst foe.

In these shorter passages he rings the on the same topics:

Look nature through, 'tis revolution all; All change, no death; day follows night, and The dying day; stars rise and set, and rise: Earth takes the example. Procrastination.

And 'dust to dust' concludes her noblest song.

Be wise to-day; 'tis madness to defer: Next day the fatal precedent will plead; Thus on, till wisdom is pushed out of life. Procrastination is the thief of time; Year after year it steals, till all are fled, And to the mercies of a moment leaves The vast concerns of an eternal scene. If not so frequent, would not this be strange? That 'tis so frequent, this is stranger still.

Of man's miraculous mistakes, this bears The palm, 'That all men are about to live,' For ever on the brink of being born: All pay themselves the compliment to think They one day shall not drivel, and their pride On this reversion takes up ready praise; At least their own their future selves applaud; How excellent that life they ne'er will lead! Time lodged in their own hands is Folly's vails; That lodged in Fate's to wisdom they consign; The thing they can't but purpose, they postpone. 'Tis not in folly not to scorn a fool, And scarce in human wisdom to do more. All promise is poor dilatory man. And that through every stage. When young, indeed, In full content we sometimes nobly rest, Unanxious for ourselves, and only wish, As duteous sons, our fathers were more wise. At thirty, man suspects himself a fool; Knows it at forty, and reforms his plan; At fifty, chides his infamous delay, Pushes his prudent purpose to resolve; In all the magnanimity of thought Resolves, and re-resolves; then dies the same.

And why? because he thinks himself immortal.

All men think all men mortal but themselves;
Themselves, when some alarming shock of fate
Strikes through their wounded hearts the sudden dread:
But their hearts wounded, like the wounded air,
Soon close; where passed the shaft no trace is found,
As from the wing no scar the sky retains,
The parted wave no furrow from the keel,
So dies in human hearts the thought of death:
E'en with the tender tear which nature sheds
O'er those we love, we drop it in their grave.

(From The Complaint - Night I.)

The Night Thoughts eclipsed Young's other works; but his Love of Fame; in Seven Characteristical Satires, shows real satiric power, often almost equalling Pope's. Parts of Pope's seem indeed to have been suggested by Young's.

From 'The Love of Fame.'

Not all on books their criticism waste: The genius of a dish some justly taste, And eat their way to fame! with anxious thought The salmon is refused, the turbot bought. Impatient Art rebukes the sun's delay, And bids December yield the fruits of May. Their various cares in one great point combine The business of their lives, that is, to dine; Half of their precious day they give the feast, And to a kind digestion spare the rest. Apicius here, the taster of the town, Feeds twice a week, to settle their renown.

These worthies of the palate guard with care
The sacred annals of their bills of fare;
In those choice books their panegyrics read,
And scorn the creatures that for hunger feed;
If man, by feeding well, commences great,
Much more the worm, to whom that man is meat.

Brunetta's wise in actions great and rare,
But scorns on trifles to bestow her care.
Thus every hour Brunetta is to blame,
Because th' occasion is beneath her aim.
Think nought a trifle, though it small appear;
Small sands the mountain, moments make the year,
And trifles, life. Your care to trifles give,
Or you may die before you truly live.

Belus with solid glory will be crowned;
He buys no phantom, no vain empty sound,
But builds himself a name; and to be great,
Sinks in a quarry an immense estate;
In cost and grandeur Chandos he'll outdo;
And, Burlington, thy taste is not so true;
The pile is finished, every toil is past,
And full perfection is arrived at last;
When lo! my lord to some small corner runs,
And leaves state-rooms to strangers and to duns.

The man who builds, and wants wherewith to pay, Provides a home from which to run away. In Britain, what is many a lordly seat, But a discharge in full for an estate?

Some for renown on scraps of learning dote, And think they grow immortal as they quote, To patchwork learned quotations are allied; Both strive to make our poverty our pride.

Let high birth triumph! what can be more great? Nothing—but merit in a low estate.

To Virtue's humblest son let none prefer Vice, though descended from the Conqueror. Shall men, like figures, pass for high or base, Slight or important only by their place? Titles are marks of honest men, and wise; The fool or knave that wears a title, lies. They that on glorious ancestors enlarge, Produce their debt instead of their discharge.

From the 'First Epistle to Mr Pope.'

With fame in just proportion envy grows;
The man that makes a character makes foes;
Slight peevish insects round a genius rise,
As a bright day awakes the world of flies;
With hearty malice, but with feeble wing,
(To show they live) they flutter and they sting:
But as by depredations wasps proclaim
The fairest fruit, so these the fairest fame.

Shall we not censure all the motley train, Whether with ale irriguous or champagne?

Whether they tread the vale of prose, or climb And whet their appetites on cliffs of rhyme; The college sloven or embroidered spark, The purple prelate or the parish clerk, The quiet quidnunc or demanding prig, The plaintiff Tory or defendant Whig; Rich, poor, male, female, young, old, gay or sa Whether extremely witty or quite mad; Profoundly dull or shallowly polite, Men that read well, or men that only write; Whether peers, porters, tailors, tune the reeds, And measuring words to measuring shapes succ For bankrupts write, when ruined shops are sh As maggots crawl from out a perished nut. His hammer this, and that his trowel quits, And wanting sense for tradesmen, serve for wit By thriving men, subsists each other trade; Of every broken craft a writer's made. Thus his material, paper, takes its birth From tattered rags of all the stuff on earth.

The Life of Young in Johnson's Lives of the Poets is by Herbert Croft (written 1788). Mitford and Doran, in the memoirs prefixed to their editions (1852 and 1854) of the works, added a few facts; and so also Leslie Stephen's article in the last volume of the Pactumary of National Biography (1900). George Eliot's 'Worldliness and Other-worldliness,' reprinted in her Essays (1884), contains a severe attack on Young's character. George Berkeley (1685-1753), the good bishop to whom Pope assigned 'every virtue under heaven,' was born at Dysert Castle near Kilkenny. Like Swift, he passed from Kilkenny school to Trinity College, Dublin, where, student and Feliow, he remained thirteen years. His Commonplace Book of 1705-6 (published in 1871) reveals the influence of Locke's psychology on a subtle and original mind. Berkeley's Essay towards a new Theory of Vision (1709) showed that the act of seeing, which seems so immediate, is really a reasoning interpretation of signs and hints, and argued that the process involves the assisting agency of God. The argument was extended in 1710 by a Treatise concerning the Principles of Human Knowledge, further illustrating his 'new principle'-that the world which we see and touch is not an abstract independent substance, of which our sensations are an effect; the very world presented to our senses depends for its actuality on being perceived. In 1711, having taken orders, he published a Discourse of Passive Obedience, a defence of the Christian duty of not resisting the supreme civil power; and in 1713 he visited London, and wrote some papers for Steele's Guardian. The same year he published his Three Dialogues between Hylas and Philonous, the design of which was plainly to demonstrate the immateriality of the external world, the incorporeal nature of the soul, and the immediate providence of a Deity, in opposition to sceptics and deists. Berkeley now became intimate with Addison, Arbuthnot, Swift, Pope, Steele, and the rest of that gifted circle, by whom he seems to have been sincerely beloved. He accompanied the brilliant and eccentric Earl of Peterborough, as chaplain and secretary, on his embassy to Sicily, and afterwards for four years travelled on the Continent as tutor to a son of the Bishop of Clogher. While abroad we find him writing to Pope: 'As merchants, antiquaries, men of pleasure, &c. have all different views in travelling, I know not whether it might not be worth a poet's while to travel, in order to store his mind with strong images of nature. Green fields and groves, flowery meadows, and purling streams, are nowhere in such perfection as in England; but if you would know lightsome days, warm suns, and blue skies, you must come to Italy; and to enable a man to describe rocks and precipices, it is absolutely necessary that he pass the Alps.' A story was long current that while at Paris Berkeley visited Malebranche, then in ill-health; and a dispute as to Berkeley's theory of the external world so excited the French philosopher that a violent access of his ailment carried him off in a few days! In reality Berkeley was still in England when Malebranche died. On his return he published a Latin tract, De Motu. In an Essay towards preventing the Ruin of Great Britain (1721) Berkeley says he would regard the collapse of the South Sea scheme as a blessing if it should make all honest men of one party, put religion and virtue in countenance, and 'turn our thought from cozenage and stock-jobbing to industry and frugal methods of life;' denounces that fearful prevalence of bribery and perjury; makes proposals for new taxes (on bachelors, &c.) and for improving many manufactures; calls for the interposition of the legislature against the ruinous folly of masquerades and for the reformation of the drama; recommends the enaction of comprehensive sumptuary laws, and for the suppression of the more aggressive forms of freethinking. am not,' he says, 'for placing an invidious power in the hands of the clergy or complying with the narrowness of any mistaken zealots who should incline to persecute Dissenters. But whatever conduct common sense as well as Christian charity obligeth us to use towards those who differ from us in some points of religion, yet the public safety requireth that the avowed contemners of all religion should be severely chastised. And perhaps it may be no easy matter to assign a good reason why blasphemy against God should not be inquired into and punished with the same rigour as treason against the king.'

Through Pope he was recommended to the Duke of Grafton, Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, who made him his chaplain and secured for him the deanery of Derry. The benevolent philosopher had long been cherishing 'a scheme for converting the savage Americans to Christianity, by a college to be erected in the Summer Islands, otherwise called the Isles of Bermuda.' In this college he most 'exhorbitantly proposed,' as Swift commented, 'a whole hundred pounds a year for himself, forty pounds for a fellow and ten for a student.' No anticipated difficulties could dans him; coadjutors were obtained, a royal charter was granted, and Sir Robert Walpole promised £20,000 from Government. In January 1729 Berkeley and his friends landed at Newport in Rhode Island; in August the saintly missionary (who had no scruple about holding negro slave) removed inland, having bought a farm and built a house. But when Walpole declined to advance the sum promised, the project was at an end; Berkeley returned to Europe, and was in London in February 1732. Next month appeared the largest and most finished of his works, Alciphra, or the Minute Philosopher, a religious presentation of nature giving pleasant pictures of American scenery and life, conveyed in a series of dislogues, which in scope and charm have often been compared with Plato's. Berkeley became a favourite with Queen Caroline, and, in 1734 was appointed to the bishopric of Cloyne. Lord Chesterfield afterwards offered him the see of Clogher, which was double the value of that of Cloyne; but he declined the preferment. Some useful tracts on schemes for ameliorating lish social conditions were published by the Bishop One of them was The Querist (1735-37), containing many acute suggestions; that called Siris (1744), a chain of philosophical reflections on the medicinal virtues of water in which pine-tar has been stirred, cost him, he said, more thought than any of the rest of his works. The resin of the w is compared with the creative spirit present in nature; the thought has a neoplatonic flavour. His last literary labour was a tract, Further Thoughts on Tar-water (1752). The best way of making this panacea, he thinks, is 'in a stone jug or earthen vessel, throughout well glazed,' and by no means in a metallic vessel. 'By increasing the proportion of tar to the water and by stiming it longer, tar-water may be made strong enough for a spoonful to impregnate a glass, a thing very useful on the road.' 'Tar-water must be dranks warm in agues, small-pox, measles, and fevers, in cholic and disorders of the bowels, in gout also and rheumatism; in most other ailments cold or warm at the choice of the patient. In fevers the patient cannot begin too soon or drink too He records a case of an old woman cured in a fortnight of combined ague, colic, and jaundice by drinking three pints of warm 121. water every day.

Failing health (spite of tar-water) and bereavement led Berkeley, in 1752, to resolve to resign pric and settle in Oxford; and there he died. His dislike to the pursuits and f ambition are thus expounded by him to 1747: 'In a letter from England, which came a week ago, it was said that several h bishops were earnestly contending for Pray, who are they? I thought one was only talked of at present. uestion merely out of curiosity, and not interest, I assure you. I am no man's mpetitor in this matter. y's Theory of Vision, long considered a cal romance, is now a part of scientific optics. His doctrine of the immateriality of the outer world, which he insisted on regarding as the simplest, most obvious, and only logical way of interpreting our perceptions—that what is perceived is the perceptions, not a dead, inert world of matter lying behind them and (needlessly) inferred from them—puzzled his contemporaries, and has been consistently rejected by all 'common-sense' philosophers and laymen, though the dependence of matter on mind (not my mind but some mind) is a familiar element in idealist systems. Probably his chiefest aim was, by means of his immaterialism, to turn the tables on materialists, and confute those who taught that there is neither soul nor God by proving that we know only our own souls and can logically prove only the existence of other souls, including the Creative Spirit. He applied to the analysis and dissolution of the assumed outer material world the principles of Locke's psychology; hardly foreseeing that Hume would afterwards, with greater audacity, apply the same principles to soul as such, and analyse it too, by cognate methods, into fleeting successions of sensations and feelings. Berkeley's philosophy is nowhere completely set forth in the form of a systematic treatise; but amongst English writers on abstruse philosophical problems he stands alone for lucidity and charm of exposition, for felicity of illustration, and for the union of gentle but humorous fancy with keen wit and trenchant logic. His style is clear and unaffected, with the easy grace of the polished philosopher; and his descriptions of external nature at times remind one of Izaak Walton. The following extracts, from the opening of the first and end of the last of the three Dialogues between Hylas and Philonous, show how skilfully he could manage this device for popularising abstract argument:

The Point in Dispute.

Philonous. Good morrow, Hylas: I did not expect to find you abroad so early.

Hylas. It is indeed something unusual; but my thoughts were so taken up with a subject I was discoursing of last night, that finding I could not sleep, I resolved to rise and take a turn in the garden.

Phil. It happened well, to let you see what innocent and agreeable pleasures you lose every morning. Can there be a pleasanter time of the day or a more delightful season of the year? That purple sky, those wild but sweet notes of birds, the fragrant bloom upon the trees and flowers, the gentle influence of the rising sun, these and a thousand nameless beauties of nature inspire the soul with secret transports; its faculties too being at this time fresh and lively, are fit for these mediations, which the solitude of a garden and tranquillity of the morning naturally dispose us to. But I am afraid I interrupt your thoughts: for you seemed very intent on something.

Hyl. It is true I was, and shall be obliged to you if you will permit me to go on in the same vein; not that I would by any means deprive myself of your company, for my thoughts always flow more easily in conversation with a friend than when I am alone: but my request is, that you would suffer me to impart my reflections to you.

Phil. With all my heart, it is what I should have requested myself if you had not prevented me.

Hyl. I was considering the odd fate of those men who have in all ages, through an affectation of being distinguished from the vulgar, or some unaccountable turn of thought, pretended either to believe nothing at all, or to believe the most extravagant things in the world. This however might be borne, if their paradoxes and scepticism did not draw after them some consequences of general disadvantage to mankind. But the mischief lieth here; that when men of less leisure see them who are supposed to have spent their whole time in the pursuits of knowledge professing an entire ignorance of all things, or advancing such notions as are repugnant to plain and commonly received principles, they will be tempted to entertain suspicions concerning the most important truths, which they had hitherto held sacred and unquestionable.

Phil. I entirely agree with you, as to the ill tendency of the affected doubts of some philosophers, and fantastical conceits of others. I am even so far gone of late in this way of thinking, that I have quitted several of the sublime notions I had got in their schools for vulgar opinions. And I give it you on my word, since this revolt from metaphysical notions to the plain dictates of nature and common sense, I find my understanding strangely enlightened, so that I can now easily comprehend a great many things which before were all mystery and riddle.

Hyl. I am glad to find there was nothing in the accounts I heard of you.

Phil. Pray, what were those?

Hyl. You were represented in last night's conversation as one who maintained the most extravagant opinion that ever entered into the mind of man, to wit that there is no such thing as material substance in the world.

Phil. That there is no such thing as what philosophers call material substance, I am seriously persuaded: but if I were made to see anything absurd or sceptical in this, I should then have the same reason to renounce this that I imagine I have now to reject the contrary opinion.

Hyl. What! can anything be more fantastical, more repugnant to common sense, or a more manifest piece of scepticism, than to believe there is no such thing as matter?

Phil. Softly, good Hylas. What if it should prove that you, who hold there is, are, by virtue of that opinion, a greater sceptic, and maintain more paradoxes and repugnances to common sense, than I who believe no such thing?

Hyl. You may as soon persuade me, the part is greater than the whole, as that in order to avoid absurdity and scepticism I should ever be obliged to give up my opinion in this point.

Phil. Well then, are you content to admit that opinion for true, which upon examination shall appear most agreeable to common sense, and remote from scepticism?

Hyl. With all my heart. Since you are for raising disputes about the plainest things in nature, I am content for once to hear what you have to say.

Berkeley's Theory summed up.

Phil. With all my heart: retain the word m apply it to the objects of sense, if you please you do not attribute to them any subsistence from their being perceived. I shall never qu you for an expression. Matter, or material are terms introduced by philosophers; and a them, imply a sort of independency, or a s distinct from being perceived by a mind: but used by common people; or if ever, it is to: immediate objects of sense. One would think so long as the names of all particular things, terms sensible, substance, body, stuff, and the retained, the word matter should be never common talk. And in philosophical discourse the best way to leave it quite out; since th perhaps any one thing that hath more favstrengthened the depraved bent of the mir atheism, than the use of that general confused 1

Hyl. Well but, Philonous, since I am conte up the notion of an unthinking substance exter mind, I think you ought not to deny me the of using the word matter as I please, and it to a collection of sensible qualities subsisting the mind. I freely own there is no other subst strict sense, than spirit. But I have been so le tomed to the term matter, that I know not he with it. To say, there is no matter in the wor shocking to me. Whereas to say, there is no by that term be meant an unthinking substance without the mind; but if by matter is me sensible thing, whose existence consists in 1 ceived, then there is matter: this distinction quite another turn: and men will come into yo with small difficulty, when they are propos manner. For after all, the controversy about the strict acceptation of it, lies altogether bet and the philosophers, whose principles, I ack are not near so natural or so agreeable to the sense of mankind and holy scripture as your is nothing we either desire or shun, but as it is apprehended to make some part of our or misery. But what hath happiness or mise grief, pleasure or pain, to do with absolute or with unknown entities, abstracted from all 1 us? It is evident, things regard us only as pleasing or displeasing: and they can please or only so far forth as they are perceived. Further we are not concerned; and thus far you leave you found them. Yet still there is something r doctrine. It is plain, I do not now think with osophers, nor yet altogether with the vulgar. know how the case stands in that respect: what you have added to or altered in my forme

Phil. I do not pretend to be a setter-up notions. My endeavours tend only to unite in a clearer light that truth which was befue between the vulgar and the philosophers: the being of opinion, that those things they im perceive are the real things: and the latter, things immediately perceived are ideas which in the mind. Which two notions put togeth effect constitute the substance of what I advance

Hyl. I have been a long time distrusting n methought I saw things by a dim light, and

ses. Now the glasses are removed, and a new aks in upon my understanding. I am clearly d that I see things in their native forms; and onger in pain about their unknown natures or existence. This is the state I find myself in at though indeed the course that brought me to not yet thoroughly comprehend. You set out same principles that Academics, Cartesians, and sects usually do: and for a long time it looked were advancing their philosophical scepticism; te end your conclusions are directly opposite to Having taken orders in 1718, appointed preacher at the Rolls Chapel, he preached those remarkable sermons he published in 1726. The first three, On t Nature, constitute one of the most imcontributions ever made to moral science. ame prebendary of Salisbury (1721), and of Haughton-le-Skerne near Darlington in 1725 he was presented to the 'golden of Stanhope, also in Durham. Here he in great retirement till 1733, busy on his y. Secker wished to see him promoted to tore important position, and mentioned his o Queen Caroline. The queen thought he en dead. 'No, madam,' said Archbishop urne ('the jolly old Archbishop of York' ccording to Horace Walpole, 'had all the 's of a man of quality though he had been a eer and was a clergyman'), 'he is not dead, is buried.' In 1733 Butler became chaplain friend Lord Chancellor Talbot, and in 1736 indary of Rochester and clerk of the closet en Caroline. In 1736 he published the y of Religion, Natural and Revealed, which, words of Chalmers, made him the 'Bacon slogy.' In 1738 he was made Bishop of in 1740 Dean of St Paul's; in 1747 he d the primacy; and in 1750 be was transthe see of Durham.

Butler takes high rank amongst English moralists. and has had the very greatest influence on English ethical thinking. It is sometimes said that the sum total of his teaching is the insisting on the authority and supremacy of conscience. He developed Shaftesbury's moral sense into a higher and more authoritative conscience, he learnt from Aristotle and the Stoics, and he wrote against Mandeville and Hobbes, contending that the social impulses in man are no less natural than the appetites and self-regarding desires-that virtue is more consonant with human nature than vice. He not merely emphasises, as vigorously as Kant does, the indefeasibleness of the moral law, but shows ingenuity in constructing an argumentum ad hominem specially applicable to those who deny his main thesis. This method of the argumentum ad hominem is especially characteristic of his great treatise, the Analogy. The keynote of the Analogy is to show that all the objections to revealed religion are equally applicable to the whole constitution of nature, and that the general analogy between the principles of divine government, as revealed in the Scriptures, and those manifested in the course of nature, warrants the conclusion that they have one Author. The argument is valid against the deists, but it lacks completeness as a defence of Christianity. Even then it seemed hardly enough to pose the deists; unfriendly critics thought the true method of defending Christianity was so to exhibit its excellences as to make objectors eager to embrace it. Pitt is reported to have said that it raised more doubts than it solved. Bagehot not unfairly said that we might expect revelation to explain the difficulties to be found in the religious interpretation of nature, and not to add others of its own. Matthew Arnold and Mr Leslie Stephen are amongst those who find Butler's argument unsatisfying. Mr Gladstone was one of Butler's most enthusiastic defenders, and seemed even to argue that the Analogy is of as great apologetic value now as it was in Butler's own time.

But for materialists, positivists, thorough-going agnostics, Butler's arguments are irrelevant: unless you posit the existence of God, and the truth and binding force of 'natural religion,' the Analogy has no fulcrum to work from. In Butler's time the deists were the most conspicuous, the only considerable opponents of revealed religion; and most of them accepted the truths of natural religion as heartily as Butler did. Kant and Darwin had not as yet overthrown teleology, and the kind of evidences of religion then demanded were very different from what would now be required. The moral arguments in the Sermons of Butler are less antiquated than those of the Analogy. It was with deists more or less pronounced, and people liable to be influenced by their arguments, that Butler had to do: and it is by the cogency of his argument as addressed to them that he must be judged. Butler's great influence, and the place his Sermons and the Analogy secured in the Church and at the universities, owe little to the superficial graces of style. He was a severely logical writer, often dry, sometimes cumbrous, generally vigorous, clear, and effective, at times attaining the force of aphorism; but even in the Sermons there is no declamation and little direct appeal to the feelings.

Probability in Religion.

It has been thought by some persons that if the evidence of revelation appears doubtful, this itself turns into a positive argument against it; because it cannot be supposed that if it were true, it would be left to subsist upon doubtful evidence. And the objection against revelation from its not being universal, is often insisted upon as of great weight.

Now the weakness of these opinions may be shown by observing the suppositions on which they are founded, which are really such as these—that it cannot be thought God would have bestowed any favour at all upon us, unless in the degree which we think he might, and which we imagine would be most to our particular advantage; and also that it cannot be thought he would bestow a favour upon any, unless he bestowed the same upon all—auppositions which we find contradicted not by a few instances in God's natural government of the world, but by the general analogy of nature together.

Persons who speak of the evidence of religion as doubtful, and of this supposed doubtfulness as a positive argument against it, should be put upon considering what that evidence indeed is which they act upon with regard to their temporal interests; for it is not only extremely difficult, but in many cases absolutely impossible, to balance pleasure and pain, satisfaction and uneasiness, so as to be able to say on which side the overplus is. There are the like difficulties and impossibilities in making the due allowances for a change of temper and taste, for satiety, diagnats, ill health-arry of whei render men incapable of enjoying, after they have obtained, what they most eagerly desired. Numberies, too, are the accidents, besides that one of untindy death, which may even probably disappoint the besconcerted schemes, and strong objections are often act to he against them, not to be removed or answered by which seem overbalanced by reasons on the other sile, so as that the certain difficulties and dangers of the pasuit are by every one thought justly disregarded, was account of the appearing greater advantages is on of success, though there be but little probability of it Lastly, every one observes our liableness, if we be set upon our guard, to be deceived by the falsehood of ma, and the false appearances of things; and this days must be greatly increased if there be a strong bias with, supposed from indulged passion, to favour the decil Hence arises that great uncertainty and doubtfulnes of proof, wherein our temporal interest really consiswhat are the most probable means of attaining it, and whether those means will eventually be successful. And numberless instances there are in the daily cours of life, in which all men think it reasonable to engige in pursuits, though the probability is greatly against succeeding, and to make such provision for themselves as it is supposable they may have occasion for, though the plain acknowledged probability is, that they not shall. Then those who think the objection against revelation, from its light not being universal, to be & weight, should observe that the Anthor of Nature, numberless instances, bestows that upon some which he does not upon others, who seem equally to stand in seal of it. Indeed he appears to bestow all his gifts with the most promiscuous variety among creatures of the said species—health and strength, capacities of prodence and of knowledge, means of improvement, riches, and all external advantages. And as there are not any two men found of exactly like shape and features, so it # probable there are not any two of an exactly like constitution, temper, and situation, with regard to goods and evils of life. Yet notwithstanding the uncertainties and varieties, God does exercise a natural government over the world, and there is such a thag # a prudent and imprudent institution of life, with regard to our health and our affairs, under that his passed government. The alians of the Sermous and of the Analogy are innumerable.

John Leland (1691-1766), born at Wigan and educated at Dublin, became a Presbyterian minister in Ireland. He wrote industriously against Tindal, Morgan, and other deists, but is remombered specially from the often-quoted View of the Principal Deistical Writers (1754-56).

William Warburton (1698-1779), Bishop of Gloucester, had a bold and original way of thisking, indomitable self-will and arrogance, ponderos learning, and a gift of copious utterance; he was eager to astonish and arrest the attention of mankind; but his writings, after passing like a splendid meteor across the horizon of his own age.

He had early timeself into notice by his writings, but one cause of his advancement was his friend-h Pope. He had secured the poet's favour ding the ethical and theological orthodoxy Essay on Man, and by writing commenn that and other poems; and Pope in eff him the property or copyright of his works, the value of which Johnson estimated at £4000. Pope had also introduced him to Ralph Allen, one of the wealthiest and most benevolent men of his day, the Squire Allworthy of Fielding's Tom Jones; and Warburton took advantage of this introduction to secure the hand of Allen's niece and obtain a large fortune. To Pope he was also indebted for an acquaintance with Lord Mansfield, through whose influence he was made preacher of Lincoln's Inn (1746). He was remiss in episcopal duties, but was constantly at feud with Bolingbroke and Hume, Voltaire and the deists, as well as with Jortin, Lowth, and Wesley: and his great learning was thrown away on paradoxical speculations. His notes and commentaries on Shakespeare and Pope are lacking in taste and real insight-Douce said that of all Shakespeare's commentators he was 'surely the worst'-but they often display curious erudition and ingenuity. His arrogance and dogmatism became proverbial. His force of character and various learning, always ostentatiously displayed, gave him a high name and authority in his own day; but posterity refused to ratify the judgment.

The Retionalizing of the Greek Mythology.

Here matters rested; and the vulgar faith seems to have remained a long time undisturbed. But as the age grew refined, and the Greeks became inquisitive and learned, the common mythology began to give offence. The speculative and more delicate were shocked at the absurd and immoral stories of their gods, and scandalised to find such things make an authentic part of their story. It may, indeed, be thought matter of wonder how such tales, taken up in a barbarous age, came not to sink into oblivion as the age grew more knowing, from mere abhorrence of their indecencies and shame of their absurdities. Without doubt, this had been their fortune but for an unlucky circumstance. The great poets of Greece, who had most contributed to refine the public taste and manners, and were now grown into a kind of sacred authority, had sanctified these silly legends by their writings, which time had now consigned to immortality.

Vulgar paganism, therefore, in such an age as this, lying open to the attacks of curious and inquisitive men, would not, we may well think, be long at rest. It is true, freethinking then lay under great difficulties and discouragements. To insult the religion of one's country, which is now the mark of learned distinction, was branded in the ancient world with public infamy. Yet freethinkers there were, who, as is their wont, together with the public worship of their country, threw off all reverence for religion in general. Amongst these was Euhemerus, the Messenian, and, by what we can learn, the most distinguished of this tribe. This man, in mere wantonness of heart, began his attacks on religion by divulging the secret of the mysteries. But as it was capital to do this directly and professedly, he contrived to cover his perfidy and malice by the intervention of a kind of Utopian romance. He pretended that in a certain city, which he came to in his travels, he found this grand secret, that the gods were dead men desfied, preserved in their sacred writings, and confirmed by monumental records inscribed to the gods themselves, who were there said to be interred.' So far was not amiss; but then, in the genuine spirit of his class, who never cultivate a truth but in order to graft a lie upon it, he pretended 'that dead mortals were the first gods, and that an imaginary divinity in these early heroes and conquerors created the idea of a superior power, and introduced the practice of religious worship amongst The learned reader sees below, that our freethinker is true to his cause, and endeavours to verify the fundamental principle of his sect, that fear first made gods, even in that very instance where the contrary passion seems to have been at its height, the time when men made gods of their deceased benefactors. A little matter of address hides the shame of so perverse a piece of malice. He represents those founders of society and fathers of their country under the idea of destructive conquerors, who, by mere force and fear, had brought men into subjection and slavery. On this account it was that indignant antiquity concurred in giving Euhemerus the proper name of atheist, which however he would hardly have escaped though he had done no more than divulge the secret of the mysteries, and had not poisoned his discovery with this impious and foreign addition, so contrary to the true spirit of that secret.

This detection had been long dreaded by the orthodox protectors of pagan worship; and they were provided of a temporary defence in their intricate and properly perplexed system of symbolic adoration. But this would do only to stop a breach for the present, till a better could be provided, and was too weak to stand alone against so violent an attack. The philosophers, therefore, now took up the defence of paganism where the priests had left it, and to the others' symbols added their own allegories, for a second cover to the absurdities of the ancient mythology. [Here ancient authorities are quoted.] For all the genuine sects of philosophy, as we have observed, were steady patriots, legislation making one essential part of their philosophy; and to legislate without the foundation of a national religion was, in their opinion, building castles in the air. So that we are not to wonder they took the alarm, and opposed these insulters of the public worship with all their vigour. But as they never lost sight of their proper character, they so contrived that the defence of the national religion should terminate in a recommendation of their philosophic speculations. Hence their support of the public worship and their evasion of Euhemerus's charge turned upon this proposition, 'That the whole ancient mythology was no other than the vehicle of physical, moral, and divine knowledge.' And to this it is that the learned Eusebius refers, where he says 'that a new race of men refined their old gross theology, and gave it an honester look, and brought it nearer to the truth of things.'

However, this proved a troublesome work, and after all ineffectual for the security of men's private morals, which the example of the licentious story according to the letter would not fail to influence, how well soever the allegoric interpretation was calculated to cover the public honour of religion; so that the more ethical of the philosophers grew peevish with what gave them so much trouble, and answered so little to the interior of religious practice. This made them break out from time to time into hasty resentments against their capital poets; unsuitable, one would think, to the dignity of the authors of such noble recondite truths as they would persuade us to believe were treasured up in their writings. Hence it was that Plato banished Homer from his republic, and that Pythagoras, in one of his extra-mundane adventures, saw both Homer and Heisel doing penance in hell, and hung up there for example, to be bleached and purified from the grossness and pollution of their ideas.

The first of these allegorisers, as we learn from Lartius, was Anaxagoras, who, with his friend Metrodora, turned Homer's mythology into a system of ethics. Net came Hereclides Ponticus, and of the same fables make as good a system of physics. . . And last of all, who the necessity became more pressing, Proclus undetook to shew that all Homer's fables were no other than physical, ethical, and moral allegories.

Colley Cibber (1671-1757), actor, manager, and dramatist, was born in London, the son of the Holstein sculptor, Caius Gabriel Cibber or Cibert, who settled in England during the Commonwealth, and executed sculptures for the London Monument, the old Royal Exchange, Bethlehem Hospital, St Paul's, and Chatsworth. Young Colley, named after his mother's family, was educated at Grantham, and in 1690 joined the Theatre Royal in Drury Lane, where he remained, with short intervals, during his whole theatrical career of forty-three years. In 1696 he produced his first comedy, Love's Last Shift, himself playing Sir Novelty Fashion, and so established his fame both as dramatist and actor. About thirty pieces are ascribed to him, some of them tragedies and some 'musical entertainments and farces.' Not a few are rechauffes from Shakespeare, Beaumont and Fletcher, Dryden, and others, two or more plays being sometimes ingeniously welded into a new one. Several are from the French. Among the best known are Woman's Wit, She Would and She Would Not, and The Provoked Husband (the latter completed from Vanbrugh's manuscript). Cibber contributed largely to the improvement in decency which followed Jeremy Collier's famous philippic in 1698; his comedies do not rely for ludicrous effects on the outraged husband. He was a strong Hanoverian, and as poet-laureate from 1730 onwards wrote some sufficiently tiresome and absurd odes. But even they could not justify Pope in making Cibber the hero (in place of Theobald) in the 1743 issue of the Dunciad, where these lines occur:

How with less reading than makes felons 'scape, Less human genius than God gives an ape, Small thanks to France and none to Rome or Greece, A past, vamped, future, old, revived, new piece 'Twixt Plautus, Fletcher, Congreve and Corneille Can make a Cibber, Johnson, or Ozell.

Cibber was no poet; he was vain and a loose liver, but he was assuredly not a dullard. Pope's first sneers, in the early editions of the Dunciad and elsewhere, Cibber took good-humouredly enough. As Pope grew more abusive, the other became aggressive in self-defence, and by his retaliatory pamphlets and scurrilous stories had the satisfaction of making his sensitive foe writhe with vexation. Cibber had the misfortune to have Fielding also for a persistent enemy, for reasons not so easily discovered. Fielding was severe on him for his alterations on Shakespeare's plays, of one of which Cibber had self-complacently said, 'I have endeavoured to make it more like a play than I found it in Shakespeare.' Strange to say, Cibber's modification of Richard III., with the famous line 'Off with his head! so much for Buckingham!' had almost undisputed possession of the stage in London till Mr Irving restored the Shakespearean tradition. The Nonjuror, an adaptation of Molière's Tartuffe, was of course ultra-loyal, and survives in The Hypocrite, still Towards the close of occasionally performed. the nineteenth century Mr Augustus Daly and his American company revived She Would and She Would Not, unquestionably one of Cibber's best comedies. His own Apology for the Life of Mr Colley Cibber, Comedian (1740; new edition by Lowe, 1888), is a greater literary success than any of his plays; it is a really interesting autobiography as well as a lively history of the stage in his own time, though the statements are at times both vague and inaccurate.—His son, Theophilus (1703-58), was also an actor and dramatist.

The following extract from She Would and She Would Not deals with two ladies travelling disguised as men, an attendant, and

An Innkeeper's Welcome.

Host. Did you call, gentlemen?

Trappanti. Yes, and bawl too, sir: here, the gentlemen are almost famished, and nobody comes near 'em: what have you in the house now that will be ready presently?

Host. You may have what you please, sir.

Hypolita. Can you get us a partridge?

Host. Sir, we have no partridges; but we'll get you what you please in a moment: we have a very good neck of mutton, sir; if you please it shall be clapt down in a moment.

Hyp. Have you no pigeons or chickens?

Host. Truly, sir, we have no fowl in the house at present; if you please, you may have any thing else in a moment.

Hyp. Then prithee get us some young rabbits.

Host. Upon my word, sir, rabbits are so scarce they are not to be had for money.

Flora. Have you any fish?

Host. Fish! Sir, I drest yesterday the finest dish that ever came upon a table; I am sorry we have none left, sir; but, if you please, you may have any thing else in a moment.

Trap. Pox on thee, hast thou nothing but any-thingelse in the house?

Host. Very good mutton, sir.

Hyp. Prithee get us a breast then.

Host. Breast! Don't you love the neck, sir?

Hyp. Ha' ye nothing in the house but the neck?

Host. Really, sir, we don't use to be so unprovided, but at present we have nothing else left.

Trap. Faith, sir, I don't know but a nothing-else may be very good meat, when any-thing-else is not to be had.

Hyp. Then prithee, friend, let's have thy neck of mutton before that is gone too.

Trap. Sir, he shall lay it down this minute, I'll see it done: gentlemen, I'll wait upon ye presently; for a minute I must beg your pardon, and leave to lay the cloth myself.

Hyp. By no means, sir.

Trap. No ceremony, dear sir; indeed I'll do't.

On his Critics.

Here perhaps I may again seem to be vain; but if all these facts are true (as true they are) how can I help it? Why am I obliged to conceal them? The merit of the best of them is not so extraordinary as to have warned me to be nice upon it; and the praise due to them is so small a fish, it was scarce worth while to throw my line into the water for it. If I confess my vanity while a boy, can it be vanity when a man to remember it? And if I have a tolerable feature, will not that as much belong to my picture as an imperfection? In a word, from what I have mentioned, I would observe only this; that when we are conscious of the least comparative merit in ourselves, we should take as much care to conceal the value we set upon it as if it were a real defect. To be elated or vain upon it, is showing your money before people in want; ten to one but some who may think you have too much may borrow, or pick your pocket, before you get home. He who assumes praise to himself, the world will think overpays himself. Even the suspicion of being vain ought as much to be dreaded as the guilt itself. Cæsar was of the same opinion in regard to his wife's chastity. Praise, though it may be our due, is not like a bankbill, to be paid upon demand; to be valuable it must be voluntary. When we are dunned for it, we have a right and privilege to refuse it. If compulsion insists upon it, it can only be paid, as persecution in points of faith is, in a counterfeit coin; and who ever believed occasional conformity to be sincere? Nero, the most vain coxcomb of a tyrant that ever breathed, could not raise an unfeigned applause of his harp by military execution; even where praise is deserved, ill-nature and self-conceit (passions that poll a majority of mankind) will with less reluctance part with their money than their approbation. Men of the greatest merit are forced to stay till they die, before the world will fairly make up their account; then indeed you have a chance for your full due, because it is less grudged when you are incapable of enjoying it: then perhaps even malice shall heap praises upon your memory, though not for your sake, but that your surviving competitors may suffer by a comparison. It is from the same principle that satire shall have a thousand readers where panegyric has one. When I therefore find my name at length in the satirical works of our most celebrated living author, I never look upon those lines as malice meant to me (for he knows I never provoked it) but profit to himself: one of his points must be to have many readers. He considers that my face and name are more known than those of many thousands of more consequence in the kingdom; that therefore, right or wrong, a lick at the laureat will always be a sure bait, ad captandum vulgus, to catch hum little readers; and that to gratify the unlearned, by mow and then interspersing those merry sacrifices of an old acquaintance to their taste, is a piece of quite right poetical craft.

But as a little bad poetry is the greatest crime he lays to my charge, I am willing to subscribe to his opinion of it. That this sort of wit is one of the easiest ways too of pleasing the generality of readers, is evident from the comfortable subsistence which our weekly retailers of politics have been known to pick up, merely by making bold with a government that had unfortunately neglected to find their genus a better employment.

Hence too arises all that flat poverty of censure and invective that so often has a run in our public papers, upon the success of a new author; when, God knows, there is seldom above one writer, among hundreds in being at the same time, whose satire a man of common sense ought to be moved at. When a master in the art is angry, then indeed we ought to be alarmed! How terrible a weapon is satire in the hand of a great genius! Yet even there how liable is prejudice to misuse it! How far, when general, it may reform our morals, or what cruelties it may inflict by being angrily particular, is perhaps above my reach to determine. shall therefore only beg leave to interpose what I feel for others whom it may personally have fallen upon. When I read those mortifying lines of our most eminent author in his character of Atticus-(Atticus, whose genius in verse, and whose morality in prose, has been so justly admired)-though I am charmed with the poetry, my imagination is hurt at the severity of it; and though I allow the satirist to have had personal provocation, yet methinks, for that very reason, he ought not to have troubled the public with it. For, as it is observed in the 242d Tatler, 'in all terms of reproof, where the sentence appears to anse from personal hatred or passion, it is not then made the cause of mankind, but a misunderstanding between two persons.' But if such kind of satire has its incontestable greatness, if its exemplary brightness may not mislead inferior wits into a barbarous imitation of its severity, then I have only admired the verses, and exposed myself by bringing them under so scrupulous a reflection. But the pain which the acrimony of those verses gave me is in some measure allayed, in finding that this inimitable writer, as he advances in years, has since had candour enough to celebrate the same person for his visible merit. Happy genius I whose verse, like the eye of beauty, can heal the deepest wounds with the least glance of favour.

Since I am got so far into this subject, you must give me leave to go through all I have a mind to say upon it; because I am not sure that in a more proper place my memory may be so full of it. I cannot find therefore from what reason satire is allowed more license than comedy, or why either of them (to be admired) ought not to be limited by decency and justice. Let Juvenal and Aristophanes have taken what liberties they please, if the learned have nothing more than their antiquity to justify their laying about them at that enormous rate, I shall wish they had a better excuse for them. The personal ridicule and scurrility thrown upon Socrates, which Plutarch too condemns, and the boldness of Juvenal in writing real names over guilty characters, I cannot think are to be pleaded in right of our modern liberties of the same kind, Facit indignatio versus my be a very spirited expression, and seems to give a realhopes of a lively entertainment; but I am afraid reped is in unequal hands, when anger is its executioner; mi though an outrageous invective may carry some trub a it, yet it will never have that natural easy credit with a which we give to the laughing ironies of a cool bed The satire that can smile circum pracordia ludit, ad seldom fails to bring the reader quite over to his ale whenever ridicule and folly are at variance. But when a person satirized is used with the extremest rigor, ke may sometimes meet with compassion instead of our tempt, and throw back the odium that was designed in him upon the author. When I would therefore dates the satirist of this indignation, I mean little more than that I would take from him all private or persons prejudice, and would still leave him as much general vice to scourge as he pleases, and that with as not fire and spirit as art and nature demand to enlyes is work and keep his reader awake. Sir P. Sir, that was not levelled at you, but at the lonel, in order to try his bottom; but they aw agreed t you and I should drink out of sma' glasses.

Eger. But, sir, I beg pardon: I did not choose to nk any more.

ir P. But, zoons! sir, I tell you there was a necessity your drinking more.

Eger. A necessity! in what respect, pray, sir?

sir P. Why, sir, I have a certain point to carry, ependent of the lawyers, with my lord, in this agreent of your marriage; about which I am afraid we ll have a warm squabble; and therefore I wanted ir assistance in it.

Eger. But how, sir, could my drinking contribute to ist you in your squabble?

Sir P. Yes, sir, it would have contributed—and greatly ve contributed to assist me.

Eger. How so, sir?

Sir P. Nay, sir, it might have prevented the squabble irely; for as my lord is proud of you for a son-in-law, I is fond of your little French songs, your stories, and r bon-mots, when you are in the humour; and guin had but staid, and been a little jolly, and drank half ore bumpers with him, till he had got a little tipsy, n sure, when we had him in that mood, we might settled the point as I could wish it among ourselves, re the lawyers came: but now, sir, I do not ken t will be the consequence.

ger. But when a man is intoxicated, would that have a seasonable time to settle business, sir?

Fr. The most seasonable, sir; for sir, when my is in his cups, his suspicion is asleep, and his heart w jollity, fun, and guid fellowship; and sir, can e be a happier moment than that for a bargain, or attle a dispute with a friend? What is it you shrug rour shoulders at, sir?

Ger. At my own ignorance, sir: for I understand her the philosophy nor the morality of your doctrine. For P. I know you do not, sir: and, what is worse, never wull understand it, as you proceed: in one d, Charles, I have often told you, and now again I you, once for aw, that the manœuvres of pliability as necessary to rise in the world, as wrangling and cal subtlety are to rise at the bar: why you see, I have acquired a noble fortune, a princely fortune: how do you think I raised it?

iger. Doubtless, sir, by your abilities.

ir P. Doubtless, sir, you are a blockhead: nae, sir, tell you how I raised it: sir, I raised it—by booing, us ridiculously low] by booing: sir, I never could stand straight in the presence of a great mon, but always booed, and booed, and booed—as it were by instinct.

Eger. How do you mean by instinct, sir?

Sir P. How do I mean by instinct \(\) Why, sir, I mean by—by—by the instinct of interest, sir, which is the universal instinct of mankind. Sir, it is wonderful to think what a cordial, what an amicable—nay, what an infallible influence booing has upon the pride and vanity of human nature. Charles, answer me sincerely, have you a mind to be convinced of the force of my doctrine by example and demonstration?

Eger. Certainly, sir.

Sir P. Then, sir, as the greatest favour I can confer upon you, I'll give you a short sketch of the stages of my booing, as an excitement, and a landmark for you to boo by, and as an infallible nostrum for a man of the world to rise in the world.

Eger. Sir, I shall be proud to profit by your experience.

Sir P. Vary weel, sir; sit ye down then, sit you down here. [They sit down.] And now, sir, you must recall to your thoughts, that your grandfather was a mon whose penurious income of captain's half-pay was the sum-total of his fortune; and, sir, aw my provision fra him was a modicum of Latin, an expertness in arithmetic, and a short system of worldly counsel; the principal ingredients of which were, a persevering industry, a rigid economy, a smooth tongue, a pliability of temper, and a constant attention to make every mon well pleased with himself.

Eger. Very prudent advice, sir.

Sir P. Therefore, sir, I lay it before you. Now, sir, with these materials, I set out a raw-boned stripling fra the North, to try my fortune with them here in the south; and my first step in the world was a beggarly clerkship in Sawny Gordon's counting-house, here, in the city of London: which you'll say afforded but a barren sort of a prospect.

Eger. It was not a very fertile one, indeed, sir.

Sir P. The reverse, the reverse: weel, sir, seeing myself in this unprofitable situation, I reflected deeply; I cast about my thoughts morning, noon, and night, and marked every mon, and every mode of prosperity; at last, I concluded that a matrimonial adventure, prudently conducted, would be the readiest gait I could gang for the bettering of my condition; and accordingly I set about it. Now, sir, in this pursuit, beauty! beauty! ah! beauty often struck my een, and played about my heart: and fluttered, and beat, and knocked, and knocked: but the devil an entrance I ever let it get: for I observed, sir, that beauty is, generally,—a proud, vain, saucy, expensive, impertinent sort of a commodity.

Eger. Very justly observed.

Sir P. And therefore, sir, I left it to prodigals and coxcombs, that could afford to pay for it; and, in its stead, sir, mark!—I looked out for an ancient, weel-jointured, superannuated dowager; a consumptive, toothless, phthisicky, wealthy widow; or a shrivelled, cadaverous piece of deformity, in the shape of an izzard, or an appersi-and—or, in short, ainything, ainything that had the siller—the siller—for that, sir, was the north star of my affections. Do you take me, sir? was nae that right?

Eger. O! doubtless, doubtless, sir.

Sir P. Now, sir, where do you think I ganged to look for this woman with the siller? nae till court, nae till playhouses or assemblies; nae, sir, I ganged till the kirk, till the anabaptist, independent, Bradlonian, and Muggletonian meetings; till the morning and evening service of churches and chapels of ease, and till the midnight, melting, conciliating love feasts of the methodists; and there, sir, at last, I fell upon an old, slighted, antiquated, musty maiden, that looked—ha, ha, ha! she looked just like a skeleton in a surgeon's glass case. Now, sir, this miserable object was religiously angry with herself and aw the world; had nae comfort but in metaphysical visions and supernatural deliriums—ha, ha, ha! Sir, she was as mad—as mad as a Bedlamite.

Eger. Not improbable, sir: there are numbers of poor creatures in the same condition.

Sir P. O! numbers—numbers. Now, sir, this cracked creature used to pray, and sing, and sigh, and groan, and weep, and wail, and gnash her teeth constantly, morning and evening, at the tabernacle in Moorfields. And as soon as I found she had the siller, aha! good traith, I plumped me down upon my knees, close by her-cheek by jowl-and prayed, and sighed, and sung, and groaned, and gnashed my teeth as vehemently as she could do for the life of her; ay, and turned up the whites of mine een, till the strings awmost cracked again. I watched her motions, handed her till her chair, waited on her home, got most religiously intimate with her in a week; married her in a fortnight, buried her in a month; touched the siller; and with a deep suit of mourning, a melancholy port, a sorrowful visage, and a joyful heart, I began the world again; (rises) and this, sir, was the first boo, that is the first effectual boo I ever made till the vanity of human nature. Now, sir, do you understand this doctrine?

Eger. Perfectly well, sir.

Sir P. Ay, but was it not right? was it not ingenious, and weel hit off?

Eger. Certainly, sir: extremely well.

Sir P. My next boo, sir, was till your ain mother, whom I ran away with fra the boarding-school; by the interest of whose family I got a guid smart place in the treasury; and, sir, my vary next step was in till parliament; the which I entered with as ardent and as determined an ambition as ever agitated the heart of Cæsar himself. Sir, I booed, and watched, and hearkened, and ran about, backwards and forwards, and attended, and dangled upon the then great mon, till I got into the vary bowels of his confidence; and then sir, I wriggled, and wrought, and wriggled, till I wriggled myself among the very thick of them. Ha! I got my snack of the clothing, the foraging, the contracts, the lottery tickets, and all the political bonuses, till at length, sir, I became a much wealthier man than one half of the golden calves I had been so long a booing to: and was nae that booing to some purpose?

Eger. It was indeed, sir.

Sir P. But are you convinced of the guid effects and of the utility of booing?

Eger. Thoroughly, sir.

Sir P. Sir, it is infallible. But, Charles, ah! while I was thus booing, and wriggling, and raising this princely fortune, ah! I met with many heartsores and disappointments fra the want of literature, eloquence, and other popular abselities. Sir, guin I could but have spoken in the house, I should have done the deed in half the time; but the instant I opened my mouth there they aw fell a laughing at me; aw which deficiencies, si, I determined, at any expense, to have supplied by the polished education of a son, who I hoped would one day raise the house of Macsycophant till the highest pitch of ministerial ambition. This, sir, is my plan; I have done my part of it; Nature has done hers; you are popular, you are eloquent; aw parties like and respect you; and now, sir, it only remains for you to be directed—completion follows.

Eger. Your liberality, sir, in my education, is no obligation I shall ever remember with the deepes his gratitude.

Sir P. Vary weel, sir: but, Charles, have you had my conversation yet with Lady Rodolpha, about the day of your marriage; your liveries, your equipage; or your domestic establishment?

Eger. Not yet, sir.

Sir P. Poh! why there again, now, you are wrong; vary wrong.

Eger. Sir, we have not had an opportunity.

Sir P. Why, Charles, you are very tardy in this business.

Lord Lumbercourt. [Sings without, flushed with win.]

'What have we with day to do?'

Sir P. O! here comes my lord.

Lord L. 'Sons of care, 'twas made for you.' [Enter, drinking a dish of coffee.] 'Sons of care, 'twas made for you.' Very good coffee indeed, Mr Tomlins. 'Sons of care, 'twas made for you.' Here, Mr Tomlins.

Tom. Will your lordship please to have another dish?

Lord L. No more, Mr Tomlins. Ha, ha, ha! my host of the Scotch pints, we have had warm work.

Sir P. Yes, you pushed the bottle about, my lord, with the joy and vigour of a bacchanal.

Lord L. That I did, my dear Mac; no loss of time with me: I have but three motions, old boy—charge, toast, fire—and off we go. Ha, ha, ha, that's my exercise.

Sir P. And fine warm exercise it is, my lord; especially with the half-pint glasses.

Another characteristic speech by Sir Pertinal, addressed also to his son, is:

Conscience! why you are mad! Did you ever hear any man talk of conscience in political matters? Conscience, quotha! I have been in parliament these three and thraty years, and never heard the term made use of before. Sir, it is an unparliamentary word, and you will be laughed at for it.

There are careful Lives of Macklin by F. A. Congreve (1798) and Parry (1891). Those by Kirkman (1799) and Cooke (1804) must be used with caution.

George Lillo (1693-1739), born in London of mixed Dutch and English Dissenting parentage, succeeded his father as a jeweller, carried on the business successfully, and left a modest fortune. Devoting his leisure hours to writing tragedies founded on the sorrows of real life in the lower and middling ranks, he wrote in all seven dramas, among them George Barnwell, Fatal Curiosity, and Arden of Feversham. The last is a weak version of an anonymous tragedy written in 1592, where, and in the Yorkshire Tragedy and one or two other plays founded on domestic occurrences, the style of Lillo may be said to have been foreshadowed. These realistic plays, however (see Vol. I. p. 334), were rude and irregular, and were driven off the stage by the romantic drama of Shakespeare and his successors. At all events such 'domestic tragedies,' which had disappeared during the Commonwealth and Restoration, were revived by Lillo and his school, who had great influence on French dramatists. Lillo had a competent knowledge of dramatic art, and his style was generally smooth and easy. His George Barnwell (1731) describes the career of a London apprentice hurried on to ruin and murder by an infamous woman, who at last delivers him up to justice and to an ignominious death. The characters are natural; and 'George Barnwell drew more tears than the rants of Alexander the Great.' Lillo's Fatal Curiosity (1736) is a far higher work. Driven by destitution, an old man and his wife murder a rich stranger who takes shelter in their house, and discover too late that they have murdered their son returned after a long absence abroad. The harrowing details of this tragedy are powerfully depicted; the agonies of old Wilmot, the father, make an appalling picture. The other plays were Marina, an adaptation of Shakespeare's Pericles; Scanderbeg, or the Christian Hero; Elmerick, based on a passage of Hungarian history; and a feeble masque, Britannia and Batavia. Fielding's friendship helped Lillo's Popularity; and after the dramatist's death Fielding said of him that 'he had the spirit of an old Roman, joined to the innocence of a primitive Christian.' A parallel to Lillo's realism has been sought, not merely in a succession of imitations on the stage, but in Fielding's novels and in Lessing's rebellion against French taste in the German theatre. The execution of Lillo's plays is unequal, and some of his characters are dull and common-Place; but he was a forcible painter of the darker shades of humble life. His plays kept the stage till the close of the century; since then the taste for murders and public executions has declined.

(Young Wilmot, unknown, enters the house of his parents, and, returng for an hour's rest, delivers them a casket. Act iii. opens on Agoes, the mother, alone, with the casket in her hand]

Agnes. Who should this stranger be? And then this He says it is of value, and yet trusts it, fcasket-As if a trifle, to a stranger's hand. His confidence amazes me. Perhaps It is not what he says. I'm strongly tempted To open it and see. No; let it rest. Why should my curiosity excite me To search and pry into the affairs of others, Who have to employ my thoughts so many cares And sorrows of my own? With how much ease The spring gives way! Surprising! most prodigious! My eyes are dazzled, and my ravished heart Leaps at the glorious sight. How bright's the lustre, How immense the worth of those fair jewels! Ay, such a treasure would expel for ever

Base poverty and all its abject train; The mean devices we're reduced to use To keep out famine, and preserve our lives From day to day; the cold neglect of friends; The galling scorn, or more provoking pity Of an insulting world. Possessed of these, Plenty, content, and power, might take their turn, And lofty pride bare its aspiring head At our approach, and once more bend before us. A pleasing dream! 'Tis past; and now I wake More wretched by the happiness I 've lost; For sure it was a happiness to think, Though but a moment, such a treasure mine-Nay, it was more than thought. I saw and touched The bright temptation, and I see it yet. 'Tis here—'tis mine—I have it in possession. Must I resign it? Must I give it back? Am I in love with misery and want, To rob myself and court so vast a loss? Retain it then. But how? There is a way. Why sinks my heart? Why does my blood run cold? Why am I thrilled with horror? 'Tis not choice, flittle pains But dire necessity, suggests the thought. Old Wilmot [entering]. The mind contented, with how The wandering senses yield to soft repose, And die to gain new life! He's fallen asleep Already-happy man! What dost thou think, My Agnes, of our unexpected guest? He seems to me a youth of great humanity: Just ere he closed his eyes, that swam in tears, He wrong my hand, and pressed it to his lips; And with a look that pierced me to the soul, Begged me to comfort thee, and ____ Dost thou hear me? What art thou gazing on? Fie, 'tis not well. This casket was delivered to you closed: Why have you opened it? Should this be known, How mean must we appear ! And who shall know it?

Agnes. And who shall know it?

Wil. There is a kind of pride, a decent dignity

Due to ourselves, which, spite of our misfortunes,

May be maintained and cherished to the last.

To live without reproach, and without leave

To quit the world, shews sovereign contempt

And noble scorn of its relentless malice.

Agner. Shews sovereign madness, and a scorn of sense! Pursue no further this detested theme:
I will not die. I will not leave the world
For all that you can urge, until compelled.

Wil. To chase a shadow when the setting sun
Is darting his last rays, were just as wise
As your anxiety for fleeting life,
Now the last means for its support are failing:
Were famine not as mortal as the sword
This warmth might be excused. But take thy choice:
Die how you will, you shall not die alone.

Agnes. Nor live, I hope.

Wil. There is no fear of that.

Agues. Then we'll live both.

Wil. Strange folly! Where's the means?

Agnes. The means are there; those jewels.

Wil. Ha! take heed;

Wil. Ha! take Perhaps thou dost but try me; yet take heed There's nought so monstrous but the mind of man

In some conditions may be brought to approve;
Theft, sacrilege, treason, and parricide,
When flattering opportunity entired

And desperation drove, have been committed By those who once would start to hear them named.

Agnes. And add to these detested suicide, Which, by a crime much less, we may avoid.

Wil. The inhospitable murder of our guest? How couldst thou form a thought so very tempting, So advantageous, so secure, and easy; And yet so cruel, and so full of horror?

Agnes. 'Tis less impiety, less against nature, To take another's life than end our own.

Wil. It is no matter whether this or that Be in itself the less or greater crime:
Howe'er we may deceive ourselves or others,
We act from inclination, not by rule,
Or none could act amiss. And that all err,
None but the conscious hypocrite denies.
Oh, what is man, his excellence and strength,
When in an hour of trial and desertion,
Reason, his noblest power, may be suborned
To plead the cause of vile assassination!

Agnes. You're too severe: reason may justly plead For her own preservation.

Wil. Rest contented: Whate'er resistance I may seem to make, I am betrayed within: my will's seduced, And my whole soul infected. The desire Of life returns, and brings with it a train Of appetites that rage to be supplied. Whoever stands to parley with temptation Does it to be o'ercome.

Agnes. Then nought remains
But the swift execution of a deed
That is not to be thought on or delayed.
We must despatch him sleeping: should he wake,
'Twere madness to attempt it.

Wil. True, his strength,
Single, is more, much more than ours united;
So may his life, perhaps, as far exceed
Ours in duration, should he 'scape this snare.
Generous, unhappy man! Oh, what could move thee
To put thy life and fortune in the hands
Of wretches mad with anguish!

Agnes. By what means By stabbing, suffocation, or by strangling, Shall we effect his death?

Wil. Why, what a fiend! How cruel, how remorseless, how impatient Have pride and poverty made thee!

Agnes. Barbarous man!

Whose wasteful riots ruined our estate,
And drove our son, ere the first down had spread
His rosy cheeks, spite of my sad presages,
Earnest entreaties, agonies, and tears,
To seek his bread 'mongst strangers, and to perish
In some remote inhospitable land.
The loveliest youth in person and in mind
That ever crowned a groaning mother's pains!
Where was thy pity, where thy patience then?
Thou cruel husband! thou unnatural father!
Thou most remorseless, most ungrateful man!
To waste my fortune, rob me of my son,
To drive me to despair, and then reproach me
For being what thou'st made me.

Wil. Dry thy tears:
I ought not to reproach thee. I confess
That thou hast suffered much: so have we both.

But chide no more: I'm wrought up to thy purpose.
The poor ill-fated unsuspecting victim,
Ere he reclined him on the fatal couch,
From which he's ne'er to rise, took off the sash
And costly dagger that thou saw'st him wear;
And thus, unthinking, furnished us with arms
Against himself. What shall I use?

Agnes. The sash.

If you make use of that, I can assist.

Wil. No, 'tis a dreadful office, and I 'll spare
Thy trembling hands the guilt. Steal to the door,
And bring me word if he be still asleep. [Exit Aqua.
Or I 'm deceived, or he pronounced himself
The happiest of mankind. Deluded wretch!
Thy thoughts are perishing; thy youthful joys,
Touched by the icy hand of grisly death,
Are withering in their bloom. But though extinguished,
He 'll never know the loss, nor feel the bitter
Pangs of disappointment. Then I was wrong
In counting him a wretch: to die well pleased
Is all the happiest of mankind can hope for.
To be a wretch is to survive the loss
Of every joy, and even hope itself,

For, by the anguish of my tortured soul,

He's to be envied, if compared with me.

There is a memoir of Lillo prefixed to an edition of his dramatic.

As I have done. Why do I mourn him then?

works by T. Davies (2nd ed. 1810).

John Byrom (1692-1763) was born near Manchester. He took his degree at Trinity College, Cambridge, in 1712, and studied medicine at Montpellier in France. On his return be applied himself to teach a system of shorthand which he had invented. Among his pupils were Gibbon and Horace Walpole; Bentley, Hoadly, Bishop Butler, John Wesley, Hartley, and William Law were amongst his friends. The latter part of Byrom's life was spent in easy circumstances; he succeeded by the death of an elder brother to the family property in and about Manchester, and there he lived highly respected. His poetry has the virtue of a genuine simplicity, and is sometimes pointed and rhythmical, rarely melodious; often it is mere doggerel, or measured lengths of rhymed prose. He put everything into rhymetheological and historical arguments, petitions to the king, and even translations from the mystical theology of Ruysbrock, Boehme, and Law (of the Serious Call). He was very much of a mystic himself, regarded Malebranche as the greatest of divines and philosophers, and admired Fénelon and the visionary Madame Bourignon; but he met in a friendly way heretics like Whiston and deists like Collins. Throughout life he was strongly Jacobite, though he avoided compromising himself. Byrom's (not Swift's) was the famous epigram about the dispute between Handel and Buononcini:

> Some say, compared to Bononcini, That Mynheer Handel's but a ninny; Others aver that he to Handel Is scarcely fit to hold a candle. Strange all this difference should be 'Twixt tweedle-dum and tweedle-dee!

tin verse also is pointed rather than Some of his smartest things are in broad e dialect, such as the dialogue on the rs' in Lancashire in 1745. His Colin and itributed to the Spectator in 1714, gave standing as a poet. Phebe was said een Jug Bentley, the sprightly daughter eat Master of Trinity. But an early rearnestly denied this, and with some d the poem was really addressed to his sister, Phebe Byrom. The Journal is ossiping record, which adds little to our of the public events of the period, ts its author as an opinionative, kindly, nd happy man.

Colin and Phebe-A Pastoral.

ne, O ye Muses, was happily spent, nebe went with me wherever I went; sand sweet pleasures I felt in my breast: er fond shepherd like Colin was blest! she is gone, and has left me behind, narvellous change on a sudden I find! ings seemed as fine as could possibly be, t'twas the Spring; but alas! it was she.

uch a companion to tend a few sheep, p and play, or to lie down and sleep: humoured made me, so cheerful and gay, was as light as a feather all day; I so cross and so peevish am grown, jely uneasy, as never was known.

The is gone, and my joys are all drowned, heart, I am sure, weighs more than a pound.

untain that wont to run sweetly along, ce to soft murmurs the pebbles among; ow'st, little Cupid, if Phebe was there, easure to look at, 'twas music to hear: she is absent, I walk by its side, , as it murmurs, do nothing but chide: u be so cheerful, while I go in pain? ere with your bubbling, and hear me complain.'

nbkins around me would oftentimes play, be and I were as joyful as they; asant their sporting, how happy their time, oring, Love, and Beauty were all in their prime! in their frolics when by me they pass, their fleeces a handful of grass; 'then I cry, 'for it makes me quite mad ou so merry while I am so sad.'

g I was ever well pleased to see ugging his tail to my fair one and me; be was pleased too, and to my dog said: ither, poor fellow; and patted his head., when he's fawning, I with a sour look rah, and give him a blow with my crook: give him another; for why should not Tray ll as his master, when Phebe's away?

walking with Phebe, what sights have I seen, was the flower, how fresh was the green! lovely appearance the trees and the shade, i-fields and hedges, and everything made!

But now she has left me, they all are in tears, Not one of them half so delightful appears: Twas nought but the magic, I find, of her eyes Which made all these beautiful prospects arise.

Sweet music attended us all the wood through, The lark, linnet, throstle, and nightingale too; Winds over us whispered, flocks by us did bleat, And chirp went the grasshopper under our feet. But now she is absent, though still they sing on, The woods are but lonely, the melody's gone: Her voice in the concert, as now I have found, Gave everything else its agreeable sound.

Rose, what is become of thy delicate hue?
And where is the violet's beautiful blue?
Does aught of its sweetness the blossom beguile?
That meadow, those daisies, why do they not smile?
Ah rivals! I see what it was that you drest
And made yourselves fine for—a place in her breast:
You put on your colours to pleasure her eye,
To be plucked by her hand, on her bosom to die.

How slowly Time creeps till my Phebe return!
While amidst the soft zephyr's cool breezes I burn:
Methinks, if I knew whereabouts he would tread,
I could breathe on his wings: it would melt down the Fly swifter, ye minutes, bring hither my dear, And rest so much longer for 't when she is here. Ah Colin! old Time is quite full of delay, Nor will budge one foot faster for all thou canst say.

Will no pitying power that hears me complain, Or cure my disquiet, or soften my pain?

To be cured, thou must, Colin, thy passion remove; But what swain is so silly to live without love?

No, deity, bid the dear nymph to return,

For ne'er was poor shepherd so sadly forlorn.

Ah, what shall I do? I shall die with despair;

Take heed, all ye swains, how ye part with your fair.

Of the following poem (in some editions described as in imitation of Sir Philip Sidney), Southey strained a good point when he said it was 'so perfectly in the manner of Elizabeth's age, that we can hardly believe it to be an imitation, but are almost disposed to think that Byrom had transscribed it from some old author.'

Careless Content.

I am content, I do not care,
Wag as it will the world for me;
When fuss and fret was all my fare,
It got no ground as I could see:
So when away my caring went,
I counted cost, and was content.

With more of thanks and less of thought,
I strive to make my matters meet;
To seek what ancient sages sought,
Physic and food in sour and sweet:
To take what passes in good part,
And keep the hiccups from the heart.

With good and gentle-humoured hearts, I choose to chat where'er I come, Whate'er the subject be that starts; But if I get among the glum, I hold my tongue to tell the troth, And keep my breath to cool my broth.

For chance or change of peace or pain,
For Fortune's favour or her frown,
For lack or glut, for loss or gain,
I never dodge nor up nor down:
But swing what way the ship shall swim,
Or tack about with equal trim.

I suit not where I shall not speed,
Nor trace the turn of every tide;
If simple sense will not succeed,
I make no bustling, but abide:
For shining wealth, or scaring woe,
I force no friend, I fear no foe.

Of ups and downs, of ins and outs,
Of they 're i' the wrong, and we 're i' the right,
I shun the rancours and the routs;
And wishing well to every wight,
Whatever turn the matter takes,
I deem it all but ducks and drakes.

With whom I feast I do not fawn,
Nor if the folks should flout me, faint;
If wonted welcome be withdrawn,
I cook no kind of a complaint:
With none disposed to disagree,
But like them best who best like me.

Not that I rate myself the rule
How all my betters should behave;
But fame shall find me no man's fool,
Nor to a set of men a slave:
I love a friendship free and frank,
And hate to hang upon a hank.

Fond of a true and trusty tie,

I never loose where'er I link;

Though if a business budges by,

I talk thereon just as I think;

My word, my work, my heart, my hand,

Still on a side together stand.

If names or notions make a noise,
Whatever hap the question hath,
The point impartially I poise,
And read or write, but without wrath;
For should I burn or break my brains,
Pray who will pay me for my pains?

I love my neighbour as myself,
Myself like him too, by his leave;
Nor to his pleasure, power, or pelf,
Came I to crouch, as I conceive:
Dame Nature doubtless has designed
A man the monarch of his mind.

Now taste and try this temper, sirs,
Mood it and brood it in your breast;
Or if ye ween, for worldly stirs,
That man does right to mar his rest,
Let me be deft, and debonair,
I am content I do not care.

The following is a fair specimen of Byrom's theological argumentation (against Sherlock):

When tempted Adam, yielding to deceit,
Presumed of the fordidden tree to eat,
The Bishop tells us that he did not die:
Pray will you ask him, sir, the reason why?
Why he would contradict the sacred text,
Where death to sin so surely is annexed.
'The day thou eatest' are the words, you know,
And yet by his account, it was not so. . . .

The often-sung hymn, 'Christians awake, salute the happy morn,' is a selection from Byrom's Christmas Carol. The following is his happiest jeu d'esprit:

Jacobite Toast.

God bless the king, God bless the Faith's Defender, God bless—no harm in blessing—the Pretender. But who Pretender is, and who is king, God bless us all! that's quite another thing.

Byrom's poems were republished, with Life and notes, in 184; were included in Chalmers's Poets; and were re-edited in 1894; by Prof. Ward for the Chetham Society (4 vols.). The Journal and Literary Remains appeared in 1854-57 (2 vols.; Chetham Society)

Thomas Amory (1691?-1788) was a miscllaneous writer and humourist of an eccentric type. He was of Irish descent—his father acquired property as secretary for the confiscated estatesand he went to school in Dublin; but he is found established in Westminster in 1757. In 1755 he published, anonymously, Memoirs containing the Lives of several Ladies of Great Britain; A History of Antiquities; Observations on the Christian Religion; with a variety of Disquisitions (in two volumes)—an extraordinary miscellany of religion, scenery, autobiography, and fictitious adventures. His next work is practically a continuation: The Life of John Buncle, Eq-(2 vols. 1756-66). The author's aim in both works was to promote good morals and Unitarian doctrines, or rather a kind of 'Christian Deism;' the ladies whose charms and virtues are commemorated belong very obviously to the fictitious side of the enterprise. In the first be travels among the wild hills of Northumberland, and meets there, in a secluded spot (which he invests with all the beauty and softness of a scene in Kent or Devon), the daughter of a deceased college friend, who had been disinherited for refusing to sign the Thirty-nine Articles. The young lady entertains her father's friend, and introduces him to other ladies. They undertake a visit to the Western Islands, and encounter various adventures and vicissitudes, besides indulging in philosophical and polemical discussions. The Life of John Buncle is of like complexion, but in the form of an autobiography. Buncle has in succession no less than seven wives, all wooed and won upon his peculiar 'Christian principles.' To such reviewers as should attempt to raise the laugh against him he replies: 'I think it unreasonable and impious to grieve immoderately for the dead. A decent and proper tribute of tears and sorrow, humanity requires; but when that duty has been paid, we must emember that to lament a dead woman is not to ament a wife. A wife must be a living woman. and, fortified by this philosophy, John Buncle roceeds on his way undisturbed after each ereavement, usually in high spirits, relishing me old ale and good cheer, and making fresh onverts to his views and opinions. The peronal attractions, literary and other acquirements, of each wife, her many virtues, and her family tistory, are related at length. 'As I mention tothing of any children by so many wives,' he explains, 'some readers may perhaps wonder at .his; and therefore, to give a general answer once for all, I think it sufficient to observe, that I had a great many to carry on the succession: but as they never were concerned in any extraordinary affairs, nor ever did any remarkable things, that I ever heard of—only rise and breakfast, read and saunter, drink and eat, it would not be fair, in my opinion, to make any one pay for their history.' In lieu of this, the reader is treated to dissertations on the origin of language, the tauses of earthquakes and of muscular motion, on phlogiston, fluxions, the Athanasian Creed, and fifty other topics brought together in heroic contempt of the unities of time and place. At I moment's notice the most unlikely personsamers' wives and country gentlemen's daughters -burst into long debates or disquisitions on the vidences for (improved) Christianity, the origin language, phallic worship, the physical cause the Deluge. Between Cumberland and Yorkure, Buncle discovers a 'fine romantic country,' trackless and all but impassable wilderness, with Ountains higher than 'Snowden or Kedar-Idris,' palling precipices, deafening cataracts as high 3 Niagara, bottomless abysses, but here and there ttle companies of charming recluses, sometimes holly women. He is great on 'natural curiosities' -caverns, fossils, odd shells, rare mushrooms. here is a portentous account of a fight to the ath (seen under a rather highly magnifying icroscope!) between a 'gallant louse' and an tive flea, who at one stage of the struggle 'fixes s flashing eyes on his foe.' The classical quotams and even the names of the authors cited leave uch to be desired, and suggest second-hand rough miscellaneous and extensive) erudition. sere is a vast amount of irrelevant padding in e notes. One long note gives sketches of the es and works of St Jerome, St Ambrose, and e Gregories. Another note, running on to a nth page, discusses Madame de Guyon, Madame purignon, and several other mystics, male and nale. Another describes various monuments of tive Irish literature, with translations. Such a atastic and desultory work is only tolerable in tue of its portentous eccentricity and unlikeness any other book, with its occasionally happy, iginal, and unexpected thoughts and locutions. ow Hazlitt could have said that the soul of abelais had passed into Amory is incomprehensible; Mr Leslie Stephen, more reasonably, sees in his rhapsodies rather the 'light-headed ramblings of delirium.' If Amory was not disordered in intellect, he had a marvellously ill-balanced judgment; and probably no entirely sane person could ever read John Buncle from end to end without plentiful 'skipping.'

The following, from the beginning of the Memoirs, is a portrait of the first of his beroines:

Marinda Bruce.

In the year 1739, I travelled many hundred miles to visit ancient monuments, and discover curious things; and as I wandered, to this purpose, among the vast hills of Northumberland, fortune conducted me one evening, in the month of June, when I knew not where to rest, to the sweetest retirement my eyes have ever beheld. This is Hali-farm. It is a beautiful vale surrounded with rocks, forest, and water. I found at the upper end of it the prettiest thatched house in the world, and a garden of the most artful confusion I had ever seen. The little mansion was covered on every side with the finest flowery greens. The streams all round were murmuring and falling a thousand ways. All the kind of singing-birds were here collected, and in high harmony on the sprays. The ruins of an abbey enhance the beauties of this place; they appear at the distance of four hundred yards from the house; and as some great trees are now grown up among the remains, and a river winds between the broken walls, the view is solemn, the picture fine.

When I came up to the house, the first figure I saw was the lady whose story I am going to relate. She had the charms of an angel, but her dress was quite plain and clean as a country-maid. Her person appeared faultless, and of the middle size, between the disagreeable extremes; her face, a sweet oval, and her complexion the brunette of the bright rich kind; her mouth, like a rose-bud that is just beginning to blow; and a fugitive dimple, by fits, would lighten and disappear. The finest passions were always passing in her face; and in her long, even chestnut eyes, there was a fluid fire, sufficient for half-a-dozen pair.

She had a volume of Shakspear in her hand as I came softly towards her, having left my horse at a distance with my servant; and her attention was so much engaged with the extremely poetical and fine lines which Titania speaks in the third act of the 'Midsummer Night's Dream,' that she did not see me till I was quite near her. She seemed then in great amazement. She could not be much more surprised if I had dropped from the clouds. But this was soon over, upon my ask ing her if she was not the daughter of Mr John Bruce, as I supposed, from a similitude of faces, and informing her that her father, if I was right, was my near friend, and would be glad to see his chum in that part of the world. Marinda replied: 'You are not wrong,' and immediately asked me in. She conducted me to a parlour that was quite beautiful in the rural way, and welcomed me to Hali-farm, as her father would have done, she said, had I arrived before his removal to a better world. She then left me for a while, and I had time to look over the room I was in. The floor was covered with rushes wrought into the prettiest mat, and the walls decorated all round with the finest flowers and shells. Robins and nightingales, the finch and the linnet, were in the neatest reed cages of her own making; and at the upper end of the chamber, in a charming little open grotto, was the finest strix capite aurito, corpore rufo, that I have seen, that is, the great eagle owl. This beautiful bird, in a niche like a ruin, looked vastly fine. As to the flowers which adorned this room, I thought they were all natural at my first coming in; but on inspection, it appeared that several baskets of the finest kinds were inimitably painted on the walls by Marinda's hand.

These things afforded me a pleasing entertainment for about half an hour, and then Miss Bruce returned. One of the maids brought in a supper-such fare, she said, as her little cottage afforded; and the table was covered with green peas and pigeons, cream-cheese, new bread and butter. Everything was excellent in its kind. The cider and ale were admirable. Discretion and dignity appeared in Miranda's behaviour; she talked with judgment; and under the decencies of ignorance was concealed a valuable knowledge. After supper she gave me the history of her father from the time he and I parted, and concluded with saying that by his death, a year before my arrival, she became the solitary thing I saw her, in the midst of untravelled mountains, and had not in the world one friend, excepting the poor rustics of her house and neighbourhood. . . .

Richard Savage was an undignified assistant of Pope's, who supplied the 'private intelligence and secret incidents' which add poignancy to the satire of the Dunciad. Savage is better known for his misfortunes, as related by Dr Johnson, than for the charms of his poetry, which rarely rises above the level of mediocrity, whereas his melancholy story bears to be a romance in real life. It is almost certain, however, that Johnson's memoir, derived directly or indirectly from Savage himself, is little else than a romance, and its hero an impostor. Together, often penniless, they had roamed the streets by night; and now, moved by pity to partiality, he wrote what is perhaps the most perfect short Life in the language. That the story contains 'inherent improbabilities and proved falsehoods' was demonstrated by Moy Thomas in 1858 in Notes and Queries.

Savage (1697-1743) was born in London, and according to his own account was the issue of a liaison between the wife of Charles Lord Brandon, afterwards Earl of Macclesfield, and Richard Savage, Earl Rivers. Lady Brandon had been separated from her husband about ten years when she formed a liaison with Lord Rivers, by whom she had two children, a girl (who died in infancy, having been christened after the father and mother, 'Ann Savage') and a male child, baptised as 'Richard Smith.' Richard Smith, like the preceding child, was removed and placed at nurse, being taken away by a baker's wife named Portlock, who said the child was her own, and from this time all trace of the infant is lost. If we are to believe Savage's story, the Countess (from 1700 the wife of Colonel Brett) from the hour of his birth discovered a resolution of disowning him, and would never see him again. suffered a large legacy left to him by his godmother to be embezzled for want of some one to prosecute his claim; told Earl Rivers, his father, on his deathbed (1712) that his child was dead, with the express object of depriving him of another legacy of £6000; endeavoured to have Richard kidnapped to the West Indies; and finally interfered to the utmost of her power, and by means of an 'atrocious calumny,' to prevent his being saved from the hangman. Most of these assertions have been disproved. Indeed, the story of the legacy is palpably untrue, for, as Croker remarked, if Savage had a title to the legacy, he could not have found any difficulty in recovering it. Had the executors resisted his claims, the whole costs, as well as the legacy, must have been paid by them, if he had been the child to whom it was given.

The writer we know as Savage is first heard of in 1717, when was published The Convocation, or a Battle of Pamphlets, a Poem written by Mr Richard Savage. Next year (1718) he produced a comedy, Love in a Veil, which was published by Curl, and stated on the title-page to be 'written by Richard Savage, Gent., son of the late Earl Steele thought well of the play, and became his friend for a time. In Jacob's Lives of the Poets (1719) the same story is repeated with additions; and Aaron Hill in his periodical, The Plain Dealer (1724), inserted letters and statements to the same effect, which were furnished by Savage. His remarkable history thus became known, but the vices of his character displayed themselves. He had some good inpulses, but his habits were low and sensual. His temper was irritable and capricious, and whatever money he received was instantly spent in obscure haunts of dissipation. In a tavern brawl in 1727 he had the misfortune to kill a young man called Sinclair, for which he was tried and condemned to death, but was pardoned by Queen Caroline and set at liberty. He published poetical pieces for his living; addressed a birthday ode to the queen in 1732, calling himself the 'Volunteer Laureate' -to the annoyance, it is said, of Colley Cibber, the legitimate inheritor of the laurel; and received from Her Majesty a pension of £50. His threats, as well as the sympathetic interest of the public in the story of his wrongs, induced Lord Tyrconnel, a friend of his reputed mother, to take him into his family, where he lived on equal terms and was allowed £200 a year. This, as Johnson said, was the 'golden period' of Savage's life. But, as might have been foreseen, the habits of the poet differed widely from those of the peer: they soon quarrelled, and Savage was again set adrift on the world. The death of the queen also stopped his pension; but his friends made up an annuity for him of equal amount, to which Pope contributed £20. Savage agreed to withdraw to the country, to avoid the temptations

London. He selected Swansea, but stopping at Bristol, was treated with great kindness by the opulent merchants and other inhabitants, whom he afterwards libelled in a sarcastic poem. Im Swansea he resided about a year; but on pensiting Bristol he was arrested for a small debt, and being unable to find bail, was thrown into prison. His folly, extravagance, and pride, though it was 'pride that licks the dust,' had . Left him almost without a friend. He made no wigorous effort to extricate or maintain himself. Pope continued his allowance; but being prowoked by something in his conduct, he wrote to him, stating that he was 'determined to keep out of his suspicion by not being officious any longer, or obtruding into any of his concerns. Savage felt the force of this rebuke from the steadiest and most illustrious of his friends. He was soon afterwards taken ill, and, unable to procure medical assistance, was found dead in bed. The kindly keeper of the prison buried the poor man at his own expense.

Savage was the author of two plays and a volume of miscellaneous poems. Of the latter, the principal piece is The Wanderer (1729), witten with greater care than most of his things; it was the offspring of that happy period of his life when he lived with Lord Tyrconnel. Pope repeatedly read it and commended it. Amidst much puerile and tawdry description and many banalities, The Wanderer contains some impressive passages. There are obvious evidences that Savage studied The Seasons, of which part was Published three years before. The Bastard (1728) is also a striking poem, and bears the impress of true feeling and vigorous thinking. One couplet is worthy of Pope. Of the bastard he says:

He lives to build, not boast, a generous race: No tenth transmitter of a foolish face,

The concluding passage, in which he bewails the lot of his victim and of himself, has real pathos in it, though it ends in a bit of preposterous bombast, bathos, and bad taste.

From 'The Bastard.'

Is chance a guilt, that my disastrous heart,
For mischief never meant, must ever smart?
Can self-defence be sin? Ah, plead no more!
What though no purposed malice stained thee o'er,
Had beaven befriended thy unhappy side,
Thou hadst not been provoked—or thou hadst died.

Far be the guilt of home-shed blood from all On whom, unsought, embroiling dangers fall! Still the pale dead revives, and lives to me, To me! through Pity's eye condemned to see. Remembrance veils his rage, but swells his fate; Grieved I forgive, and am grown cool too late. Young and unthoughtful then; who knows, one day, What ripening virtues might have made their way! He might have lived till folly died in shame, Till kindling wisdom felt a thirst for fame. He might perhaps his country's friend have proved; Both happy, generous, candid, and beloved;

He might have saved some worth, now doomed to fall, And I, perchance, in him have murdered all.

O fate of late repentance! always vain:
Thy remedies but hall undying pain.
Where shall my hope find rest? No mother's care
Shielded my infant innocence with prayer:
No father's guardian hand my youth maintained,
Called forth my virtues, or from vice restrained;
Is it not thine to snatch some powerful arm,
First to advance, then screen from future harm?
Am I returned from death to live in pain?
Or would imperial pity save in vain?
Distrust it not. What blame can mercy find,
Which gives at once a life, and rears a mind?

Mother, miscalled, farewell of soul severe, This sad reflection yet may force one tear: All I was wretched by to you I owed; Alone from strangers every comfort flowed!

Lost to the life you gave, your son no more, And now adopted, who was doomed before, New born, I may a nobler mother claim, But dare not whisper her immortal name; Supremely lovely and serenely great, Majestic mother of a kneeling state; Queen of a people's heart, who ne'er before Agreed, yet now with one consent adore. One contest yet remains in this desire, Who most shall give applause where all admire.

There is a certain parallelism in the passage quoted below to the survey of the city, its sins, sorrows, and close-packed contrasts, in Dr Teufels-dröckh's garret-window in Weissnichtwo. 'Bold bad spectre' sounds like a modern joke, although the collocation of 'bold' and 'bad' is as old at least as Spenser; and few even of Savage's poetical contemporaries would regard the epithet 'sapient bard' a compliment.

From 'The Wanderer.'

You mansion, made by beaming tapers gay, Drowns the dim night, and counterfeits the day; From 'lumined windows glancing on the eye, Around, athwart, the frisking shadows fly. There midnight riot spreads illusive joys, And fortune, health, and dearer time destroys. Soon death's dark agent to luxuriant ease Shall wake sharp warnings in some fierce disease. O man! thy fabric's like a well-formed state: Thy thoughts, first ranked, were sure designed the great; Passions plebeians are, which factions raise: Wine, like poured oil, excites the raging blaze: Then giddy anarchy's rude triumphs rise: Then sovereign Reason from her empire flies: That ruler once deposed, wisdom and wit To noise and folly, place and power, submit; Like a frail bark thy weakened mind is tost, Unsteered, unbalanced, till its wealth is lost.

The miser-spirit eyes the spendthrift heir,
And mourns, too late, effects of sordid care.
His treasures fly to cloy each fawning slave,
Yet grudge a stone to dignify his grave.
For this, low-thoughted craft his life employed;
For this, though wealthy, he no wealth enjoyed;
For this he griped the poor, and alms denied,
Unfriended lived, and unlamented died.

Yet smile, grieved shade! when that unprosperous store Fast lessens, when gay hours return no more; Smile at thy heir, beholding, in his fall, Men once obliged, like him, ungrateful all! Then thought-inspiring woe his heart shall mend, And prove his only wise, unflattering friend.

Folly exhibits thus unmanly sport, While plotting Mischief keeps reserved her court. Lo! from that mount, in blasting sulphur broke, Stream flames voluminous, enwrapped with smoke! In chariot-shape they whirl up yonder tower, Lean on its brow, and like destruction lower! From the black depth a fiery legion springs; Each bold bad spectre claps her sounding wings, And straight beneath a summoned, traitorous band, On horror bent, in dark convention stand: From each fiend's mouth a ruddy vapour flows, Glides through the roof, and o'er the council glows: The villains, close beneath the infection pent, Feel, all possessed, their rising galls ferment; And burn with faction, hate, and vengeful ire, For rapine, blood, and devastation dire! But Justice marks their ways: she waves in air The sword, high-threatening, like a comet's glare.

While here dark Villainy herself deceives,
There studious Honesty our view relieves;
A feeble taper from yon lonesome room,
Scattering thin rays, just glimmers through the gloom;
There sits the sapient bard in museful mood,
And glows impassioned for his country's good!
All the bright spirits of the just combined,
Inform, refine, and prompt his towering mind!
He takes the gifted quill from hands divine,
Around his temples rays refulgent shine.
Now rapt, now more than man, I see him climb
To view this speck of earth from worlds sublime.
I see him now o'er nature's works preside;
How clear the vision! and the view how wide!

John Dyer was born at Aberglasslyn, Carmarthenshire, about 1700; and on the death of his father, a solicitor, abandoned the profession of law. He then took to art, and rambled over South Wales and the adjoining parts of England, filling his mind with a love of nature and his portfolio with sketches. During his excursions he wrote Grongar Hill (1726), a poem remarkable in its period for simplicity, warm feeling, and fine description of natural scenery; it provokes comparison with Jonson's Penshurst and Denham's Cooper's Hill. Grongar Hill, on the river Towy in Cardigan, commands a view noble enough to inspire any poet. Dyer next made a tour to Italy, to study painting. On his return in 1740 he published anonymously another poem, The Ruins of Rome, in blank verse of this pattern:

Behold the pride of pomp,
The throne of nations fallen; obscured in dust;
Even yet majestical: the solemn scene
Elates the soul, while now the rising sun
Flames on the ruins in the purer air
Towering aloft, upon the glittering plain,
Like broken rocks, a vast circumference;
Rent palaces, crushed columns, rifted moles,
Fanes rolled on fanes, and tombs on buried tombs.

One short passage Johnson specially noted as 'conceived with the mind of a poet'—it is certainly neither smooth (even if we agree to mispronounce orison) nor in Johnson's own manner:

The pilgrim oft
At dead of night, 'mid his orison, hears,
Aghast, the voice of time, disparting towers,
Tumbling all precipitate down dashed,
Rattling around, loud thundering to the moon.

Seeing that he had little chance of succeeding as an artist, Dyer entered the Church, and obtained successively the vicarage of Catthorpe in Leicestershire and the Lincolnshire livings of Belchford, Coningsby, and Kirkby-on-Bain. He published in 1757 his longest poetical work, The Fleece, devoted to 'the care of sheep, the labours of the loom' The subject was hardly a promising one. How can a man write poetically, said Johnson, of serges and druggets? Yet Dyer did write a not unpleasing didactic poem on this theme; Akenside assisted him with some finishing touches, and Wordsworth praised the result in a sonnet. One critic, learning from Dodsley that the author of The Fleece was no longer young, threatened 'He will be buried in woollen!' He did die the year after the publication. (Samuel Dyer, translator and Johnson's friend, was a younger contemporary.) Dyer's poetical pictures are happy miniatures of nature, carefully drawn, prettily coloured, and grouped with the taste of an artist His versification is musical, and his moralisings Byron thought the six lines relevant enough. towards the close of Grongar Hill beginning 'As you summits soft and fair' had suggested Campbell's famous opening of the 'Pleasures of Hope.'

Grongar Hill.

Silent nymph, with curious eye, Who, the purple evening, lie On the mountain's lonely van, Beyond the noise of busy man; Painting fair the form of things, While the yellow linnet sings; Or the tuneful nightingale Charms the forest with her tale; Come, with all thy various hues, Come, and aid thy sister muse; Now, while Phœbus, riding high, Gives lustre to the land and sky! Grongar Hill invites my song, Draw the landskip bright and strong; Grongar, in whose mossy cells Sweetly musing quiet dwells; Grongar, in whose silent shade, For the modest Muses made; So oft I have, the evening still, At the fountain of a rill, Sat upon a flowery bed, With my hand beneath my head; While strayed my eyes o'er Towy's flood, Over mead, and over wood, From house to house, from hill to hill, Till contemplation had her fill.

About his checkered sides I wind,
And leave his brooks and meads behind,
And groves, and grottoes where I lay,
And vistas shooting beams of day:
Wide and wider spreads the vale,
As circles on a smooth canal:
The mountains round, unhappy fate,
Sooner or later, of all height,
Withdraw their summits from the skies,
And lessen as the others rise:
Still the prospect wider spreads,
Adds a thousand woods and meads;
Still it widens, widens still,
And sinks the newly risen hill.

Now I gain the mountain's brow, What a landskip lies below!
No clouds, no vapours intervene, But the gay, the open scene
Does the face of nature shew,
In all the hues of heaven's bow;
And, swelling to embrace the light,
Spreads around beneath the sight.

Old castles on the cliffs arise, Proudly towering in the skies! Rushing from the woods, the spires Seem from hence ascending fires! Half his beams Apollo sheds On the yellow mountain heads! Gilds the fleeces of the flocks, And glitters on the broken rocks!

Below me trees unnumbered rise, Beautiful in various dyes: The gloomy pine, the poplar blue, The yellow beech, the sable yew, The slender fir that taper grows, The sturdy oak with broad-spread boughs. And beyond the purple grove, Haunt of Phillis, queen of love! Gaudy as the opening dawn, Lies a long and level lawn, On which a dark hill, steep and high, Holds and charms the wandering eye! Deep are his feet in Towy's flood, His sides are cloathed with waving wood, And ancient towers crown his brow, That cast an aweful look below; Whose ragged walls the ivy creeps, And with her arms from falling keeps: So both a safety from the wind On mutual dependence find. 'Tis now the raven's bleak abode; Tis now the apartment of the toad; And there the fox securely feeds, And there the poisonous adder breeds, Concealed in ruins, moss, and weeds; While, ever and anon, there falls Huge heaps of hoary mouldered walls. Yet time has seen, that lifts the low, And level lays the lofty brow, Has seen this broken pile complete, Big with the vanity of state; But transient is the smile of fate! A little rule, a little sway, A sunbeam in a winter's day, Is all the proud and mighty have Between the cradle and the grave.

And see the rivers, how they run
Through woods and meads, in shade and sun,
Sometimes swift, sometimes slow,
Wave succeeding wave, they go
A various journey to the deep,
Like human life, to endless sleep!
Thus is nature's vesture wrought,
To instruct our wandering thought;
Thus she dresses green and gay,
To disperse our cares away.

Ever charming, ever new,
When will the landskip tire the view!
The fountain's fall, the river's flow,
The woody valleys, warm and low;
The windy summit, wild and high,
Roughly rushing on the sky!
The pleasant seat, the ruined tower,
The naked rock, the shady bower;
The town and village, dome and farm,
Each give each a double charm,
As pearls upon an Æthiop's arm.

See, on the mountain's southern side, Where the prospect opens wide, Where the evening gilds the tide, How close and small the hedges lie! What streaks of meadows cross the eye! A step, methinks, may pass the stream,' So little distant dangers seem; So we mistake the future's face, Eyed thro' hope's deluding glass; As yon summits soft and fair, Clad in colours of the air, Which to those who journey near, Barren, brown, and rough appear; Still we tread the same coarse way, The present's still a cloudy day.

O may I with myself agree, And never covet what I see; Content me with an humble shade, My passions tamed, my wishes laid; For while our wishes wildly roll, We banish quiet from the soul: 'Tis thus the busy beat the air, And misers gather wealth and care. Now, even now, my joys run high, As on the mountain turf I lie; While the wanton zephyr sings, And in the vale perfumes his wings; While the waters murmur deep, While the shepherd charms his sheep, While the birds unbounded fly, And with music fill the sky, Now, even now, my joys run high.

Be full, ye courts; be great who will; Search for peace with all your skill; Open wide the lofty door, Seek her on the marble floor: In vain you search, she is not there; In vain you search the domes of care! Grass and flowers Quiet treads, On the meads and mountain heads, Along with Pleasure close allied, Ever by each other's side: And often, by the murmuring rill, Hears the thrush, while all is still, Within the groves of Grongar Hill.

The Fleece, in blank verse, is not an English pastoral Georgic on sheep and the shepherd's cares and joys, but sees the fleece through the shearing, washing, dyeing, carding, spinning, and weaving, and even follows English woollens on their last journey by land and sea to France, Russia, Siberia, India, China, the United States, South America, and all the world; it is a patriotic poem on the woollen manufacture and the seaborne trade of the nation of shopkeepers. Description of the land suitable for rearing sheep leads quite naturally to pictures of life in Lapland and Arabia, which are not good for sheep-breeding; the voyages of Jason and the argonauts of the golden fleece presented inevitable attractions; and the Miltonic and sonorous lists of places to which English manufactures find their way leave room for references to Vasco da Gama, Columbus, and Anson. Not content with the processes of woollen manufacture, this poet of the woollen interest in its widest sense bursts into an enthusiastic excursus on the forging and sharpening of sheep-shears and cutlery at Leeds. Dyer had a warm affection for his native Wales, and Welsh sheep, Demetia, Siluria, the banks of the Wye and Severn, occupy disproportionate space in a survey of British And repeated returns to the sheep-farming. magnificence of Plynlimmon, Cader Idris, and other Welsh hills show that Dyer and his contemporaries were by no means so dead to the glories of mountain scenery as is often assumed. Amid the comically prosaic details and tedious didacticism there are fine passages and admirable lines in The Fleece, to which Mr Leslie Stephen is unjust in dismissing it as simply unreadable. The combination of true simplicity and eighteenth-century artificiality is curiously entertaining. Dyer's frank enthusiasm for the English climate, its refreshing fogs and rains, and the perennial verdure and purling brooks thereby nourished, is unconventional, frank, and infectious:

Those slow-descending showers, Those hovering fogs, that bathe our growing vales In deep November (loathed by trifling Gaul, Effeminate), are gifts the Pleiads shed, Britannia's handmaids. As the beverage falls, Her hills rejoice, her valleys laugh and sing.

Hail noble Albion! where no golden mines,
No soft perfumes, nor oils, nor myrtle bowers,
The vigorous frame and lofty heart of man
Enervate: round whose stern cerulean brows
White-wingèd snow, and cloud, and pearly rain,
Frequent attend, with solemn majesty:
Rich queen of mists and vapours! These thy sons
With their cool arms compress: and twist their nerves
For deeds of excellence and high renown.
Thus formed, our Edwards, Henrys, Churchills, Blakes,
Our Lockes, our Newtons, and our Miltons, rose.

See, the sun gleams; the living pastures rise, After the nurture of the fallen shower, How beautiful! How blue the ethereal vault, How verdurous the lawns, how clear the brooks! Such noble warlike steeds, such herds of kine, So sleek, so vast; such spacious flooks of sheep Like flakes of gold illumining the green, What other paradise adorn but thine, Britannia? happy, if thy sons would know Their happiness.

This English 'Cotter's Saturday Night' without a charming and truthful realism:

Only a slender tuft of useful ash, And mingled beech and elm, securely tall, The little smiling cottage warm embowered; The little smiling cottage, where at eve He meets his rosy children at the door, Prattling their welcomes, and his honest wife, With good brown cake and bacon slice, intent To cheer his hunger after labour hard.

This is part of the shepherd's duties:

But spread around thy tenderest diligence In flowery spring-time, when the new-dropt lan Tottering with weakness by his mother's side, Feels the fresh world about him; and each tho Hillock, or furrow trips his feeble feet: O guard his meek sweet innocence from all The innumerous ills that rush around his life! Colin, on the top of Craig-y-Breiddyn in gomeryshire, laments like a modern philan economist the rush to the towns:

awkins Browne (1705-60), son of f Burton-on-Trent, was educated at in 1736 published a clever series of s of then living authors which obtained urity. They naturally suggest a comthe parodies in the Rejected Addresses. was called to the Bar, resided mainly ily estate, but sat in Parliament for is member for Wenlock in Shropshire. Latin poem, De Animi Immortalitate, nuch praised and repeatedly translated ne Jenyns), and an English poem on of Design and Beauty. Johnson said conversers he was the most delightful I ever was in company,' and gave netic Boswell food for comfort when that Browne 'drank freely for thirty imitations are his happiest work, the e whole being A Pipe of Tobacco. The eries, A New Year's Ode, appropriately : manner of Colley Cibber, then poetrecitativo and airs, and begins:

e-array, big with horror, is fled, e-robed Peace again lifts up her head; Muses, tobacco, the blessing of peace; a nation so blessed as this?

n summer suns grow red with heat, bacco tempers Phœbus' ire; n wintry storms around us beat, bacco chears with gentle fire.

Yellow autumn, youthful spring, In thy praises jointly sing.

Like Neptune, Cæsar guards Virginian fleets, Fraught with tobacco's balmy sweets; Old Ocean trembles at Britannia's power, And Boreas is afraid to roar.

Cibber's laureate effusions are here happily travestied. Ambrose Philips is also well hit off—not by Browne himself, but by 'an ingenious friend:'

> Little tube of mighty power, Charmer of an idle hour, Object of my warm desire, Lip of wax and eye of fire; And thy snowy taper waist With my finger gently braced, And thy pretty swelling crest, With my little stopper pressed, And the sweetest bliss of blisses Breathing from thy balmy kisses.

Thomson is the subject of the third imitation:

O thou, matured by glad Hesperian suns, Tobacco, fountain pure of limpid truth, That looks the very soul; whence pouring thought, Swarms all the mind; absorpt is yellow care, And at each puff imagination burns; Flash on thy bard, and with exalting fires Touch the mysterious lip that chants thy praise, In strains to mortal sons of earth unknown. Behold an engine, wrought from tawny mines Of ductile clay, with plastic virtue formed, And glazed magnifick o'er, I grasp, I fill. From Pætotheke with pungent powers perfumed Itself one tortoise all, where shines imbibed Each parent ray; then rudely rammed illume, With the red touch of zeal-enkindling sheet, Marked with Gibsonian lore; forth issue clouds, Thought-thrilling, thirst-inciting clouds around, And many-mining fires: I all the while, Lolling at ease, inhale the breezy balm. But chief, when Bacchus wont with thee to join In genial strife and orthodoxal ale, Stream life and joy into the Muse's bowl. Oh, be thou still my great inspirer, thou My Muse: oh, fan me with thy zephyr's boon, While I, in clouded tabernacle shrined, Burst forth all oracle and mystick song.

Many of the lines and phrases are from Thomson's poem of Liberty (1732), which also explains Gibsonian lore. Pætotheke is a pedantic coinage for a tobacco-box. Such a smart parody of Thomson's magniloquent style and diction being inevitably ludicrous, the usually good-natured poet was offended, and indited some angry lines in reply. The fourth imitation is in the style of Young's Satires, which are less strongly marked by mannerism than the Night Thoughts, not then written. The parody begins:

Criticks avaunt; Tobacco is my theme; Tremble like hornets at the blasting steam. And you, court-insects, flutter not too near Its light, nor buzz within the scorching sphere. Pollio, with flame like thine my verse inspire, So shall the Muse from smoke elicit fire. It is Pope of course who is thus imitated:

Blest leaf! whose aromatic gales dispense To templars modesty, to parsons sense: So raptured priests, at famed Dodona's shrine, Drank inspiration from the steam divine. Poison that cures, a vapour that affords Content more solid than the smile of lords: Rest to the weary, to the hungry food, The last kind refuge of the wise and good. Inspired by thee, dull cits adjust the scale Of Europe's peace, when other statesmen fail. By thee protected, and thy sister beer, Poets rejoice, nor think the bailiff near. Nor less the critic owns thy genial aid, While supperless he plies the piddling trade. What though to love and soft delights a foe, By ladies hated, hated by the beau, Yet social freedom long to courts unknown, Fair health, fair truth, and virtue are thy own. Come to thy poet, come with healing wings, And let me taste thee unexcised by kings!

In the last, beginning:

Boy! bring an ounce of Freeman's best, And bid the vicar be my guest—

Browne not merely caught the manner of Swift, but successfully reproduced his coarseness.

Matthew Green (1696-1737), author of The Spleen, praised by Pope and Gray, left the austere Dissenting communion of his parents, had a post as clerk in the London Custom-House, performed his duties faithfully, and from time to time wrote and published verses. He was a witty and entertaining companion, but seems to have had personal experience of 'the spleen,' to judge by the aptness with which he discusses its various forms and their appropriate remedies, in comic verse like that of Hudibras and of some of Swift's poems. The poem was first published by Glover, the author of Leonidas, after Green's death. Gray thought that 'even the wood-notes of Green often break out into strains of real poetry and music;' and the fourth line of the first of the following extracts from The Spleen (alluding to David and Goliath, and not unlike Shakespeare's Man but a rush against Othello's breast, And he retires), soon attained to the dignity of a stock quotation.

Cures for Melancholy.

To cure the mind's wrong bias, spleen, Some recommend the bowling-green; Some hilly walks; all exercise; Fling but a stone, the giant dies; Laugh and be well. Monkeys have been Extreme good doctors for the spleen; And kitten, if the humour hit, Has harlequined away the fit. Since mirth is good in this behalf, At some particulars let us laugh. . . . If spleen-fogs rise at break of day, I clear my evening with a play, Or to some concert take my way.

The company, the shine of lights, The scenes of humour, music's flights, Adjust and set the soul to rights. . . .

In rainy days keep double guard, Or spleen will surely be too hard; Which, like those fish by sailors met, Fly highest while their wings are wet. In such dull weather, so unfit To enterprise a work of wit: When clouds one yard of azure sky, That 's fit for simile, deny, I dress my face with studious looks, And shorten tedious hours with books. But if dull fogs invade the head, That memory minds not what is read, I sit in window dry as ark, And on the drowning world remark: Or to some coffee-house I stray For news, the manna of a day, And from the hipped discourses gather That politics go by the weather. . . .

Sometimes I dress, with women sit, And chat away the gloomy fit; Quit the stiff garb of serious sense, And wear a gay impertinence, Nor think nor speak with any pains, But lay on Fancy's neck the reins. . . .

I never game, and rarely bet,
Am loath to lend or run in debt.
No Compter-writs me agitate,
Who moralising pass the gate,
And there mine eyes on spendthrifts turn,
Who vainly o'er their bondage mourn.
Wisdom, before beneath their care,
Pays her upbraiding visits there,
And forces Folly through the grate
Her panegyric to repeat.
Experience, joined with common sense,
To mortals is a providence. . . .

Happy the man who, innocent, Grieves not at ills he can't prevent; His skiff does with the current glide, Not puffing pulled against the tide. He, paddling by the scuffling crowd, Sees unconcerned life's wager rowed, And when he can't prevent foul play, Enjoys the folly of the fray.

The extracts that follow are from the Memoirs.

Traits of George II. and Queen Caroline.

The Duke of Richmond asked the king immediately to succeed Lord Scarborough, and the king was not averse to granting his request any further than he was always averse to giving anything to anybody. Many ingredients concurred to form this reluctance in his majesty to bestowing. One was that, taking all his notions from a German measure, he thought every man who served him in England overpaid; another was, that while employments were vacant he saved the salary; but the most prevalent of all was his never having the least inclination to oblige. I do not believe there ever lived a man to whose temper benevolence was so absolutely a stranger. It was a sensation that, I dare say, never accompanied any one act of his power; so that whatever good he did was either extorted from him, or was the adventitious effect of some self-interested act of policy: consequently, if any seeming favour he conferred ever obliged the receiver, it must have been because the man on whom it fell was ignorant of the motives from which the giver bestowed. I remember Sir Robert Walpole saying once, in speaking to me of the king, that to talk with him of compassion, consideration of past services, charity, and bounty, was making use of words that with him had no meaning. . . . The queen, by long studying and long experience of his temper, knew how to instil her own sentiments-whilst she affected to receive his majesty's; she could appear convinced whilst she was controverting, and obedient whilst she was ruling; and by this means her dexterity and address made it impossible for anybody to persuade him what was truly his case—that whilst she was seemingly on every occasion giving up her opinion and her will to his, she was always in reality turning his opinion and bending his will to hers. She managed this deified image as the heathen priests used to do the oracles of old, when, kneeling and prostrate before the altars of a pageant god, they received with the greatest devotion and reverence those directions in public which they had before instilled and regulated in private. And as these idols consequently were only propitious to the favourites of the augurers, so nobody who had not tampered with our chief priestess ever received a favourable answer from our god: storms and thunder greeted every votary that entered the temple without her protection-calms and sunshine those who obtained it. The king himself was so little sensible of this being his case, that one day, enumerating the people who had governed this country in other reigns, he said Charles I. was governed by his wife, Charles II. by his mistresses, King James by his priests, King William by his men, and Queen Anne by her women-favourites. His father, he added, had been governed by anybody that could get at him. And at the end of this compendious history of our great and wise monarchs, with a significant, satisfied, triumphant air, he turned about, smiling, to one of his auditors, and asked him: 'And who do they say governs now?' Whether this is a true or a false story of the king I know not, but it was currently reported and generally believed.

(From Chap. iv.)

Her predominant passion was pride, and the darling pleasure of her soul was power; but she was forced to gratify one to gain the other, as some people do health, by a strict and painful regime, which few besides herself could have had patience to support or resolution to adhere to. She was at least seven or eight hours the-d the with the king every day, during which time she was generally saying what she did not think, assenting to what she did not believe, and praising what she did not approve; for they were seldom of the same opinion, and he too fond of his own for her ever at first to dare to controvert it ('Consilii quamus egregu quod spse non afferret inimicus'- 'An enemy to any counsel, however excellent, which he himself had not suggested.'- Tacitus). She used to give him her opinion as jugglers do a card, by changing it imperceptibly, and making him believe he held the same with that he first pitched upon. But that which made these the à thes seem heaviest was that he neither liked reading nor being read to (unless it was to sleep): she was forced, like a spider, to spin out of her own bowels all the conversation with which the fly was taken. However, to all this she submitted, for the sake of power, and for the reputation of having it; for the vanity of being thought to possess what she desired was equal to the pleasure of the possession itself. But, either for the appearance or the reality, she knew it was absolutely necessary to have interest in her husband, as she was sensible that interest was the measure by which people would always judge of her power. Her every thought, word, and act therefore tended and was calculated to preserve her influence there; to him she sacrificed her time, for him she mortified her inclination; she looked, spake, and breathed but for him, like a weathercock to every capricious blast of his uncertain temper, and governed him (if such influence so gained can bear the name of government) by being as great a slave to him thus ruled as any other wife could be to a man who ruled her. For all the tedious hours she spent then in watching him whilst he slept, or the heavier task of entertaining him whilst he was awake, her single consolation was in reflecting she had power, and that people in coffee-houses and ruelles were saying she governed this country, without knowing how dear the government of it cost her. Barton Booth (1681 1733), son of a Lancashire squire of good family, was educated at Westminster, and, spite of opposition, carried out his wish to become an actor and a famous one, his Cato in Addison's play being his greatest part. He wrote a masque on the death of Dido, and a number of poems, many of them to his wife and some of them sprightly. From one of his songs come the lines (based on Hudibras, III., ii. 175).

The Earl of Chesterfield.

p Dormer Stanhope (1694-1773) was an ened statesman, an orator, a conspicuous d a man of almost universal accomplishbut he is chiefly remembered as the of the famous Letters written to his natural nilip Stanhope. Son of the third Earl of field, he studied at Cambridge, made the tour, and sat in the House of Commons nber for St Germains in Cornwall from) 1726, when he succeeded his father as Earl. In 1730 he was made Lord Steward Household. /Until then, as a Whig, he pported Walpole; but being ousted from or voting against an excise bill, he went · the Opposition, and was one of Walpole's t antagonists. He was above bribes, and, ng to his lights, an honest statesman and patriot. He joined the Pelham Ministry 4; in 1745-46 was a judicious, able, and ttory Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland; and was one of the principal Secretaries of State, 1748 was compelled by ill-health and deafretire from public life. He was at one in terms of intimacy with Swift, Pope, slingbroke, and he patronised Colley Cibber any other men of letters. Later in life, ruding on Samuel Johnson the patronage he had withheld till the publication of the lary, he drew from the lexicographer the indignant letter. The story that Johnson pt waiting in an anteroom in Chesterfield's while fops and fribbles passed freely into esence is not true, and was denied by n himself.

Besides series of letters, he wrote articles for cals and produced some political tracts. tters to his son were meant to form the man's mind, mould his manners, and make n exceptionally accomplished man of the They were carried on from the time the is five years old till his death as envoy at m at the age of thirty-six. The letters contain deal of shrewd advice and observation, highly refined taste in literary matters, and itten in singularly pure, perspicuous, and graceful English. Their ethical level is not high: though Johnson spoke quite unfairly when he said they taught the morals of a whore and the manners of a dancing-master. Chesterfield carefully distinguished between the manners of a gentleman and those of a dancing-master, which he abhorred; his morals, however unsatisfactory, were not those suggested by Johnson. He earnestly reprobated what he regarded as the coarser forms of vice. It might rather be said that he had neither real moral principles nor religious scruples, nor any higher rule of life than a regard for the conventional decencies prescribed by the code of his time-gentlemanliness as then understood. It was not an age of pure lives or lofty aspirations, and Chesterfield was perhaps not far below the level of the contemporary man of the world, whose supreme aim in life was to shine in public life or in society. The tone is cynical; self-control and regard for the feelings of others are necessary for our own well-being. Gallantry, its justifications, etiquette, and proper management, are discussed with unpleasant iteration, most unedifying maxims being seriously inculcated. A recent editor apologises for Chesterfield's remarkable counsel to his son to cultivate irregular relations with married women, on the ground that of a total of four hundred and twenty-one letters printed by him only seven or eight gave this unholy advice! The 121st letter-to the boy of eighteen -says women are children of a larger growth, without good sense; 'a man of sense only trifles with them, plays with them.' The 180th has the first actual suggestion; the notorious 202nd opens,

'I have seldom or never written to you on the subject of religion and morality;' insists that 'your moral character [i.e. on the side of honour and truthfulness, not of sexual purity] must be not only pure, but, like Cæsar's wife, unsuspected;' and, characteristically, proceeds explicitly to recommend adultery. The letters were never designed for publication. After the death of Mr Stanhope in 1768, it was found that he had been secretly married, and had left a widow and two children. The widow made over the original letters to their proper owner, Lord Chesterfield, but she preserved copies, and immediately after the death of the eminent wit and statesman, the letters were committed to the press. The copyright was sold for £1500—a sum almost unprecedented for such a work-and five editions were called for within twelve months. In the later years of his life, when almost totally deaf and afflicted by increasing ill-health, Chesterfield wrote another long series of letters to his youthful kinsman, godson, and successor in the earldom -letters similar to the earlier ones in general aim, but less remarkable and less exceptionable. On his deathbed he still endeavoured to carry out his own maxims of punctilious courtesy towards those about him.

On Good-Breeding.

A friend of yours and mine has very justly defined good-breeding to be, 'the result of much good-sense, some good-nature, and a little self-denial for the sake of others, and with a view to obtain the same indulgence from them.' Taking this for granted-as I think it cannot be disputed -- it is astonishing to me that anybody, who has good-sense and good-nature, can essentially fail in good-breeding. As to the modes of it indeed, they vary according to persons, places, and circumstances, and are only to be acquired by observation and experience; but the substance of it is everywhere and eternally the same. Goodmanners are to particular societies what good morals are to society in general—their cement and their security. And as laws are enacted to enforce good morals, or at least to prevent the ill-effects of bad ones, so there are certain rules of civility universally implied and received, to enforce good-manners and punish bad ones. And indeed there seems to me to be less difference both between the crimes and punishments than at first one would imagine. The immoral man who invades another's property is justly hanged for it; and the ill-bred man, who by his ill-manners invades and disturbs the quiet and comforts of private life, is by common consent as justly banished society. Mutual complaisances, attentions, and sacrifices of little conveniences are as natural an implied compact between civilised people as protection and obedience are between kings and subjects; whoever in either case violates that compact, justly forfeits all advantages arising from it. For my own part, I really think that, next to the consciousness of doing a good action, that of doing a civil one is the most pleasing; and the epithet which I should covet the most, next to that of Aristides, would be that of well-bred.

Judicious Flattery.

If you would particularly gain the affection and friendship of particular people, whether men or women, endeavour to find out their predominant excellency, if they have one, and their prevailing weakness, which every body has; and do justice to the one, and something more than justice to the other. Men have various objects in which they may excel, or at least would be thought to excel; and, though they love to hear justice done to them where they know that they excel, yet they are most and best flattered upon those points where they wish to excel, and yet are doubtful whether they do or not. As for example Cardinal Richelieu, who was undoubtedly the ablest statesman of his time, or perhaps of any other, had the idle vanity of being thought the best poet too: he envied the great Corneille his repstation, and ordered a criticism to be written upon the Cid. Those therefore who flattered skilfully said little to him of his abilities in state affairs, or at least bet en passant, and as it might naturally occur. But the incense which they gave him, the smoke of which they knew would turn his head in their favour, was as a bel esprit and a poet. Why? Because he was sure of one excellency, and distrustful as to the other. You will easily discover every man's prevailing vanity, by observing his favourite topic of conversation; for every man talks most of what he has most a mind to be thought to excel in. Touch him but there, and you touch him to the quick. The late Sir Robert Walpole (who was certainly an able man) was little open to flattery upon that head; for he was in no doubt himself about it; but his prevailing weakness was to be thought to have a polite and happy turn to gallantry; of which be had undoubtedly less than any man living: it was his favourite and frequent subject of conversation; which proved to those who had any penetration that it was his prevailing weakness. And they applied to it with success.

Women have in general but one object, which is their beauty; upon which, scarce any flattery is too gross fo them to swallow. Nature has hardly formed a woman ugly enough to be insensible to flattery upon her person if her face is so shocking that she must in some degrebe conscious of it, her figure and air, she trusts, make ample amends for it. If her figure is deformed, be face, she thinks, counterbalances it. If they are botl bad, she comforts herself that she has graces; a certain manner; a je ne sçais quoi, still more engaging tha beauty. This truth is evident from the studied an elaborate dress of the ugliest women in the world An undoubted, uncontested, conscious beauty is of a women the least sensible of flattery upon that head: sh knows it is her due, and is therefore obliged to nobod for giving it her. She must be flattered upon her unde standing; which, though she may possibly not doubt . herself, yet she suspects that men may distrust.

Do not mistake me, and think that I mean to record mend to you abject and criminal flattery: no, flatt nobody's vices or crimes; on the contrary, abhor as discourage them. But there is no living in the wor without a complaisant indulgence for people's weaknesse and innocent, though ridiculous vanities. If a man had a mind to be thought wiser, and a woman handsome, than they really are, their error is a comfortable one themselves, and an innocent one with regard to other people; and I would rather make them my friends by indulging them in it, than my enemies, by endeavouring, and that to no purpose, to undeceive them.

There are little attentions, likewise, which are infinitely engaging, and which sensibly affect that degree of pride and self-love which is inseparable from human nature; at they are unquestionable proofs of the regard and consideration which we have for the person to whom we pay them. As for example, to observe the little habits, the likings, the antipathies, and the tastes of those whom we would gain; and then take care to provide them with the one, and to secure them from the other, giving them gesteelly to understand, that you had observed they liked such a dish, or such a room, for which reason you had prepared it: or, on the contrary, that having observed they had an aversion to such a dish, a dislike to such a person, &c., you had taken care to avoid presenting them. Such attention to such trifles flatters self-love much more than greater things, as it makes people think themselves almost the only objects of your thoughts and

These are some of the arcana's necessary for your initiation in the great society of the world. I wish I had known them better at your age; I have paid the price of three-and-fifty years for them, and shall not grudge it, if you reap the advantage. Adieu.

Personal Dignity.

There is a certain dignity of manners absolutely accessary to make even the most valuable character other respected or respectable.

Horse-play, romping, frequent and loud fits of laughter, jokes, waggery, and indiscriminate familiarity will sink both merit and knowledge into a degree of contempt. They compose at most a merry fellow; and a merry fellow was never yet a respectable man. Indiscriminate familiarity either offends your superiors, or else dubs you their dependent and led captain. It gives your inferiors just but troublesome and improper claims of equality. A joker is near akin to a buffoon; and neither of them is the least related to wit. Whoever is admitted or sought for in company upon any other account than that of his merit and manners is never respected there, but only made use of. We will have such a one, for he sings prettily; we will invite such a one to a ball, for he dances well; we will have such-a-one at supper, for he is always joking and laughing; we will ask another, because he plays deep at all games, or because he can drink a great deal. These are all vilifying distinctions, mortifying preferences, and exclude all ideas of esteem and regard. Whoever is bade (as it is called) in com-Pany for the sake of any one thing singly, is singly that thing and will never be considered in any other light; consequently never respected, let his merits be what they llia

This dignity of manners which I recommend so much you, is not only as different from pride as true charge is from blustering, or true wit from joking, but is absolutely inconsistent with it; for nothing vilifies and degrades more than pride. The pretensions of the proud man are oftener treated with sneer and contempt than ith indignation; as we offer ridiculously too little to tradesman who asks ridiculously too much for his goods; but we do not haggle with one who only asks a just and reasonable price.

Abject flattery and indiscriminate assentation degrade as much as indiscriminate contradiction and noisy debate disgust. But a modest assertion of one's own opinion, and a complaisant acquiescence in other people's, preserve dignity.

Vulgar, low expressions, awkward motions and address, vilify, as they imply either a very low turn of mind, or low education and low company.

Frivolous curiosity about trifles and a laborious attention to little objects, which neither require nor deserve a moment's thought, lower a man; who from thence is thought (and not unjustly) incapable of greater matters. Cardinal de Retz, very sagaciously, marked out Cardinal Chigi for a little mind, from the moment he told him he had wrote three years with the same pen, and that it was an excellent good one still.

A certain degree of exterior seriousness in looks and motions gives dignity without excluding wit and decent cheerfulness, which are always serious themselves. A constant smirk upon the face and a whiffling activity of the body are strong indications of futility. Whoever is in a hurry shews that the thing he is about is too big for him. Haste and hurry are very different things.

Detached Thoughts.

Men who converse only with women are frivolous, effeminate puppies, and those who never converse with them are bears.

The desire of being pleased is universal. The desire of pleasing should be so too. Misers are not so much blamed for being misers as envied for being rich.

Dissimulation to a certain degree is as necessary in husiness as clothes are in the common intercourse of life; and a man would be as imprudent who should exhibit his inside naked, as he would be indecent if he produced his outside so.

Hymen comes whenever he is called, but Love only when he pleases.

An abject flatterer has a worse opinion of others, and, if possible, of himself, than he ought to have.

A woman will be implicitly governed by the man whom she is in love with, but will not be directed by the man whom she esteems the most. The former is the result of passion, which is her character; the latter must be the effect of reasoning, which is by no means of the feminine gender.

The best moral virtues are those of which the vulgar are, perhaps, the best judges.

A fool never has thought, a madman has lost it; and an absent man is for the time without it.

Advice is seldom welcome; and those who want it the most always like it the least.

In spite of his courtly accomplishments, Chesterfield was of unimposing presence and rather distinctly plain-looking. Some of his other correspondence, memoirs, speeches, essays, and contributions to the press were published in two volumes in 1777. All the miscellaneous works appeared in four volumes in 1779. Mahon (afterwards Earl Stanhope) published the Letters and other pieces in five volumes in 1845-53, said Mr Brailshaw in three volumes in 1892. And the whole series of two hundred and thirty-six letters written to the Earl's godson and successor were published in 1890 by Lord Carnarvon. Oddly enough the godson, like the son, was ill qualified to profit by Chesterfield's counsel. He was good-natured and shrewd, fond of field sports and a country life, and rather decidedly defective in breeding. Another edition of the Letters by Mr C. Strachey appeared in 1901. Innumerable selections from the Letters have been published not merely in English, but in Dutch, German, and Spanish. See merely in English, but in Dutch, German, and Spanish. See Sainte-Beuve's. Critical Essay on Chesterfield (Eng. trans. 1870). W. Ernst Browning's Wit and Windom of Lord Chesterfield (1874) and his Memoirs of Lord Chesterfield (1893), and Churton Collins's Essays and Studies (1895).

Samuel Richardson.

From some unexplained circumstance, which certainly cannot be the lack of material, since there are no fewer than six huge volumes of his immoderate epistles in the Forster collection at South Kensington, Richardson has not hitherto found a place in any of the numerous series of short biographies. Until recently, the lengthy memoir which Mrs A. L. Barbauld prefixed in 1804 to her selection (also in six volumes) of his letters, remained the chief authority for his life; but in 1900 a careful biographical and critical study was published by Miss C. L. Thomson. Richardson's father, like Prior's, was a joiner: 'a very honest man (says his son), descended of a family of middling note, in the County of Surrey;' his mother, 'a good woman, of a family not ungenteel.1 At the time of the Monmouth rebellion the elder Richardson retired to Derbyshire, and here in 1689 Samuel Richardson was born. He was at first designed for the Church, but means were wanting; and, with nothing more than 'common school learning,' he began life in 1706 as a printer's apprentice, his master being Mr John Wilde of Aldersgate Street. He had selected this calling, he tells us, because he thought it would gratify his thirst for reading. In due time he became a compositor and corrector of the press, married, set up for himself (1719), printed newspapers, wrote 'honest dedications' and prefaces for the booksellers, and was made successively Printer of the Journals of the House of Commons, Master of the Stationers' Company, and finally King's Law Printer. His first London place of business was in Fleet Street itself. Afterwards he moved to Salisbury Square (then Court), where his last house (now demolished) was at No. 11, in the north-west corner, and his offices in the present Bell's Buildings. Besides his city residence, he had a country box a End, Fulham, which he occupied from I earlier, to 1754, when he moved to Parson's His three novels, the last of which was co early in 1754 by the issue of the final v were therefore written before he quitted End. At Parson's Green, on the 4th Ju'he died, and was buried in the middle St Bride's, Fleet Street, near the pulpit.

the neighbourhood, for whose corresp with their sweethearts he frequently supp only the words but the sentiments. 'I tell you what to write, said one impuls with her heart in her mouth, 'but you write too kindly;' and it is manifest that this sort must have greatly aided his minut into feminine character. He continued h when he became a printer's apprentic copious correspondence with an unnamed man of similar tastes, who, 'had he lived, high things' for his young friend. At last, when he was fifty, Messrs Rivington & who had already made use of his pen, 1 to him to compile a kind of model lett for the use of 'those country readers w unable to indite for themselves.' Two of the epistles prepared for this purpose s a separate story. 'And hence,' in the writer's own words, 'sprung Pamela.'

Virtue Rewarded, the second title of Pamela, (whose name, by the way, is borrowed from Sidney's Arcadia), sufficiently indicates the object of the book. But the precise author added further explanatory details. It was, he said, 'a series of familiar letters from a beautiful young damsel to her parents, published in order to cultiwate the principles of virtue and religion in the youth of both sexes.' It was besides 'a narrative which had its foundation in truth and nature; and, at the same time that it agreeably entertained by a variety of curious and affecting incidents, was entirely divested of all those images which, in too many pieces, calculated for amusement only, tend to inflame the minds they should instruct.' As to these last pretensions, it is possible that the modern reader, like the excellent Dr Watts. may have his doubts; but there can be no doubt as to the success of the book. Issued in two volumes in November 1740, by February it had reached a second edition, to be followed by a third in March, and a fourth in May. The Gentleman's Magazine, in a rapture of admiration, declared that it was 'judged in Town as great a Sign of Want of Curiosity not to have read Pamela, as not to have seen the French and Italian dancers.' A Southwark clergyman extolled it from the pulpit; the great Mr Pope was alleged to have said that it would 'do more good than many volumes of sermons,' and profaner Persons went as far as to compare it with the Bible. Fine ladies at public gardens (Mrs Barbauld says Ranelagh, but Ranelagh was not opened) held up the popular tomes to one another 'to shew they had got the book that every one was talking of.' In short, its vogue was undeniable. It interested; it held the reader; it dealt with existing men and women; and it was as different as possible from the 'huge folios of inanity,' the Clelias and the Cassandras, which then constituted the light reading of the period. Those who examine it now, while thoroughly recognising the sincerity of its intention, will probably be repelled both by its manner and its morality. They will also conclude that the prolonged defence of the heroine's chastity smacks unpleasantly of expediency and calculation. But it is a peculiarity of the writer's minute and exasperating method that its cumulative effect is difficult to resist. Attracting at first insensibly, it gradually fascinates, and finally absorbs. Moreover, its patient analysis of motive is akin to genius, and its knowledge of the female heart extraordinary from the outset. The quotation from Horace which Fielding afterwards applied to the author of Clarissa is already true of the author of this earlier book upon which he built up his own brilliant reputation:

Pectus inaniter angit,
Irritat, mulcet, falsis terroribus implet
Ut Magus. (Hor. Epist. II. i.)

The story of Fielding's Joseph Andrews, and the connection with Pamela of what Richardson not unnaturally styled its 'lewd and ungenerous engraftment,' belongs, however, to our account of Fielding. Of the other works which owe their origin to Richardson's book, it is only necessary to recall the names. Pamela's Conduct in High Life, Pamela Censured, Anti-Pamela, The Apology for the Life of Mrs Shamela Andrews, &c., had nevertheless this effect, that they prompted the author to produce two supplementary volumes. 'Second parts are never good,' says the bachelor Samson Carrasco in Don Quixote; and these supplementary volumes, which appeared in December 1741, were no exception to the rule. They were dull, they were heavy, and they were 'less a continuation than the author's defence of himself.' But two years later he was already engaged upon a far greater work than Pamela, the book entitled Clarissa; or, the History of a Young Lady, of which the further object, as particularised upon the title-page, was to show 'the Distresses that may attend the Misconduct both of Parents and Children in Relation to Marriage.' The first two volumes were published in November 1747; and in April and December of the following year the book was completed by five more. Notwithstanding its extent, it is Richardson's masterpiece. Its subject is not, like that of Pamela, 'virtue rewarded,' but rather virtue hunted down and outraged. That the author has rendered such a theme endurable through so many pages-which pages, moreover, cover only a period of eleven months-is an unanswerable proof of his genius. And not only is his heroine one of the most beautiful, as she is the noblest and purest of her sex; but her creator, whose strength hitherto had not lain in the delineation of men, has achieved, in her seducer, Lovelace (whether he built him on the lines of Rowe's Lothario or not), one of the most attractive villains of fiction. In addition to this, the book, as a narrative, straggles less than its predecessor; there is no wandering from the plain path of the story, and no dallying with details which retard the carrying onward of the Unhasting, unresting, unrelenting, the climax. author progresses to his foreseen conclusion with all the inexorable impetus of Fate. Clarissa, or (as it is popularly and erroneously called) Clarissa Harlowe, was, and deserved to be, a success. From persons of quality like Lady Mary Wortley Montagu and Lady Hervey, down to the seamstress behind her Cheapside or Ludgate counter, the little printer's book set all England sobbing; and the wave of sentiment spread from England to the Continent, where the sorrows of Richardson's heroine delighted the great critic Diderot, and stimulated the super-sensitised spirit of Rousseau. Jean-Jacques, who remembered Clarissa in his Nouvelle Héloise, declared that nothing equal to or approaching it had been written in any language; while Diderot placed its author on the same shelf with Moses and Homer, Euripides and Sophocles. History, he said, painted individuals; Richardson had painted the human species. In Germany, Klopstock, Gellert, and Wieland added their voices to the chorus. The book was promptly translated into German, Dutch, and French—the French translator being none else than the Abbé Prévost, himself the author of another epochmaking novel, Manon Lescaut. Prévost had already translated the first two volumes of Pamela, and he also made a version of Grandison.

Six years elapsed before Richardson again came forward as a novelist. In Clarissa he had intended the portrait of a good woman; in his next and last work he essayed the (to him) more difficult task of depicting a good man-'a man of true honour.' Sir Charles Grandison (whose surname has become synonymous with a certain frigid and formal politeness) represents the beau-ideal of a perfect gentleman and Christian. He disapproves of duelling as fervently as Steele, declines to dock the tails of his horses, and comports himself generally, on all occasions, including the Macheath-like dilemma of loving two ladies at once, with a most edifying discretion. But, although he is drawn with strokes as minute and patient, he never quite 'comes off' in the same way as Clarissa. He is too superfine, too courteous, too impeccable for 'human nature's daily food;' and one can understand, and even excuse, the burst of unwonted levity with which M. Taine eventually dismisses him: 'He is great, he is generous, he is delicate, he is pious, he is irreproachable; he has never done a dirty action or been betrayed into a false gesture. His conscience and his wig are intact. So be it. He shall be canonised and stuffed.' But if the hero of the book never attains to the faultless monsterhood at which the author aimed, in the feminine characters, Clementina, Harriet Byron, Charlotte Grandison, and so forth, he is again at his best. And though Sir Charles Grandison does not equal Clarissa, it is immeasurably superior to Pamela.

Besides the volume of model letters with which Pamela originated, a pamphlet dealing with the treatment he had experienced at the hands of the Dublin booksellers, and a paper in the Rambler (No. 97, on 'Virtuous Courtship'), in the introductory sentence to which Johnson describes him as an author who had 'enlarged the knowledge of human nature, and taught the passions to move at the command of virtue,' Richardson made no further contributions to literature of any importance. He continued to write at inordinate length to his friends and admirers, mostly of the opposite sex, and to receive complacently the unstinted tribute of their adulation. A nervous, sentimental little man, a vegetarian and water-drinker, his health, undermined by long sedentary occupation, declined as he grew older, and he became subject to fits of dizziness. His chief mode of exercise was walking, with alternative of that recently-revived substitute for equitation, the chamber-hobby o horse. He quitted London rarely, and then go no farther than Bath or Tunbridge Wells, when he might be seen in his flaxen wig, furtively shuffling along the side-walks, one hand in his boson the other at his chin or grasping his cane-head beneath his coat-tails, shyly distrustful of strangers, but brightening into a fluttered benignity upon the approach of Miss Highmore, Miss Fielding, Miss Mulso, Miss Talbot, Miss Collier, or some other member of the little consistory of feminine flatteren whom he called 'my ladies.'

His three novels, as already stated, belong to his residence at North End, which seems at one time to have been known, either actually or familiarly as Selby House (Corr. i. clxvi.), after the 'Selby House' in Grandison. His favourite writing-place was a grotto or arbour in the middle of the garder at the back, where he had a seat with an ink horn on the side. He has also an ink-pot let int the handle of his chair in Highmore's portrait. 1 was his practice to write his letters, either feigne or real, upon a little board which he held in hi hand, and this is shown in another picture b Mason Chamberlin, which has been engraved Some of his work must have been done at Salis bury Court; but it is probable that the greate part of Clarissa and Grandison had its birth in th grotto at North End. To this, says Mrs Barbauk he used to retreat in the morning 'before th family were up; and, when they met at breakfas he communicated the progress of his story, which by that means, had every day a fresh and livel interest. Then began the criticisms, the pleading: for Harriet Byron or Clementina; every turn an every incident was eagerly canvassed, and th author enjoyed the benefit of knowing beforehan how his situations would strike.' One of thes sessions, which sometimes took place in the grott itself, is depicted in a little sketch by Miss High more, where Richardson is shown reading th manuscript of Grandison to a circle of friend These readings must have been invaluable to him in shaping and modifying the course of his stor They must also be responsible, in some measur for its exceptional length, if, as he told Young, I was apt to add three pages for every one that l retrenched. But his prolixity was innate. It was a part of his minute method, and it is also part his strength. 'You have,' said Aaron Hill, wl tried vainly to abridge him, 'formed a style ... where verbosity becomes a virtue; because, pictures which you draw with such a skilful neg gence, redundance but conveys resemblance; at to contract the strokes would be to spoil the lik ness.' This is the verdict of an admirer; but is true. Richardson's style is not good; it colloquial, it is pedestrian, it is diffuse. But it also direct and unaffected, and, what is mor in the much-debated metaphor of Buffon, it the man himself—the sentient being, Phoms même.

Pamela in Church.

Yesterday [Sunday] we set out, attended by John, braham, Benjamin, and Isaac, in fine new liveries, in se best chariot, which had been new cleaned and lined, ad new-harnessed; so that it looked like a quite new ne. But I had no arms to quarter with my dear ord and master's, though he jocularly, upon my taking votice of my obscurity, said that he had a good mind o have the olive-branch, which would allude to his topes, quartered for mine. I was dressed in the suit I mentioned, of white, flowered with silver, and a rich sead, and the diamond necklace, ear-rings, &c. I also mentioned before. And my dear sir, in a fine laced silk waistcoat, of blue paduasoy, and his coat a pearlpoloured fine cloth, with gold buttons and button-holes, and lined with white silk; and he looked charmingly indeed. I said I was too fine, and would have laid sside some of the jewels: but he said it would be thought a slight to me from him, as his wife; and hough, as I apprehended, it might be that people would talk as it was, yet he had rather they should my anything, than that I was not put upon an equal oot, as his wife, with any lady he might have married.

It seems the neighbouring gentry had expected us, and there was a great congregation, for (against my wish) we were a little of the latest; so that, as we walked up the church to his seat, we had abundance of gazers and whisperers. But my dear master behaved with so intrepid an air, and was so cheerful and complaisant to me, that he did credit to his kind choice, instead of shewing as if he was ashamed of it; and as I was resolved to busy my mind entirely with the duties of the day, my intentness on that occasion, and my thankfulness to God for his unspeakable mercies to me, so took up my thoughts, that I was much less concerned than I should otherwise have been at the gazings and whisperings of the ladies and gentlemen, as well as the rest of the congregation, whose eyes were all turned to our seat.

When the sermon was ended, we staid the longer because the church should be pretty empty; but we found great numbers at the church-doors, and in the church-porch; and I had the pleasure of hearing many commendations, as well of my person as my dress and behaviour, and not one reflection or mark of disrespect. Mr Martin, who is single, Mr Chambers, Mr Arthur, and Mr Brooks, with their families, were all there; and the our gentlemen came up to us before we went into the hariot, and in a very kind and respectful manner comdimented us both; and Mrs Arthur and Mrs Brooks 'ere so kind as to wish me joy. And Mrs Brooks said: You sent Mr Brooks, madam, home t' other day quite armed with a manner which you have convinced a ousand persons this day is natural to you.' 'You do great honour, madam,' replied I; 'such a good lady's "Obation must make me too sensible of my happi-My dear master handed me into the chariot, and d talking with Sir Thomas Atkyns at the door of 'ho was making him abundance of compliments, and Very ceremonious gentleman, a little too extreme in way), and I believe to familiarise me to the gazers, The concerned me a little; for I was dashed to hear Praises of the country-people, and to see how they ded about the chariot. Several poor people begged charity; and I beckoned John with my fan, and d: 'Divide in the further church-porch that money to the poor, and let them come to-morrow morning to me, and I will give them something more if they don't importune me now.' So I gave him all the silver I had, which happened to be between twenty and thirty shillings; and this drew away from me their clamorous prayers for charity.

Mr Martin came up to me on the other side of the chariot, and leaned on the very door, while my master was talking to Sir Thomas, from whom he could not get away, and said: 'By all that's good, you have charmed the whole congregation. Not a soul but is full of your praises. My neighbour knew, better than anybody could tell him, how to choose for himself. Why,' said he, 'the Dean himself looked more upon you than his book!' 'O sir,' said I, 'you are very encouraging to a weak mind.' 'I vow,' said he, 'I say no more than is truth. I'd marry to-morrow if I was sure of meeting with a person of but one-half of the merit you have. You are,' continued he-'and 'tis not my way to praise toomuch—an ornament to your sex, an honour to your spouse, and a credit to religion. Everyloody is saying so,' added he, 'for you have by your piety edified the whole church.

As he had done speaking, the Dean himself complimented me, that the behaviour of so worthy a lady would be very edifying to his congregation, and encouraging to himself. 'Sir,' said I, 'you are very kind: I hope I shall not behave unworthy of the good instructions I shall have the pleasure to receive from so worthy a divine.' He bowed and went on.

Sir Thomas then applied to me, my master stepping into the chariot, and said: 'I beg pardon, madam, for detaining your good spouse from you. But I have been saying he is the happiest man in the world.' I bowed to him; but I could have wished him further, to make me sit so in the notice of every one: which, for all I could do, dashed me not a little.

Mr Martin said to my master: 'If you'll come tochurch every Sunday with your charming lady, I will never absent myself, and she'll give a good example toall the neighbourhood.' 'O my dear sir,' said I to my master, 'you know not how much I am obliged to good Mr Martin: he has by his kind expression made me dare to look up with pleasure and gratitude.' Said my master: 'My dear love, I am very much obliged, as well as you, to my good friend Mr Martin.' And he said to him: 'We will constantly go to church, and toevery other place where we can have the pleasure of seeing Mr Martin.' Mr Martin said: 'Gad, sir, you are a happy man, and I think your lady's example has made you more polite and handsome too than I ever knew you before, though we never thought you unpolite neither." And so he bowed, and went to his own chariot; and as we drove away, the people kindly blessed us, and called us a charming pair. (From Pamela's journal, in Pamela.)

The Death of Lovelace—Translation of a letter from F. J. De la Tour. To John Belford, Esq., near Soho Square, London.

TRENT, December 18, N.S.

Sir,—I have melancholy news to inform you of, by order of the Chevalier Lovelace. He showed me his letter to you before he sealed it, signifying that he was to meet the Chevalier Morden on the 15th. Wherefore, as the occasion of the meeting is so well known to you, I shall say nothing of it here.

I had taken care to have ready, within a little distance, a surgeon and his assistant, to whom, under an oath of secrecy, I had revealed the matter (though I did not own it to the two gentlemen): so that they were prepared with bandages, and all things proper. For well was I acquainted with the bravery and skill of my chevalier; and had heard the character of the other; and knew the animosity of both. A post-chaise was ready, with each of their footmen, at a little distance.

The two chevaliers came exactly at their time: they were attended by Monsieur Margate (the Colonel's gentleman) and myself. They had given orders over night, and now repeated them in each other's presence, that we should observe a strict impartiality between them: and that, if one fell, each of us should look upon himself, as to any needful help or retreat, as the servant of the survivor, and take his commands accordingly.

After a few compliments, both the gentlemen, with the greatest presence of mind that I ever beheld in men, stript to their shirts, and drew.

They parried with equal judgment several passes. My chevalier drew the first blood, making a desperate push, which, by a sudden turn of his antagonist, missed going clear through him, and wounded him on the fleshy part of the ribs of his right side; which part the sword tore out, being on the extremity of the body: but, before my chevalier could recover himself, the Colonel, in return, pushed him into the inside of the left arm, near the shoulder: and the sword (raking his breast as it passed) being followed by a great effusion of blood, the Colonel said, sir, I believe you have enough.

My chevalier swore by G—d he was not hurt: 'twas a pin's point: and so made another pass at his antagonist; which he, with a surprising dexterity, received under his arm, and run my dear chevalier into the body: who immediately fell: saying, The luck is yours, sir—O my beloved Clarissa!—now art thou—. Inwardly he spoke three or four words more. His sword dropped from his hand. Mr Morden threw his down, and ran to him, saying in French—Ah monsieur, you are a dead man!—call to God for mercy!

We gave the signal agreed upon to the footmen; and they to the surgeons, who instantly came up.

Colonel Morden, I found, was too well used to the bloody work; for he was as cool as if nothing extraordinary had happened, assisting the surgeons, though his own wound bled much. But my dear chevalier fainted away two or three times running, and vomited blood besides.

However, they stopped the bleeding for the present; and we helped him into the voiture; and then the Colonel suffered his own wound to be dressed, and appeared concerned that my chevalier was between whiles (when he could speak, and struggle) extremely outrageous.—Poor gentleman! he had made quite sure of victory!

The Colonel, against the surgeons' advice, would mount on horseback to pass into the Venetian territories, and generously gave me a purse of gold to pay the surgeons; desiring me to make a present to the footman, and to accept of the remainder, as a mark of his satisfaction in my conduct, and in my care and tenderness of my master.

The surgeons told him, that my chevalier could not live over the day,

When the Colonel took leave of him, Mr Lorelage said, You have well revenged the dear creature.

I have, sir, said Mr Morden: and perhaps shall be sorry that you called upon me to this work, while I wa balancing whether to obey, or disobey, the dear angel.

There is a fate in it! replied my chevalier—a cursel fate!—or this could not have been!—but be ye all witnesses, that I have provoked my destiny, and acknowledge that I fall by a man of honour.

Sir, said the Colonel, with the piety of a confessor (wringing Mr Lovelace's hand), snatch these few fleeting moments, and commend yourself to God.

And so he rode off.

The voiture proceeded slowly with my chevalier; yet the motion set both his wounds bleeding afresh; and it was with difficulty that they again stopped the blood.

We brought him alive to the nearest cottage; and he gave orders to me to dispatch to you the packet I herewith send sealed up; and bid me write to you the particulars of this most unhappy affair, and give you thanks, in his name, for all your favours and friendship to him.

Contrary to all expectation, he lived over the night: but suffered much, as well from his impatience and in appointment as from his wounds; for he seemed not unwilling to die.

He was delirious, at times, in the two last hours; and then several times cried out, as if he had seen some frightful spectre, Take her away! Take her away! but named nobody. And sometimes praised some lady (that Clarissa, I suppose, whom he had invoked when he received his death's wound), calling her, Sweet Excellence! Divine Creature! Fair Sufferer!—and once he said, Look down, Blessed Spirit, look down —and there stopped;—his lips however moving.

At nine in the morning, he was seized with coordsions, and fainted away; and it was a quarter of me hour before he came out of them.

His few last words I must not omit, as they show as ultimate composure; which may administer some complation to his honourable friends.

Blessed—said he, addressing himself no doubt to Heaven; for his dying eyes were lifted up—a strong convulsion prevented him for a few moments saying more—but recovering, he again with great fervour (lifting up his eyes, and his spread hands) pronounced the word blessed:—then, in a seeming ejaculation, he spoke inwardly so as not to be understood: at last, he distinctly pronounced these three words, and then, his head sinking on his pillow, he expired, a about half an hour after ten.

LET THIS EXPIATE!

He little thought, poor gentleman! his end so near: so had given no direction about his body. I have caused it to be embowelled, and deposited in a vault, till I have orders from England.

This is a favour that was procured with difficulty; and would have been refused, had he not been an Englishman of rank: a nation with reason respected in every Austrian government—for he had refused ghostly attendance, and the sacraments in the Catholic way. May his soul be happy, I pray God!

I have had some trouble also, on account of the manner of his death, from the magistracy here: who ne requisite informations in the affair. And some money. Of which, and of the dear fects, I will give you a faithful account in nd so, waiting at this place your commands, I am, sir, ar most faithful and obedient servant,

F. J. DE LA TOUR.

at here you will bid me take care not to number of the giddy; and so I will, my sense of this real fine gentleman is not, as I ted over by sourness, by moroseness: he is elling with the world for trifles: but he is still more above making such compliances with it as would impeach either his honour or conscience. Once Miss Grandison, speaking of her brother, said, My brother is valued by those who know him best, not so much for being a handsome man, not so much for his birth and fortune, nor for this or that single worthiness, as for being, in the great and yet comprehensive sense of the word, a good man. And at another time she said, that he lived to himself, and to his own heart; and though he had the happiness to please every body, yet he made the judgment or approbation of the world matter but of second consideration. In a word, added she, Sir Charles Grandison, my brother, (and when she looks proud, it is when she says, my brother), is not to be misled either by false glory, or false shame, which he calls, The great snares of virtue.

What a man is this, so to act!—What a woman is this, so to distinguish her brother's excellencies!

What a poor creature am I, compared to either of them! And yet I have had my admirers. So perhaps may still more faulty creatures among their inferiors. If, my Lucy, we have so much good sense as to make fair comparisons, what have we to do but to look forward rather than backward, in order to obtain the grace of humility?

But let me tell you, my dear, that Sir Charles does not look to be so great a self-denier, as his sister seems to think him, when she says, he lives to himself, and to his own heart, rather than to the opinion of the world.

He dresses to the fashion, rather richly, 'tis true, than gaudily; but still richly: so that he gives his fine person its full consideration. He has a great deal of vivacity in his whole aspect, as well as in his eye. Mrs Jenny says, that he is a great admirer of handsome women. His equipage is perfectly in taste, though not so much to the glare of taste, as if he aimed either to inspire or shew emulation. He seldom travels without a set, and suitable attendants; and what I think seems a little to sayour of singularity, his horses are not docked: their tails are only tied up when they are on the road. This I took notice of when we came to town. I want, methinks, my dear, to find some fault in his outward appearance, were it but to make you think me impartial; my gratitude to him and my veneration for him notwithstanding.

But if he be of opinion that the tails of these noble animals are not only a natural ornament, but are of real use to defend them from the vexatious insects that in summer are so apt to annoy them (as Jenny just now told me was thought to be his reason for not depriving his cattle of a defence, which nature gave them), how far from a dispraise is this humane consideration! And how, in the more minute as well as we may suppose in the greater instances, does he deserve the character of the man of mercy, who will be merciful to his beast!

I have met with persons, who call those men good, that yet allow themselves in liberties which no good man can take. But I dare say, that Miss Grandison means by good, when she calls her brother, with so much pride, a good man, what I, and what you, my Lucy, would understand by the word.

Richardson's works were collected in 1811, in nineteen volumes, with a sketch of his life, by the Rev. Edward Mangin, M.A. They were also included in Ballantyne's Novelist's Library, with a memoir by Sir Walter Scott. Later editions are Works, with a prefatory chapter of biographical criticism by Mr Leslie Stephen (12 vols 1883); and Novels, with an introduction by Miss Ethel M. M. M'Kenna (20 vols. 1901). This east, which includes reproductions of the pretty old plates of Stothard, Burney and the rest, is based upon Mangin's text. There are notable articles upon Richardson in Blackwood's Magazine (Mrs Oliphant), March 1869; Fortnightly Review (Mr H. Buxton Forman), October 1869 and December 1901, Contemporary Review (H. D. Trall), October 1883; and National Review (Mrs Andrew Lang), November 1889. The New Lucian of Mr Trail (1900) also contains, at pages 268-86, an admirable d alogue between Fielding and Richardson; and there are references to his work in Larroumet's Marinaux (1882); Jusserand's Le Roman Anglass (1886); Texte's Jean Jacques Rousseau, &c. (1895); and Erich Schraidt's Richards in Rouseau, and Goethe (1875). A bust of Richardson, by George Frampion, A.R.A., was recently (20th November 1901) unveiled at the St Bride Foundation Institute, in Flect Street. His North End house (formerly 49 but now 111 North End Road, Fulham) stal exists, and was recently the residence of the late Sir E. Burne-Jones, Bart ; the Parson's Green house, which stood at the south-west corner of the green facing the King's Road which leads from Butkingham Palice to Patney Bridge, has long disappeared An interesting sketch of it, with a misleading title, was engraved by J. P. Malco m in 1799.

AUSTIN DOBSON.

William Somerville (1675-1742), the poet of The Chase, was, as he tells Allan Ramsay, 'a squire well born, and six foot high.' The patrimonial estate (to which he succeeded in 1705) lay in Warwickshire, and was worth £1500 a year. Generous but extravagant and dissipated, he died in distressed circumstances; and having no child to succeed him, for present relief of burdens he settled his estate on the Scottish Lord Somerville. He wrote a poetical address to Addison when he purchased an estate in Warwickshire. 'In his verses to Addison,' says Johnson, 'the couplet which mentions Clio is written with the most exquisite delicacy of praise; it exhibits one of those happy strokes that are seldom attained.' Addison signed his papers in the Spectator with the letters of the name Clio; and this is the couplet which so delighted Johnson:

When panting virtue her last efforts made, You brought your Clio to the virgin's aid.

In welcoming Addison to the banks of Avon, Somerville (like many another critic of the time) scruples not to rank him above Shakespeare;

In heaven he sings; on earth your muse supplies The important loss, and heals our weeping eyes; Correctly great, she melts each fluty heart With equal genius, but superior art.

Somerville's chief poetical ventures were The Two Springs, a Fable (1725); Occasional Poems (1727); The Chase (1735); Hobbinol, a burlesque (1740); and Field Sports, a poem on hawking (1742). The Chase, in blank verse, contains practical instructions to sportsmen; this is a bright sketch of an autumn morning proper for 'throwing off the pack:'

Now golden Autumn from her open lap Her fragrant bounties showers; the fields are shorn; Inwardly smiling, the proud farmer views The rising pyrami's that grace his yard, And counts his large increase; his barns are stored, And grouning staddles bend beneath their load, such such All now is free as air, and the gay pack In the rough bristly stubbles range unblamed; No widow's tears o'erflow, no secret curse Swells in the farmer's breast, which his pale lips Trembling conceal, by his fierce landlord awed: But courteous now he levels every fence, Joins in the common cry, and hollows loud, Charmed with the rattling thunder of the field. O bear me, some kind power invisible, To that extended lawn where the gay court View the swift racers, stretching to the goal; Games more renowned, ann a far nobler train, Than proud Elean fields could boast of old. Oh were a Theban lyre not wanting here, And Pindar's voice, to do their merit right! Or to those spacious plains, where the strained eye, In the wide prospect lost, beholds at last Saram's proud spire, that o'er the hills ascends And pierces through the clouds. Or to thy downs, Fair Corswold, where the well-breathed beagle camb, With matchless speed, thy green aspiring brow, And leaves the lagging multitude behind.

Hail, gentle Dawn! mild, blushing goddess, hail! Rejoiced I see thy purple mantle spread O'er half the skies; gems pave thy radiant way, And orient pearls from every shrub depend. Farewell, Cleora; here, deep sunk in down, Slumber secure, with happy dreams amused, Till grateful streams shall tempt thee to receive Thy early meal, or thy officious maids; The toilet placed shall urge thee to perform The important work. Me other joys invite: The horn sonorous calls, the pack awaked Their matins chant, nor brook my long delay. My courser hears their voice; see there, with ears And tail erect, neighing he paws the ground; Fierce rapture kindles in his reddening eyes, And boils in every vein. As captive boys. Cowed by the ruling rod and haughty frowns Of pedagogues severe, from their hard tasks If once dismissed, no limits can contain The tumult raised within their little breasts, But give a loose to all their frolic play; So from their kennel rush the joyous pack; A thousand wanton gaieties express Their inward cestasy, their pleasing sport Once more indulged, and liberty restored. The rising sun that o'er the horizon peeps, As many colours from their clossy skins Bearing reflects, as paint the various bow When April showers descend. Delightful scene? Where all around is gay; men, horses, dogs; And in each smiling countenance appears Fresh blooming health, and universal joy.

William Oldys (1696-1761) was a realous literary antiquary and Norroy King-at-arms. He wrote a Life of Raleigh for the edition of Raleigh History of the World edited by him (1736), collected a large and valuable library, and assiste every author or bookseller who sought help from his voluminous collections. He was librarian to Harley, Earl of Oxford, catalogued the library.

Drink with me, and drink as I;

Make the most of life you may;
Life is short and wears away.
Both alike are mine and thine,
Hastening quick to their decline:

Though repeated to threescore;
Threescore summers when they're gone,
Will appear as short as one.

The Parting Kiss. 4

One kind wish before we part,
Drop a tear, and bid adieu:
Though we sever, my fond heart,
Till we meet, shall pant for you.

Yet, yet weep not so, my love, Let me kiss that falling tear; Though my body must remove, All my soul will still be here.

All my soul, and all my heart,
And every wish shall pant for you,
One kind kiss, then, ere we part,

Patrick Abercrombie (1656-1716?), a descendant of an old Scottish Catholic family and younger brother of the first Lord Glassford, was born at Forfar, graduated at St Andrews, and practised medicine in Edinburgh, being appointed physician to James 11, in 1685. A strong Jacobite and nationalist, he published two anti-Union pamphlets in 1707, one of them a reply to Daniel His patriotism, however, found more notable utterance in his Martial Achievements of the Scots Nation (1711-16), a popular and discursive history of the national wars and struggles from the time of the mythical King Fergus I., three centuries before Christ, to the battle of Flodden. Abercrombie's aim was to defend the legendary antiquity of Scotland against the sceptical criticism which as yet had got no hearing or tolerance north of the Tweed; and in his earlier chapters he repeats and elaborates the fables about Caractacus, Corbredus Galdus, and Achaius which had been concocted by Fordun and Boece (or by the annalists they took them from; see the next article, also Vol. I. pp. 182, 212, 256). He shows an abundance of absolutely uncritical learning, and, in spite of his frequent divergence into controversy, his style is easy and fluent enough to justify the esteem and popularity which he enjoyed for a while as the patriotic historian of Scotland.

The Antiquity of the Scottish Monarchy.

Scotland boasts of an uninterrupted series of 112 sovereigns, that till this time have swayed its sceptre, since Fergus I, who began to reign 330 years before the Christian æra commenced, than which there 's nothing so glorious, nothing equal or secondary in its kind. By this account Scotland has remained a monarchy, and monarchs of the same unspotted blood and royal line have governed it upwards of 2000 years, whereas, according to their own historians, France has lasted hitherto but 1309, Spain 1306, England 918, Poland 719 (sic), Denmark 920, Sweden 900, the Empire of the Romans in Germany 831, and that of the Turks but 420. The empire or Kingdom of China, 'tis owned, is of an older date than Scotland; but then, six several times, upon their own records, the race of their Kings has been changed by civil wars, and they have been four times conquered by foreign and barbarous forces; nay at this very day a Tartar race sits on the throne instead of a Chinese. Since, therefore, Scotland has such a pre-eminence over the very pretensions of all other nations with reference to their respective antiquities and races of Kings, 'tis no great wonder that some of our neighbours (and these are but few and late authors) have, through emulation and jealousy, attempted to strike out of the catalogue of Scots monarchs no less than 39, and to date the Scots government in North Britain from about the year of our Lord 503. This controversy was started by Luddus in the year 1572; Camden took the hint from him, as did afterwards the Bishop of St Asaph, and Dr Stillingfleet from both. The last three were men eminent for their learning and parts, but, as Englishmen in all ages, prejudiced against a rival but lesser nation; which nevertheless the immense treasure, refined policy, nor numerous, well disciplined and better paid forces of mighty England could never deject from equality in all things but wealth. Archbishop Usher, a man whose excellencies the learned and pious will ever respect, and the Irish of late (for of old they thought otherwise), have made the like attempts upon the Scots antiquities, and the race of their Kings. Men of such a character, both English and Irish, could not fail to proselyte some few foreigners, as Duchesne, Père L'Abbé, and Thomas Bosius, into an opinion which, by depressing but one nation, flatters the pride and raises the pretensions of most others, their own in particular. But all in vain: Scots writers have maintained with their pens the rights and territories Scots heroes first gained and then preserved with their arms, and what these effected by dint of sword, those have made good by dint of thought and force of argument.

Thomas Innes (1662-1744), a cadet of a gentle Catholic family in Aberdeenshire, was bred a priest in France, and studied and taught at the Scots College in Paris, of which he ultimately became Vice-Principal in 1727. From 1698 to 1701 he was in Scotland as a missionary priest, and in 1724 Wodrow saw him in Edinburgh consulting the Advocates' Library, and described him as 'a monkish bookish person who meddles with nothing but literature.' His historical studies, which seem to have begun with his share in the arrangement of the records of Glasgow Cathedral, possessed by the Scots College, bore good fruit in his Critical Essay on the Ancient Inhabitants of Scotland (1729), and his Ecclesiastical History of Scotland A.D. 80 to 818, first published by the Spalding Club in 1853. The former of these works has been justly described by Pinkerton as marking 'a grand epoch' in Scottish antiquities, and leading the way to 'rational criticism upon them.' Innes was the first to assail the fabric of spurious history founded by Fordun and completed and adorned by Boece and Buchanan, and in the Critical Essay he dispassionately and laboriously demolished the whole legendary series of kings—the portraits of them are still in Holyrood—with which our ancestors had peopled the seven dark centuries preceding the actual settlement of the Dalriada. As the earliest to apply methods to the Scottish historic leger print the authentic Pictish chronicles, rank as the veritable father of Scottinor is his position at all weakened by evident fact that he was stimulated I Jacobite dislike of Buchanan and a deprove the numerous stories of rebellionation in the legendary chronicles. T Essay is reprinted as volume viii. of the of Scotland' series, Edinburgh, 1879.

His own Character.

That cast of temper, whereby I was naturally slow, timorous, and diffident, but eager in pursuit when once engaged; as it early discovered itself, so I think it hath spread itself all along through the whole of my course. It hath been a spring of much uneasiness to me in the course of my life; in that I was thereby naturally fond, where I loved. Yet I cannot but observe, that my God Buth made a valuable use of it, especially in my studies, combating special difficulties therein, till surmounted by his favour. Agreeable unto it, I was not of a quick apprehension, but had a gift of application: and things being once discovered, I was no more wavering in them. I was addicted to silence, rather than to talking. I was so good spokesman, but very unready, even in common conversation; and in disputes especially at a loss, when engaged with persons of great assurance: the disadvantage of which last I often found in Etterick, where an mcommon assurance reigned. The touching of my spirit, so as to set me above fear, the moving of my affections, and being once well dipped into the matter, were necessary to give me an easy exercise of my faculties, in these and other extempore performances. My talent by in doing things by a close application, with pains I had a tolerable faculty at drawing of papers: yet no faculty at dictating, but behoved to have the pen in my own hand; and even in that case it would often have been a while ere I could enter on. Accordingly, as for my sermons, it was often hard for me to fix on a text; the which hath oft-times been more wasting and weakening to me than the study of my sermon thereon. I studied my sermons with the pen in my hand, my matter coming to me as I wrote, and the bread increasing in the breaking of it: if at any time I walked, it was occasioned by my sticking. Meanwhile, it would frequently have been long ere I got the vein of my subject struck: but then I could not be easy, unless I thought I had hit it. Thence it was, I often tore out what I had written, and began anew again; but ordimarily I found this turned to my greatest comfort and satisfaction, in end falling upon the vein. Hence it was not my manner to shift from text to text, but to insist long on an ordinary; the closing of which at length I readily found to relish as much with myself and the serious godly as the other parts preceding.

Thus also I was much addicted to peace, and averse to controversy; though once engaged therein, I was set to go through with it. I had no great difficulty to retain a due honour and charity for my brethren differing from me in opinion and practice; but then I was in no great hazard neither of being swayed by them to depart from what I judged truth or duty. Withal it was easy to me to yield to them in things wherein I found not myself in conscience bound up. Whatever precipitant steps I have made in the course of my life, which I desire to be humbled for, rashness in conduct was not my weak side. But since the Lord by his grace brought me to consider things, it was much my exercise to discern sin and duty in Particular cases, being afraid to venture on things until I should see myself called thereto: but when the matter was cleared to me, I generally stuck fast by it, being as much afraid to desert the way which I took to be Pointed out to me. And this I sincerely judge to have been the spring of that course of conduct upon which Mr James Ramsy above mentioned did, before the commission anno 1717, in my hearing, give me the following character, viz. That if I thought myself right, there would be no diverting of me by any means.

I never had the art of making rich; nor could I ever heartily apply myself to the managing of secular affairs. Even the secular way of managing the discipline of the church was so unacceptable to me that I had no heart to dip in the public church-management. What appearances I made at any time in these matters were not readily in that way. I had a certain averseness to the being laid under any notable obligation to others, and so was not fond of gifts, especially in the case of any whom I had to deal with as a minister. And Providence so ordered that I had little trial of that kind. I easily perceived that in that case, 'the borrower is servant to the lender.'

There is a Life of Boston by A. Thomson (1895), and an elaborate edition of the Memoirs by G. H. Morrison (1899).

Martin Martin, born in Skye, took his M.D. at Leyden, and about 1685 was already factor, or estate agent, for Macleod (the laird) in Skye; and he died in 1719. In 1698 he published a Voyage to St Kilda, narrating his own observations; and, in 1703, A Description of the Western Islands of Scotland. Dr Johnson had read Martin's book when he was very young, and was particularly struck with the St Kilda man's notion that the High Church of Glasgow had been hollowed out of a rock. This 'notion' had probably struck Addison also, as in the Spectator (No. 50) he makes, as Mr Croker has remarked, the Indian king suppose that St Paul's was carved out of a rock. Martin's work is but poorly written, as Dr Johnson said; but the out-of-the-way information it contains, and even the credulity of the writer, gave it an interest and value it has not yet lost. Martin gives a long account of the secondsight or taish, as it is called in Gaelic, in which he was a firm believer, though he admitted that it had greatly declined. In the dozen of pages he devotes to the subject he gives numerous authenticated cases, with names and addresses as in the transactions of the Psychical Research Society, including those that converted himself.

The Second-sight.

The second-sight is a singular faculty of seeing an otherwise invisible object, without any previous means used by the person that sees it for that end. The vision makes such a lively impression upon the seers, that they neither see nor think of anything else except the vision, as long as it continues; and then they appear pensive or jovial, according to the object which was represented to them. At the sight of a vision the eyelids of the person are erected, and the eyes continue staring until the object vanish. . . .

If an object is seen early in a morning (which is not frequent), it will be accomplished in a few hours afterwards; if at noon, it will commonly be accomplished that very day; if in the evening, perhaps that night; if after candles be lighted, it will be accomplished that night; the latter always in accomplishment by weeks, months, and sometimes years, according to the time of night the vision is seen. When a shroud is perceived about one, it is a sure prognostic of death; the time is judged according to the height of it about the person; for if it is not seen above the middle, death is not to be expected for the space of a year, and perhaps some months longer; and as it is frequently seen to ascend higher towards the head, death is concluded to be at hand within a few days, if not hours, as daily experience confirms.

If a woman is seen standing at a man's left hand, it is a presage that she will be his wife, whether they be married to others, or unmarried at the time of the apparition. . . . To see a seat empty at the time of one's sitting in it, is a presage of that person's death quickly after.

The Plaid.

The plaid, wore only by the men, is made of fine wool; the thread as fine as can be made of that kind; it consists of divers colours, and there is a great deal of ingenuity required in sorting the colours, so as to be agreeable to the nicest fancy. For this reason the women are at great pains first to give an exact pattern of the plaid upon a piece of wood, having the number of every thread of the stripe on it. The length of it is commonly seven double ells; the one end hangs by the middle over the left arm; the other going round the body, hangs by the end over the left arm also. The right hand above it is to be at liberty to do anything upon occasion. Every isle differs from each other in their fancy of making plaids as to the stripes in breadth and colours. This humour is as different through the mainland of the Highlands, in so far that they who have seen those places is able at the first view of a man's plaid to guess the place of his residence.

When they travel on foot, the plaid is tied on the breast with a bodkin of bone or wood—just as the spina wore by the Germans, according to the description of C. Tacitus. The plaid is tied round the middle with a leather belt. It is pleated from the belt to the knee very nicely. This dress for foot-men is found much easier and lighter than breeches or trowis [trews]. . . .

The plaid [anciently worn by women] being pleated all round, was tied with a belt below the breast; the belt was of leather, and several pieces of silver intermixed with the leather like a chain. The lower end of the belt has a piece of plate about eight inches long and three in breadth, curiously engraven; the end of which was adorned with fine stones or pieces of red coral. They wore sleeves of scarlet cloth, closed at the end as men's vests, with gold lace round 'em, having plate buttons set with fine stones. The head-dress was a fine kerchief of linen strait about the head, hanging down the back taper-wise. A large lock of hair hangs down their cheeks above the breast, the lower end tied with a knot of ribands.

The 'belted plaid' here described was the old Highland costume, superseded in the eighteenth century by the filibeg or modern kilt.

The St Kilda Man in Glasgow.

One of the inhabitants of St Kilda being some time ago wind-bound in the isle of Harries, was prevailed on by some of them that traded to Glasgow to go thither with them. He was astonished at the length of the voyage, and of the great kingdoms as he thought them, that is isles, by which they sailed; the largest in his way did not exceed twenty-four miles in length, but he considered how much they exceeded his own little native country.

Upon his arrival at Glasgow, he was like one that had dropt from the clouds into a new world; whose language, habit, &c. were in all respects new to him: he never imagined that such big houses of stone were made with hands; and for the pavements of the streets, he thought it must needs be altogether natural; for he could not believe that men would be at the pains to beat stones into the ground to walk upon. He stood dumb at the door of his lodging with the greatest admiration; and when he saw a coach and two horses, he thought it to be a little house they were drawing at their tail, with men in it; but he condemned the coachman for a fool to sit so uneasy, for he thought it safer to sit on the horse's back. The mechanism of the coach-wheel, and its running about, was the greatest of all his wonders.

When he went through the streets he desired to have one to lead him by the hand. Thomas Ross, a merchant, and others, that took the diversion to carry him through the town, asked his opinion of the High Church? He answered, that it was a large rock, yet there were some in St Kilda much higher, but that these were the best caves he ever saw; for that was the idea which be conceived of the pillars and arches upon which the church stands. When they carried him into the church, he was yet more surprised, and held up his hands with admiration, wondering how it was possible for men to build such a prodigious fabric, which he supposed to be the largest in the universe. He could not imagine what the pews were designed for, and he fancied the people that wore masks (not knowing whether they were men or women) had been guilty of some ill thing, for which they dared not shew their faces. He was amazed # women's wearing patches, and fancied them to have been blisters. Pendants seemed to him the most ridicalous of all things; he condemned perriwigs mightily, and much more the powder used in them: in fine, be condemned all things as superfluous he saw not in his own country. He looked with amazement on every thing that was new to him. When he heard the churchbells ring, he was under a mighty consternation, as if the fabric of the world had been in great disorder. He did not think there had been so many people in the world as in the city of Glasgow; and it was a great myster, to him to think what they could all design by living so many in one place. He wondered how they could all be furnished with provision; and when he saw big loaves, he could not tell whether they were bread, store, or wood. He was amazed to think how they could to provided with ale, for he never saw any there that drank water. He wondered how they made them fine clothe, and to see stockings made without being first cut and asterwards sewn was no small wonder to him. He thought it foolish in women to wear thin silks, as being a very improper habit for such as pretended to any soft of employment. When he saw the women's feet, be judged them to be of another shape than those of the men because of the different shape of their shoes. He did not approve of the heels worn by men or women; and when he observed horses with shoes on their feet, and fastened with iron nails, he could not forbear laughing. and thought it the most ridiculous thing that ever fell under his observation. He longed to see his native country again, and passionately wished it were blessel with ale, brandy, tobacco, and iron, as Glasgow was homas Ruddiman (1674-1757), the chief of tish Latinists since the age of Buchanan, wrote in the vernacular; but his editions of some er Scottish writers, his share in Scottish rical controversy, and his general literary ity give him the right to be mentioned here. 1 in Banffshire, and educated at King's Col-Aberdeen, he became parish schoolmaster aurencekirk, but went thence to Edinburgh at suggestion of Dr Pitcairne in 1700. At first tant and latterly chief librarian of the Advo-¿ Library, he was also a book auctioneer, a spaper proprietor, and a successful printer, did much good scholarly work, both original editorial. His well-known Rudiments (1714) Institutions (1725-32) of the Latin tongue, his 'immaculate' edition of Livy (1751), were main achievements in classical philology; e to Scottish literature he contributed a int of Gawin Douglas's version of the Eneid, an excellent glossary, in 1710, and a fine ion of the works of George Buchanan (1715) th has not yet been superseded. Ruddiman a stout Royalist and Jacobite in politics, his criticisms on Buchanan entangled him in rolonged controversy (1746-50) on the right uccession to the crown of Scotland, in which chief antagonist was a Presbyterian minister ed George Logan. Much more valuable than polemical tracts were his contributions to es Anderson's Diplomata Scotiæ (1739), the and for long the only monument of Scottish A sound scholar and a worthy 1, Ruddiman was praised by Dr Johnson, who ped at Laurencekirk on his Scottish tour to ember the man 'by whose labours,' writes well despondently, 'a knowledge of the Latin ruage will be preserved in Scotland if it shall reserved at all.' obert Keith (1681-1756), a bishop and ius in the Scottish Episcopal Church, was born Kincardineshire of a younger branch of the ily of the Earls Marischal, and spent most ais life in Edinburgh as the pastor of an scopal congregation. A diligent student of ttish antiquities, he published in 1735 a tory of the Affairs of Church and State in tland during the Reformation, which, while ngly prelatist and Royalist in tone, shows ful research and incorporates many valuable orical documents. It has been reprinted by Spottiswoode Society (1844-45), and is inter-ig-a good way after Innes's Critical Essay an evidence of the development of historic hod in Scotland. Keith is best known as an quary by his Catalogue of the Bishops of Scot-!(1755), a laborious and praiseworthy compilafor its time, but long hopelessly out of date.

Robert Blair (1699-1746), author of The Grave, was an accomplished Scottish minister, who enjoyed some private fortune, lived in better style than his brother ministers, cultivated botany and general literature, and cherished the society of the neighbouring gentry. He was born in Edinburgh, his father being minister of the Old Church there; and at Edinburgh University and in Holland he was educated. In 1731 he was appointed to the living of Athelstaneford, the East Lothian parish in which Home, author of Douglas, was his successor. Before his ordination, he had begun The Grave, and in 1742 he submitted the manuscript to Watts and Doddridge. Watts offered it to two publishers in vain, as both thought it rather heavy for the times; but it appeared in 1743, and immediately became popular. His one considerable work (besides he published only an elegy and one or two paraphrases of Scripture), it is a sombre but suggestive poem of near eight hundred lines in blank verse, and is almost inevitably unoriginal in scope and plan, but vigorous in execution, harmonising well with the genius of Scottish Presbyterianism. monotony of its didactic meditations is relieved by occasional flashes of true inspiration, and novel and graphic ways of wording hackneyed ideas. The variations on the great theme sometimes, indeed, are so unconventional as to have been denounced as low and vulgar both in thought and expression-'crammed' and 'tumbled flat upon his back' in the first extract may suffice as examples. The versification (more like that of the drama than of poetry proper, as Professor Saintsbury says) is less rhythmical than Young's, and constantly admits a redundant syllable.

It has been matter of controversy whether Blair inspired Young, or contrariwise; practically the poems were contemporary (the Night Thoughts dated from 1742-44), but, as has been said, Young was doubtless encouraged in his longer task by the immediate success of Blair. It was no small honour to Blair that William Blake put some of his best and best-known work into designs illustrating the congenial poem, notably 'Death's Door' and 'The Soul parting from the Body.' And in dedicating the edition with his twelve illustrations to the Queen (1808), Blake himself bursts into poetical criticism, and speaking apparently as much of his own share as of Blair's in the handsome quarto, proclaims:

Bowing before my sovereign's feet;
'The grave produced these blossoms sweet,
In mild repose from earthly strife,
The blossoms of eternal strife.'

Then and Now.

Where are the mighty thunderbolts of war?
The Roman Cæsars and the Grecian chiefs,
The boast of story? Where the hot-brained youth,
Who the tiara at his pleasure tore
From kings of all the then discovered globe;

And cried, forsooth, because his arm was hampered, And had not room enough to do its work? Alas, how slim-dishonourably slim! And crammed into a space we blush to name, Proud royalty! How altered in thy looks! How blank thy features, and how wan thy hue! Son of the morning! whither art thou gone? Where hast thou hid thy many-spangled head, And the majestic menace of thine eyes Felt from afar? Pliant and powerless now: Like new-born infant wound up in his swathes, Or victim tumbled flat upon his back, That throbs beneath the sacrificer's knife; Mute must thou bear the strife of little tongues, And coward insults of the base-born crowd, That grudge a privilege thou never hadst, But only hoped for in the peaceful grave-Of being unmolested and alone! Arabia's gums and odoriferous drugs, And honours by the heralds duly paid In mode and form, e'en to a very scruple (O cruel irony!); these come too late, And only mock whom they were meant to honour! Surely there's not a dungeon slave that's buried In the highway, unshrouded and uncoffined, But lies as soft and sleeps as sound as he. Sorry pre-eminence of high descent Above the baser born, to rot in state!

The Death of the Strong Man.

Strength, too! thou surly and less gentle boast Of those that loud laugh at the village ring! A fit of common sickness pulls thee down With greater ease than e'er thou didst the stripling That rashly dared thee to the unequal fight. What groan was that I heard? Deep groan, indeed, With anguish heavy laden! let me trace it: From yonder bed it comes, where the strong man, By stronger arm belaboured, gasps for breath Like a hard-hunted beast. How his great heart Beats thick! his roomy chest by far too scant To give the lungs full play! What now avail The strong-built sinewy limbs and well-spread shoulders? See how he tugs for life, and lays about him, Mad with his pain! Eager he catches hold Of what comes next to hand, and grasps it hard Just like a creature drowning. Hideous sight! O how his eyes stand out, and stare full ghastly! While the distemper's rank and deadly venom Shoots like a burning arrow 'cross his bowels, And drinks his marrow up. Heard you that groan? It was his last. See how the great Goliah, Just like a child that brawled itself to rest, Lies still. What mean'st thou then, O mighty boaster, To vaunt of nerves of thine? What means the bull, Unconscious of his strength, to play the coward, And flee before a feeble thing like man: That, knowing well the slackness of his arm, Trusts only in the well-invented knife?

A Great Church at Night.

See yonder hallowed fane! The pious work
Of names once famed, now dubious or forgot,
And buried midst the wreck of things which were:
There lie interred the more illustrious dead.
The wind is up: hark! how it howls! methinks

Till now I never heard a sound so dreary!

Doors creak, and windows clap, and night's foul bird,
Rocked in the spire, screams loud: the gloomy aisles,
Black-plastered, and hung round with shreds of 'scutAnd tattered coats-of-arms, send back the sound, [chees,
Laden with heavier airs, from the low vaults,
The mansions of the dead. Roused from their slumber,
In grim array the grisly spectres rise,
Grin horrible, and, obstinately sullen,
Pass and repass, hushed as the foot of night.
Again the screech-owl shricks—ungracious sound!
I'll hear no more; it makes one's blood run chill.

These are shorter passages:

On this side and on that men see their friends
Drop off like leaves in autumn; yet launch out
Into fantastic schemes, which the long livers
In the world's hale and undegenerate days
Would scarce have leisure for. Fools that we are Never to think of death and of ourselves
At the same time; as if to learn to die
Were no concern of ours.

The lawn-robed prelate and plain presbyter, Erewhile that stood aloof, as shy to meet, Familiar mingle here, like sister-streams

That some rude interposing rock has split.

The wrecks of nations and the spoils of time With all the lumber of six thousand years.

Friendship! mysterious cement of the soul, Sweetener of life and solder of society.

Man, sick of bliss, tried evil; and

Alas! too well he sped; the good he scorned Stalked off reluctant, like an ill-used ghost, Not to return; or, if it did, in visits, Like those of angels, short and far between.

'Angel visits, short and bright,' came from Norris of Bemerton (see above, page 259) to Blair, and from Blair to Campbell:

What though my winged hours of bliss have been, Like angel visits, few and far between.

The passage so often quoted by Burns (surely for the idea rather than for the characteristically conversational and unrhythmical expression of it) also contains a reminiscence of Norris:

Tell us, ye dead! Will none of you in pity To those you left behind disclose the secret? O that some courteous ghost would blab it out, What 'tis you are and we must shortly be.

The last paragraph, passing from death to the resurrection, has naturally a more cheerful note, and thus impressively concludes:

'Tis but a night, a long and moonless night; We make the grave our bed, and then are gone.

Thus at the shut of even the weary bird Leaves the wide air, and in some lonely brake Cowers down and dozes till the break of day, Then claps his well-fledged wings and bears away.

'HE SCOTTISH VERNACULAR REVIVAL

HEN on signing the Act of Union in 1707 the Scottish Chancellor, Seafield, uttered his memorable saying, 'Now there's ane end of ane old song,' the echo of his words sent a chill to the hearts of ood Scotsmen, whatever their party or politics. bulk of the people not merely regretted but nted the loss of their Parliament, last conuous emblem of 'Scotland a nation.' And the lual introduction of English coinage, English thts and measures, English taxation, and dish ways produced a vehement nationalism shich the Jacobite risings in the '15 and the '45 but one consequence. A more permanent ome was (not the revival of the national ature, but) the revival of the native speech a literary vehicle. In one thing at least ticism might be cherished with even warmer tion than heretofore-but within well-underd limits; the revival of the old Scots for ral literary purposes was forever out of the tion. The native tongue was not dead; but ad been too long divorced from the national are to be a natural or sufficient instrument for essing the various interests of the eighteenth ury. Scotland was now a part of Europe; tish writers justly ambitious of a European ence would stultify themselves by harking to a local dialect that for a hundred years lived on mainly in the mouths of country-folks, ars, and handicraftsmen, and become greatly ted in its scope and capacities. Scotsmen were it to claim a very conspicuous place in English ature, and, writing in English, to bestow on enty a richer bequest than the old Scottish iors of Scotland's first golden age; Edinburgh to be recognised as the Modern Athens. Can -speaking only of the works of men born To the end of the first quarter of the eighteenth ury-imagine Hume's Essays in 'broad Scotch,' is History of England? or Reid's Philosophy he Intellectual Powers? Thomson's Seasons? ertson's Charles V. 7 or Adam Smith's Wealth Vations? The old literary tongue was, as dead; nor could any combination of wit wisdom put back the shadow on the dial. ing before Scotch ceased to be a literary ue in the full sense, the chief models for tish writers were their great English pressors and contemporaries. After the Reforon the language of literature, of the Church, of public life came to be normally Englishlish with a difference-and the language of Scottish civic society became increasingly anglicised. Bible, psalm-book, confession, catechism, were in English, made in England. The books of devotion were English; at most, like Rutherford's letters, English with Scotch words brought in with effect at wide intervals. By the end of the seventeenth century books were no longer printed in Scotch: and for more than half a century nobody had been taught to spell or write Scotch. Scottish authors wrote regularly in English. Nothing but occasional songs, pasquils, or chap-books appeared in Scotch, and then the Scotch was seldom Scotch throughout. All but the utterly uneducated were, in town or country, constantly hearing English. reading nothing but English, and, even if they spoke Scotch, writing their letters in English.

Yet then and now, in spite of adverse circumstances, this mixed dialect lived on in surprising vigour amongst the humbler classes, and was not merely a pithy spoken vernacular, but (for specific uses) an admirably effective literary instrument. It was least anglicised amongst those living farthest from the towns. Most largely anglicised was the macaronic used by the educated who condescended to the vernacular in conversation with their illiterate neighbours, in hours of relaxation or domesticity, and for jests and anecdotes. The 'broad Scotch' heard by Dr Johnson amongst Scottish literati was substantially English spoken with a markedly Scottish intonation. The old heroic ballads, even, were rarely in quite broad Scotch, never in the broadest Scotch. To make Blind Harry's Wallace intelligible to his contemporaries, higher and lower, Hamilton of Gilbertfield in 1722 translated the poem into English; and it was the English version that, half a century later, poured a flood of Scottish prejudice into Burns's breast. Scotsmen writing for Scotsmen even on Scottish subjects employed English regularly-as witness the authors dealt with above at pages 301-305.

A prose treatise wholly in Scotch on any subject whatever was impossible; so was a sustained and dignified poem. But verse-writing in the vernacular had never wholly ceased, and was practised sporadically in various kinds with curious limitations. Jocular, facetious, and satirical verse was produced in as broad a form of the vernacular as the writer could attain; love poems also, when they professed to reproduce the lovers' spoken utterance, and in a less broad form. Very much in proportion as the subject was serious was the English tinge or element in vernacular verse conspicuously large, often even passing into English altogether. Beattie, author of the Minstrel, who was publishing his first poems about the middle of the century, did write admirable and pithy vernacular verse on occasion; but said, not long before Burns's time, 'To write in the vulgar broad Scotch, and yet seriously, is now impossible; for more than half a century it has by the Scots been considered a dialect of the vulgar.'

About the time Beattie speaks of, Allan Ramsay was of another opinion. It was Ramsay who fixed the standard for the revived Scottish vernacular poetising, a standard in rhyme and diction so closely followed by his successors, Fergusson and Burnsthough both Fergusson and Burns avoided many of the traps into which honest Allan fell open-eyed, and, with truer humour and better taste, recognised the limits within which the vernacular was available without becoming grotesque. Allan even wrote elegies in Scotch in which noble Scottish ladies are incongruously addressed by the pseudo-classic names of Keitha and Southeska! And profitably to paraphrase Horace, the most courtly and elegant of Latin poets, in a dialect deliberately rejected by the educated and resigned to the special use of the day-labourer and the mechanic, is about as feasible as it would be to reproduce Æschylus in Mr Barnes's excellent Dorsetshire, or to render the gems of the Greek anthology in the actually spoken and pithy dialect of the Old Kent Road.

Ramsay had acquired some credit as the laureate of a club, and as author of a few pithy occasional and satirical verses in the manner of Sempill, before he conceived the patriotic ambition of awakening interest in old Scottish poetry, and of continuing the production of it on a larger scale. His loose and sadly vulgarised version of part of Christ's Kirk on the Green, as well as his editing of the Evergreen, shows how illequipped he was for undertaking this work from the historical and philological side. The dialogue of his Gentle Shepherd is about as far removed from the actual rough-and-ready speech of contemporary Scottish country-folk as are the idyllic pictures of their amiable occupations from a representation of actual life on a Lowland farm. And his songs remain to show how little sense he had for a pure style of Scotch, the substance of them being at times sound vernacular (occasionally with an archaic word or two), at times ordinary English, at times the characteristic, stilted, and formal English poetic diction of the eighteenth century, already artificial enough, but made still more unnatural by being done over into a kind of fancy Scotch. Ramsay wrote some poems in English throughout, and sometimes evidently meant to write in his mixed, artificial jargon of broken English. But for him and his successors, it was perhaps almost inevitable that the typical Scotch should be that which was most patriotically unlike English: they did not distinguish between the purer Scots of the landward folks and the debased dialect of the Edinburgh slums, often London slang transported to the north; and the lingo that would have reproduced aptly enough in verse the actual speech of the haunters of low town pothouses was transferred simpliciter to poems in which noble ladies and gentlemen were the interlocutors. The academy for regulating the revived Scottish tongue was not even the man in the street and the man on the moors, but the men and women who spoke the most uncouth and even debased form of the tongue: corruptions, monstrosities, and barbarisms, ignorant mispronunciations and illiterate misspellings, were equally welcome-not indeed to Ramsay, but to many of his imitators. 'The Carritches' for the Catechism is as typical Scotch as sparrer-grass or sparrow-grass is the typically English form of asparagus; 'pockmantie' is an extraordinarily debased form of portmanteau; a large proportion of modern Scotch words are simply the result of slurred and slovenly utterance - 'Embro' for Edinburgh and 'scomfish' for discomfit are parallel to 'gemman' and 'nuffink' in London; 'dinna' and 'canna,' now universally accepted in place of the old Scots 'do nocht' and 'can nocht,' are precisely on the same philological level as the Cockney "e dunno for he don't know; 'and 'Ou ay, a' ae oo' for 'Oh ay, all one wool,' instead of being a triumph of expressiveness, shows how a nervous, pithy organism like the Scottish tongue can be degraded to boneless pulp

Nothing more convincingly shows that a language has fallen out of the race than when its characteristic words and sounds are spelt, even by those who use them, in terms of another language, with another phonetic system. The practice of spelling Scots words with the modern English power of the vowels, long established and now carried much further, shows that Scots was no longer a rule to itself. A Scotsman who knows Scots can pronounce house, cow, town, round, die, without having the English phonetic equivalents-hoose, coo, toon, roond, dee-provided for him as in a 'pronouncing' dictionary; 'ceevil' and 'peety' are not Scotch words, but English spellings of the way an old-fashioned Scotsman pronounces civil and pity. And 'tae dae' are not words at all, but attempts, and extremely inaccurate attempts, to indicate to an eye trained to English spelling the value given in old Scots to the vowels in 'to do,' the old and only genuine Scots spelling. Seafield's words, 'Now there's ane end of ane old song,' might have been said of the Scots tongue as a literary language for general use. The very form of his utterance proves it; as does the fact that when it is quoted it is almost never cited as he said it and as it was reported at the time, but translated into some such form as 'Noo there's an en' o' an auld sang.' But that the song was not yet at an end in various and admirable shapes and uses, the extracts from the following authors show.

broth

Dr Alexander Pennecuik (1652-1722), son of a surgeon in the Swedish and Covenanting armies, practised physic himself in Peeblesshire, and wrote divers pieces of indifferent verse, which he reprinted in his Historical Description of Tweeddale in 1715. The chief of them is an allegorical rhyme entitled Truth's Travels, composed in a modification of the vernacular, after this manner:

> When kirk was skaeld and preaching done, dismissed And men and women baith went haim, Nae man called Truth to his disjeun, breakfast Albeit he was of noble fame; There was not one that kept a craime, stall But they had bacon, beef, and ale; Yet no acquaintance Truth could claim To wish him worth a dish of kail.

In his attempts in English verse Pennecuik was not content with imitation, but would sometimes plagiarise an entire passage from Rochester or Ayton. There was another Alexander Pennecuik, possibly a relative (died 1730), an Edinburgh citizen who wrote Streams from Helicon (1720) and Flowers from Parnassus (1726) in the Scotch vernacular, and described the coarser aspects of Edinburgh life in the fashion set by Allan Ramsay. One of his effusions tells the story of 'half-hangit Maggie Dickson,' who escaped so strangely from the executioner's hands in 1724. It and others of his most characteristic verses appear in a Colleclion of Scots Poems on Several Occasions, printed at Edinburgh in 1756.

Alexander Robertson of Strowan (1668– 1749), a Perthshire laird and irreconcilable Jacobite, who was in almost every rebellion from 1689 to 1745, wrote some verses which were published at Edinburgh in 1751 in a volume that is one of the curiosities sought after by Scottish bibliophiles. It is described not unfairly by Macaulay as 'a volume of poems always very stupid and often very profligate,' which, had it been manufactured in Grub Street, 'would scarcely have been honoured with a quarter of a line in the Dunciad." As the recreations of a Highland chief, however, produced in a Highland hut before Culloden (for Strowan, through confiscation and dissipation, was reduced to sordid poverty), the verses have a certain historic interest, although the only good lines in them are nothing but an impudent theft from Butler's Hudibras.

William Hamilton of Gilbertfield (1665?-1751), son of a Fife laird, served as a lieutenant in the army, and after his retirement made the acquaintance of Allan Ramsay, with whom he corresponded in some rhyming epistles, which seem to have given Burns an occasional hint. He has a minor place among Ramsay's contemporaries in virtue of his Last dying Words of Bonnie Heck, a poem in the 'Habbie Simpson' stanza and sentiment on the death of a famous Fife greyhound, which appeared in Watson's Choice Collection in 1706. More notable historically was his metrical modernisation of Blind Harry's 'Wallace,' dedicated to the 'High Puissant and most noble Prince James, Duke of Hamilton,' and published in 1722. The version, as will be seen from the following specimen, is no better than doggerel, but it won instant popularity among the Scottish peasantry, and is memorable in a way as the book which gave Burns his boyish reading and 'poured a Scottish prejudice' into his veins. It is significant of the progress of anglicisation that in this highly successful attempt to popularise an old Scottish classic amongst the Scottish people, the medium adopted was modern English.

The Battle of Stirling.

The day of battle does approach at length, The English thus advance with all their strength; And fifty thousand march in battle rank, Full six to one, yet Wallace never shrank. The rest they lay about the castle hill, Both field and castle thought to have at will. The worthy Scots together close did bide In the plain field upon the other side. Hugh Kirkingham the vanguard on led he, Cressingham With twenty thousand likely men to see; The Earl of Warren thirty thousand had; If all were good the number was not bad. Thus fifty thousand silly Southron sots Proudly march up against nine thousand Scots. When Kirkingham his twenty thousand men Had passed the bridge, quite to the other end; Some of the Scots, in earnest without scorn, Thought it high time to blow the warning horn; But Wallace he marched stoutly through the plain; Led on his men, their number did disdain. . . . The hardy Scots with heavy strokes and sore Attack the twenty thousand that came o'er. Wallace and Ramsay, Lundie, Boyd, and Graham With dreadful strokes made them retire, fye shame!

William Hamilton of Bangour (1704-54) was born at his father's estate of Bangour in Linlithgowshire, and was bred a Whig at North Berwick by his stepfather, Lord President Dalrymple. He was the delight of the fashionable circles of his native country, and became early distinguished as a poet by his contributions to Ramsay's Tea-table Miscellany (1724-27). Rome, whither he had been sent for his health, he is said to have been converted to Jacobitism by Prince Charlie himself; and in 1745 he joined his standard, and became the 'volunteer laureate' of the Jacobites by celebrating the battle of Gladsmuir. After Culloden he succeeded in escaping to France, and in Dennistoun's Memoirs of Sir Robert Strange there are some interesting notes of his residence at Rouen. But, through his friends and admirers at home, a pardon was procured for him, and in 1750 he succeeded his elder brother in the paternal estate. He did not live long to enjoy his good fortune; his health had always been delicate, and a pulmonary attack forced him to seek the warmer climate of the Continent. He gradually declined, and died at Lyons. In 1748 some person unknown to him (seemingly Adam Smith) collected and published his poems in Glasgow; but the first genuine and correct copy did not appear till 1760, after Hamilton's death, when a collection was made from his own manuscripts. A notable feature in his English verse is his ornate diction, and there he usually shows more fancy than feeling:

In everlasting blushes seen,
Such Pringle shines, of sprightly mien;
To her the power of love imparts,
Rich gift! the soft successful arts,
That best the lover's fire provoke,
The lively step, the mirthful joke,
The speaking glance, the amorous wile,
The sportful laugh, the winning smile.
Her soul awakening every grace,
Is all abroad upon her face;
In bloom of youth still to survive,
All charms are there, and all alive.

Others of his amatory verses are full of conceits and exaggerated expression, without a trace of real passion. He wrote a didactic poem, 'Contemplation,' and, in blank verse, a national one on the Thistle, and the order of knighthood named from it:

How oft beneath
Its martial influence have Scotia's sons,
Through every age, with dauntless valour fought
On every hostile ground! While o'er their breast, Companion to the silver star, blest type
Of fame, unsullied and superior deed,
Distinguished ornament! this native plant
Surrounds the sainted cross, with costly row
Of gems emblazed, and flame of radiant gold,
A sacred mark, their glory and their pride!

His ballad of 'The Braes of Yarrow' is his masterpiece, and in virtue of it he ranks high amongst the revivers of vernacular poetry. Suggested, it may be, by the old ballad of 'The Dowie Dens of Yarrow' (printed by Scott in the Border Minstrelsy), it has real nature, tenderness, and pastoral simplicity, and it struck the keynote of Wordsworth's 'Three Yarrows.'

The Braes of Yarrow.

- A. Busk ye, busk ye, my bonnie, bonnie bride; Busk ye, busk ye, my winsome marrow! Busk ye, busk ye, my bonnie, bonnie bride, And think nae mair on the Braes of Yarrow.
- B. Where gat ye that bonnie, bonnie bride?
 Where gat ye that winsome marrow?
 A. I gat her where I darena weil be seen,
 Pu'ing the birks on the Braes of Yarrow.

Weep not, weep not, my bonnie, bonnie bride;
Weep not, weep not, my winsome marrow!
Nor let thy heart lament to leive
Pu'ing the birks on the Braes of Yarrow.

B. Why does she weep, thy bonnie, bonnie bride?Why does she weep, thy winsome marrow?And why dare ye nae mair weil be seen,Pu'ing the birks on the Braes of Yarrow?

A. Lang maun she weep, lang maun she, maun she wee
Lang maun she weep with dule and sorrow,
And lang maun I nae mair weil be seen
Pu'ing the birks on the Braes of Yarrow.

For she has tint her luver, luver dear,
Her luver dear, the cause of sorrow,
And I hae slain the comeliest swain
That e'er pu'd birks on the Braes of Yarrow.

Why runs thy stream, O Yarrow, Yarrow, red?
Why on thy braes heard the voice of sorrow?
And why you melancholeous weids
Hung on the bonnie birks of Yarrow?

What's yonder floats on the rueful, rueful flude?
What's yonder floats? O dule and sorrow!
'Tis he, the comely swain I slew
Upon the duleful Braes of Yarrow.

Wash, O wash his wounds, his wounds in tears, His wounds in tears with dule and sorrow, And wrap his limbs in mourning weeds, And lay him on the Braes of Yarrow.

Then build, then build, ye sisters, sisters sad, Ye sisters sad, his tomb with sorrow, And weep around in waeful wise, His helpless fate on the Braes of Yarrow.

Curse ye, curse ye, his useless, useless shield, My arm that wrought the deed of sorrow, The fatal spear that pierced his breast, His comely breast, on the Braes of Yarrow.

Did I not warn thee not to lu'e,
And warn from fight? but to my sorrow,
O'er rashly bald a stronger arm
Thou met'st, and fell on the Braes of Yarrow.

Sweet smells the birk, green grows, green grows the gray Yellow on Yarrow's bank the gowan, Fair hangs the apple frae the rock, Sweet the wave of Yarrow flowan.

Flows Yarrow sweet? as sweet, as sweet flows Tweed,
As green its grass, its gowan as yellow,
As sweet smells on its braes the birk,
The apple frae the rock as mellow.

el Baillie (1665-1746), author of the na my Heart light I wad die,' which he Orpheus Caledonius about 1725, ed by Allan Ramsay into his Teany, was the daughter of Sir Patrick ome), created Earl of Marchmont; edbraes Castle, 25th December 1665; to George Baillie of Jerviswood in l in London, December 6, 1746. The er of Lady Grizel (or Grisell), Lady inhope, wrote a singularly interesting Memoir of her parents, which contains the story of Grizel Hume's devotion to her father while he was in trouble (1684) for his opposition to the tyranny exercised by the Government of Charles II. against the Covenanting Presbyterians. Ultimately Sir Patrick escaped, disguised as a surgeon, by way of London and France, to Holland, where, after he had taken part in Argyll's disastrous expedition in 1685, he was joined by his wife and family. Their estate was forfeited, and they remained three years and a half in Holland; but on the abdication of James II. and the accession of the Prince of Orange to the throne of England, the exiles were restored to their country and their patrimony, and Hume was made a peer. The faithful Grizel was married to her early love, George Baillie of Jerviswood, son of the martyred patriot, of whom she put on record: 'The best of husbands, and delight of my life for forty-eight years, without one jar betwixt us.' From her youth she wrote verses; of the one here quoted Tytler says: 'Its sudden inspiration has fused into one perfect line the protest of thousands of stricken hearts in every generation.'

Were na my Heart light.

There was ance a May, and she lo'ed na men; maid She bigged her bonny bower down in yon glen, built But now she crys dool and well-a-day! Come down the green gate, and come here away.

When bonny young Johny cam o'er the sea, He said he saw naething sae lovely as me; He heght me baith rings and mony braw things; promised And werena my heart light I wad die.

He had a wee titty that lo'ed na me, sister Because I was twice as bonny as she; She rais'd such a pother 'twixt him and his mother, That werena my heart light I wad die.

The day it was set, and the bridal to be: The wife took a dwam, and lay down to die; sickness She main'd and she grain'd out of dolour and pain, moaned-Till he vow'd he never wad see me again.

His kin was for ane of a higher degree; Said, what had he to do with the like of me? Albeit I was bonny, I wasna for Johny: And werena my heart light I wad die.

They said I had neither cow nor calf, Nor dribles o' drink rins through the draff, Nor pickles o' meal rins through the mill-eye; And werena my heart light I wad die.

His titty she was baith wylie and slee, She spy'd me as I cam o'er the lee; And then she cam in and made a loud din; Believe your ain een an ye trow na me.

His bonnet stood aye fou round on his brow; His auld ane looked aye as well as some's new; But now he lets 't wear ony gate it will hing, way-hang And casts himsell dowie upon the corn-bing. corn-bin

Were I young for thee as I hae been We shou'd hae been galloping down on yon green, And linking out o'er yon lily-white lee; And wow gin I were but young for thee!

The eighth stanza and the concluding one, somewhat altered, were applied by Burns to himself in his latter days. Throughout light is to be pronounced as licht, die as dee, eye as ee, do as do in German. But some of the words are manifestly not Scotch at all, such as 'pother.' The ballad, as usually given, is respelt in modern Scotch.

Lady Elizabeth Wardlaw (1677 - 1727), second daughter of Sir Charles Halkett of Pitfirrane, married in 1696 Sir Henry Wardlaw of Pitreavie near Dunfermline. Her pseudo-archaic ballad, Hardyknute (1719), had been expanded and reprinted as by Allan Ramsay in the Evergreen, when Percy in the second edition of his Reliques (1767) revealed what has been generally accepted as the real authorship. To her also Dr Robert Chambers in 1859 ascribed 'Sir Patrick Spens,' 'The Douglas Tragedy,' and many more of the best Scottish ballads—a paradox endorsed in Professor Masson's Edinburgh Sketches. It is of course possible to hold that she wrote Hardyknute and edited and altered 'Sir Patrick Spens.' Hardyknute, said to have been found in an old vaulted chamber in Dunfermline, was received everywhere in Scotland with the utmost favour as a fine martial and pathetic ballad, though irreconcilable, as Scott acknowledged, with all chronology; 'a chief with a Norwegian name is strangely introduced as the first of the nobles brought to resist a Norse invasion at the battle of Largs.' 'Britons' for Englishmen is also unhistorical; the effects sought are many of them visibly imitative; and the language throughout is obviously the English of one accustomed to speak and write English, with Scotch words-and supposed but not real old Scotch words—and spellings and pronunciations more or less freely interspersed. No doubt Hardyknute had its part in the 'Scottish revival' of which Ramsay was the chief representative. The ballad extends to forty-two stanzas:

Stately stept he east the wa',
And stately stept he west,
Full seventy years he now had seen,
With scarce seven years of rest.
He lived when Britons' breach of faith
Wrought Scotland mickle wae;
And aye his sword tauld to their cost,
He was their deadly fae.

High on a hill his castle stood,
With ha's and towers a height,
And goodly chambers fair to see,
Where he lodged mony a knight.
His dame sae peerless ance and fair,
For chaste and beauty deemed,
Nae marrow had in all the land,
Save Eleanor the Queen.

The king of Norse in summer tide, Puffed up with power and might, Landed in fair Scotland the isle With mony a hardy knight. The tidings to our good Scots king Came, as he sat at dine, With noble chiefs in brave array, Drinking the bluid-red wine.

'To horse, to horse, my royal liege,
Your faes stand on the strand,
Full twenty thousand glittering spears
The king of Norse commands.'
'Bring me my steed, Madge dapple gray,'
Our good king rose and cried;
'A trustier beast in a' the land,
A Scots king never tried.

'Go, little page, tell Hardyknute,
That lives on hill sae hie,
To draw his sword, the dread of faes,
And haste and follow me.'
The little page flew swift as dart
Flung by his master's arm:
'Come down, come down, Lord Hardyknute,
And rid your king frae harm.'

Then red, red grew his dark-brown cheeks,
Sae did his dark-brown brow;
His looks grew keen, as they were wont
In dangers great to do;
He's ta'en a horn as green as glass,
And gi'en five sounds sae shrill,
That trees in greenwood shook thereat,
Sae loud rang ilka hill.

Allan Ramsay

was the son of a mine manager at Leadhills, Lanarkshire, who traced descent to the Ramsays of Dalhousie; whence the poet's address to 'Dalhousie of an auld descent,' whom he apostrophised as 'My chief, my stoup, my ornament.' His mother was the daughter of an Englishman settled in Sootland, and through her he claimed affinity with the Douglas family. Twelve months after his birth-15th October 1686—his father died, and his mother presently married a 'bonnet laird' named Crichton, who gave the lad as good an education as was to be had at the parish school, embracing a slight acquaintance with Latin; but his early reading is matter of conjecture only. In 1701, his mother having died in the previous year, Ramsay was apprenticed to an Edinburgh wig-maker (not 2 barber), and, having served a seven years' apprenticeship, he was, in the Union year, made free of his craft, and started business on his own account At whatever period he acquired a taste for letters, it was plainly now that he set himself to a serious study of the vernacular Scottish poets, and aspired to become one of them. Hamilton of Gilbertfield's Dying Words of Bonnie Heck in particular, according to his own story, 'warm'd his breast' and caused emulation to 'pierce' him. So when, in 1712, having married Christian Ross, the daughter of an Edinburgh lawyer, he sought admission to the select society of the Easy Club, a convivial association of Jacobites, he was able to second his father-in-law's nomination with a versified address, and so conquered the suffrages of Ruddiman the

An Elegy on ggy Johnston (a disreputable female) took the y of the club, which published much if not all he wrote for its delectation-The Qualificas of a Gentleman, The Great Eclipse of the Sun, broadly humorous Elegies on John Cowper, Kirk Treasurer's Man, and Lucky Wood, an vife. The town began to look for the broads on which his successive productions were sted; and when in 1716 he essayed a continuaof the royal canto, Christ's Kirk on the Green, which he added a third canto in 1718, he was nowledged the Scottish poet of the day. By), when he gave up wig-making and turned tseller, we find Hamilton of Gilbertfield adsing him as

720 he published a collection of his pieces in aarto volume, which included some English ns that were considered by his admirers as i as the best produced in the England of e's time. Pope, Steele, Arbuthnot, and Gay subscribers; and Arbuthnot, Philips, Tickell, others flattered him to the top of his bent his appetite for praise was egregious. His became the rendezvous of the literary and fashionable in Edinburgh, whose patronage he med by a steady production of verse-Fables ' Tales and The Three Bonnets (1722); The r Assembly, a satire on the Puritan objection dancing (1723); Health, containing portraits contemporary debauchees (1724). In 1724 he menced the publication of the Tea-table tallany: a Collection of Scots Songs, in which w words' were wedded to 'known good tunes' nly by himself, but partly by Hamilton, Mallet, others. This was followed by The Evergreen: ing ane Collection of Scots Poems, wrote by Ingenious before 1600.1 The Miscellany was illent work of its kind. The Evergreen is Onument of editorial stupidity. Ramsay had is to the Bannatyne MSS., but what he took them he cut and carved and modernised rding to his own taste; he passed off some is own work as old Scots by the device of do-archaic spelling. Finally, in 1725, he pubd The Gentle Shepherd, a dramatic pastoral, h his contemporaries esteemed not only his test work but a masterpiece of literature; poets critics sang an unbroken chorus in its praise. as by way of a realistic picture of Scottish I life as it was-in reality as false as much of Kail-yard literature of to-day-and had an mous success. Thenceforward the poet rested on his oars, adding nothing to his output during the rest of his life but a masque, a pastoral epithalamium, a volume of fables, and an epistle to the Lords of Session. He was a prosperous man of business, and whether or not he was conscious that he had nothing more to say to his contemporaries, he was content to go on publishing, bookselling, managing a circulating library, and enjoying the society of his numerous friends. He sustained serious losses in 1736 through building a theatre, which the dominant class-half-bigoted, but perhaps three parts rightly loath to allow the Restoration dramas, which were the vogue, to pollute the Edinburgh youth-did not allow him to open; his circulating library had barely escaped the Presbyterian Inquisition. the leading men of the day in Edinburgh could not save his theatre, and he had to wait other ten years for the popular sanction of a legal quirk through which a playhouse, thanks largely to his efforts, was erected and opened in the Canongate. Ramsay's shops were successively in the Grassmarket, the High Street, and the Luckenbooths. He built a house for himself on the Castlehill in 1742, to a design by his son Allan the painter, and there spent the evening of his days. He died 7th January 1758.

The 'science of heredity' being as yet in its infancy, it would be rash to speculate much or confidently as to the influence that the fact that Allan Ramsay had English blood in his veins may have had on his destiny as a man or his career as a poet. Yet there is nothing unreasonable in the supposition that this circumstance had a chastening effect upon the Scottish perfervidity which he inherited from his father, and may even have qualified him for the position of 'leader of the Scottish poetical revival of the eighteenth century' by helping him to write Scottish verse that was popular in England, as well as English verse that, frankly imitative though it was of southern models, was not boycotted for 'patriotic' reasons in Scotland. Ramsay was at his best when, through poetry, he preached the gospel of his own nature of the

Black-a-vic'd, snod, dapper fallow, plexioned—neat

he was not ashamed to describe himself. That nature, as set forth by himself, is less suggestive of typical Scottish 'canniness,' which is the shrewdness not of temperament but of calculation, than of English good temper, free from religious or moral austerity; not averse from the pleasure afforded by the 'tappit hen' for the sound practical reason that 'good claret best keeps out the cauld,' but distinctly averse from excess. At all events the 'canty callan,' the moderate convivialist of the Easy Club, the worldly bookseller who carried the courtly deference of the wig-maker into his poetic tributes to reigning beauties,' was eminently fitted to do justice to a period of literary transition, to recall Dunbar and Henryson, and prepare the way for Fergusson and Burns. Although in almost everything he wrote he appealed, like the dedication of his Tea-table Miscellany,

To ilka lovely British lass, True ladies Charlotte, Anne, and Jean, Doun to ilk bony singing Bess Wha dances barefoot on the green—and although in his Gentle Shepherd he undoubtedly realised his comprehensive ambition, Ramsay desired primarily to please the well-to-do society of the Scottish capital, which was bent above all things on rivalling London, which regarded the 'rustic life' much as a later generation regarded the 'Kail-yard,' and which wished to see expressed in not too strenuous verse its own epicurean rather than rationalistic rebellion against the Kirk.' Ramsay made an admirable laureate for such a society. He could hold his own with all but the greatest of his English contemporaries. He could be sufficiently realistic when reproducing 'local' life, as in his Elegies on Maggy Johnston and Lucky Wood; he could even fall to the realism of the squalid-picturesque, as in some portions of the Gentle Shepherd and in the cantos he added to Christ's Kirk. While he advocated the pagan naturalism of 'puin' the gowan in its prime,' he did not carry his representation of passion to excess. To the ecstasies of 'the cannie hour at e'en' he preferred the

Ramsay had the limitations of the successful poet of a transition period. He was superficial, mis vulgarity for humour, and could on occasion commonplace in an appalling degree; not will reason has the charge of 'buffoonery' been ferred against him. In spite of 'The Lass of P. Mill,' 'Bessy Bell and Mary Gray,' and 'I well to Lochaber'—if indeed he wrote the last can be allowed a place only among the plyrists of Scotland. There is nothing classic 'inevitable' in Ramsay; yet the fidelity to of three-fourths of the Gentle Shepherd, and prudent and genuinely 'national' Horatianism

The Tea-table Miscellany and the Evergreen have been reprinted more than once. There is a short biography of Ramsay by Mr Oliphant Smeaton (1896), and an admirable essay in Professor Masson's Edinburgh Sketches (1892).

WILLIAM WALLACE

William Meston (1688-1745), who aspired to write the Scottish Hudibras, was the son of an Aberdeenshire blacksmith, and, after an education at Marischal College, became one of the regents there through the influence of the noble family of Following his patrons, however, in the rebellion of 1715, he lost his office, and had to go for a while into hiding, and during the rest of his life he earned a precarious subsistence as schoolmaster and tutor in various places in the north of Scotland, under the protection of several Jacobite families. His Knight of the Kirk (1723) shows a close and even servile imitation of the plot and metre of Butler. Sir John Presbyter takes the place of the English Puritan knight, and that of Ralph is filled by a squire who evidently represents the Wild Westland Whigs. The poem had a certain vogue among Scottish Jacobites, and it would seem that about five or six editions of it appeared within forty years. But it shows no trace of original genius, and the almost entire lack of action in its pages makes it very tedious reading in its fragmentary state. Meston's collected s, which were printed at Edinburgh in 1767, reprinted at Aberdeen in 1802, include also ies of short stories in verse entitled Mother its Tales.

phert Crawford (c. 1695-1733), author of redside' and 'The Bush aboon Traquair,' was son of an Edinburgh merchant. He assisted a Ramsay in his Tea-table Miscellany, and, rding to information obtained by Burns, was ned in coming from France in May 1733. two lyrics, admired by Burns and Allan ningham, now strike one as oddly convent; though there is only one word of unmisble Scotch in the two songs, we place him with the vernacular and local poets.

The Bush aboon Traquair.

Hear me, ye nymphs, and every swain,
I'll tell how Peggy grieves me;
Though thus I languish and complain,
Alas! she ne'er believes me.
My vows and sighs, like silent air,
Unheeded, never move her;
At the bonny Bush aboon Traquair,
'Twas there I first did love her.

That day she smiled and made me glad,
No maid seemed ever kinder;
I thought myself the luckiest lad,
So sweetly there to find her;
I tried to soothe my amorous flame,
In words that I thought tender;
If more there passed, I'm not to blame—
I meant not to offend her.

Yet now she scornful flees the plain,
The fields we then frequented;
If e'er we meet she shews disdain,
She looks as ne'er acquainted.
The bonny bush bloomed fair in May,
Its sweets I'll aye remember;
But now her frowns make it decay—
It fades as in December.

Ye rural powers, who hear my strains,
Why thus should Peggy grieve me?
O make her partner in my pains,
Then let her smiles relieve me:
If not, my love will turn despair,
My passion no more tender;
I'll leave the Bush aboon Traquair—
To lonely wilds I'll wander.

Tweedside.

What beauties does Flora disclose!
How sweet are her smiles upon Tweed!
Yet Mary's, still sweeter than those,
Both nature and fancy exceed.
No daisy, nor sweet blushing rose,
Not all the gay flowers of the field,
Not Tweed, gliding gently through those,
Such beauty and pleasure does yield.

The warblers are heard in the grove, The linnet, the lark, and the thrush; The blackbird, and sweet cooing dove,
With musick enchant every bush.
Come, let us go forth to the mead;
Let us see how the primroses spring;
We'll lodge in some village on Tweed,
And love while the feathered folk sing.

How does my fove pass the long day?

Does Mary not tend a few sheep?

Do they never carelessly stray

While happily she lyes asleep?

Should Tweed's murmurs lull her to rest,

Kind nature indulging my bliss,

To ease the soft pains of my breast,

I'd steal an ambrosial kiss.

'Tis she does the virgins excel;
No beauty with her may compare;
Love's graces around her do dwell;
She's fairest where thousands are fair.
Say, charmer, where do thy flocks stray?
Oh, tell me at morn where they feed?
Shall I seek them on sweet-winding Tay?
Or the pleasanter banks of the Tweed?

Alexander Ross (1699 - 1784), from 1732 schoolmaster at Lochlee in Forfarshire, when nearly seventy years of age, in 1768, published at Aberdeen, by the advice of Dr Beattie, a volume entitled Helenore, or the Fortunate Shepherdess, a Pastoral Tale in the Scottish Dialect, to which are added a few Songs by the Author. Some of his songs-as 'Woo'd, and Married, and a',' 'The Rock and the Wee Pickle Tow'-are still popular in Scotland. Being chiefly written in the Buchan dialect-which differs in words and in pronunciation from the west-country Scotch of Burns-Ross's pastoral is little known even in Scotland. Beattie took a warm interest in the 'goodhumoured, social, happy old man'-who was independent on £20 a year—and to promote the sale of his volume, he addressed a letter and a poetical epistle in praise of it in Aberdeenshire Scotch to the Aberdeen Journal.

Woo'd, and Married, and a'.

The bride cam out o' the byre,
And, oh, as she dighted her cheeks:
'Sirs, I'm to be married the night,
And have neither blankets nor sheets;
Have neither blankets nor sheets,
Nor scarce a coverlet too;
The bride that has a' thing to borrow,
Has e'en right muckle ado.'
Woo'd, and married, and a',
Married, and woo'd, and a'!
And was she nae very weel off,
That was woo'd, and married, and a'?

Out spake the bride's father,

As he cam in frae the pleugh:

'Oh, haud your tongue, my dochter,
And ye'se get gear eneugh;

The stirk stands i' the tether,
And our braw bawsint yaud,

Mill corrections to the property of the stands.

Will carry ye hame your corn— What wad ye be at, ye jaud?' mare with a white forehead jade

Out spake the bride's mither:

'What deil needs a' this pride?

I had nae a plack in my pouch
That night I was a bride;

My gown was linsey-woolsey,
And ne'er a sark ava;

And ye hae ribbons and buskins,
Mae than ane or twa.'...

Out spake the bride's brither,
As he cam in wi' the kye:

'Poor Willie wad ne'er hae ta'en ye,
Had he kent ye as weel as I;
For ye're baith proud and saucy,
And no for a poor man's wife;
Gin I canna get a better,
I'se ne'er tak ane i' my life.'

Out spake the bride's sister,
As she cam in frae the byre:
'O gin I were but married,
It's a' that I desire;
But we poor folk maun live single,
And do the best that we can;
I dinna care what I should want,
If I could get but a man.'

John Skinner (1721-1807), by his 'Tullochgorum' and other songs, helped to inspire Burns, and in his life as in his verses sought to further kindliness and good-will among men. Born at Birse in Aberdeenshire, the son of a Presbyterian schoolmaster, he was educated at Marischal College, Aberdeen, and, turning Episcopalian, from 1742 officiated as Episcopal minister of Longside near Peterhead. After the troubled period of the rebellion of 1745, when the Episcopal clergy of Scotland laboured under the charge of disaffection, Skinner was in 1753 imprisoned six months for preaching to more than four persons! He was a faithful pastor and a diligent student, setting little store by his verse-writing gifts. All his life he had a hard struggle with poverty; in venerable age he died in the house of his son, the Bishop of Aberdeen, having realised his wish of 'seeing once more his children's grandchildren, and peace upon Israel.' His son edited the theological works (with Life, 3 vols. 1809); the Ecclesiastical History of Scotland (2 vols. 1788) begins with the conversion of Scotland, and is an authority for the history of the 'suffering and Episcopal remnant.' There is also a most interesting life of him by Walker (1883). Skinner wrote a poem on football in imitation of Chrystis Kirk, which latter he did into Latin. He wrote Latin versions of some of the psalms, and several Latin poems, humorous and other. 'The Ewie wi' the Crookit Horn' combines playful humour and tenderness; Burns's 'Death and Dying Words of Poor Mailie' has much in common with it. Burns said (too complimentarily, writing to Skinner himself) "Tullochgorum" was the best Scotch song ever Scotland saw.' In Skinner's day 'Tullochgorum' was no song, but the name of a Highland reel tune, called after a holding of the Grants on Speyside.

Tullochgorum.

Come gie's a sang, Montgomery cried,
And lay your disputes all aside;
What signifies't for folks to chide
For what's been done before them?
Let Whig and Tory all agree,
Whig and Tory, Whig and Tory,
Let Whig and Tory all agree
To drop their Whigmegmorum.
Let Whig and Tory all agree
To spend this night with mirth and glee,
And cheerful sing alang wi' me'
The reel of Tullochgorum.

O, Tullochgorum's my delight;
It gars us a' in ane unite;
And ony sumph that keeps up spite,
In conscience I abhor him.
Blithe and merry we's be a',
Blithe and merry, blithe and merry,
Blithe and merry we's be a',
And mak a cheerfu' quorum.
Blithe and merry we's be a',
As lang as we hae breath to draw,
And dance, till we be like to fa',
The reel of Tullochgorum.

There need nae be sae great a fraise
Wi' dringing dull Italian lays;
I wadna gie our ain strathspeys
For half a hunder score o' 'em.
They're dowf and dowie at the best, and and dowie,
They're dowf and dowie at the best,
Wi' a' their variorum.
They're dowf and dowie at the best,
They're dowf and dowie at the best,
They alography and a' the rest,
They canna please a Scottish taste,
Compared wi' Tullochgorum.

May choicest blessings ay attend
Each honest-hearted, open friend;
And calm and quiet be his end,
And a' that 's good watch o'er him!
May peace and plenty be his lot,
Peace and plenty, peace and plenty,
May peace and plenty be his lot,
And dainties, a great store o' 'em!
May peace and plenty be his lot,
Unstained by any vicious spot;
And may he never want a groat,
That 's fond of Tullochgorum.

But for the discontented fool,
Who wants to be oppression's tool,
May envy gnaw his rotten soul,
And discontent devour him!
May dool and sorrow be his chance,
Dool and sorrow, dool and sorrow,
May dool and sorrow be his chance,
And nane say, Wae's me for 'im!
May dool and sorrow be his chance,
And a' the ills that come frae France,
Whae'er he be that winna dance
The reel of Tullochgorum!

HE REIGNS OF THE GERMAN-BORN GEORGES.

HE accession of the Hanoverian dynasty made no very serious break in our history; the outward events it brought in its train the Jacobite risings at home and the foreign complica-

s—did not so deeply affect the life of the on as is suggested by the disproportionate their records occupy in the national als. But under the first George, who did know any English, and the second, who he end of his life spoke it as a foreigner, the changes and signs of greater change ifested themselves in our literature.

fost important is what is known as the rn to nature, the revival of interest in the try of natural description: the gradual sition from the poetry of formal culture, critical disquisition, of philosophical reflec-, to the poetry of emotion, of spontaneous in life and passion and beauty. At no time men or poets been wholly obtuse to the ies of nature-of sea and sky, mountain river, winter storms and summer sunsets. somehow in poetry and literature the exsion of these emotions was obscured by h moralising and reflecting on them, and naking them, as it were, a background for osophical and more or less artificial-looking ubrations. The more Nature in the abstract praised and invoked and personified in try and prose, the less room was left for ng concrete things and facts close to the t. The difference was not so much in t men felt, or in the way they felt, as in things they were moved to put into words to utter in song, and what other people ed to have them say. Human nature rened fundamentally the same, but sought found a new way of expressing itself, or east of expressing itself more fully.

Decasional utterances that reveal the new per may be traced sporadically even in writers at the end of the seventeenth tury, but become more frequent and more ked early in the eighteenth. In Dyer, born towards the end of the seventeenth century, we found the new leaven working; Grongar Hill is largely a poem of nature, but has not wholly thrown off the old fetters. And in virtue of his principal poem, The Fleece, Dyer must still be ranked with the didactics; though, he is obviously happier when exulting over his Welsh mountains than in blessing English sheep-walks and their industries. Young and Blair are far removed from Pope in temper as in versification; but the Night Thoughts and the Grave, both printed in the period under review, belong clearly to the didactic category. In James Thomson, born in the very last months of the seventeenth century, literary historians have agreed to see the first whole-hearted prophet of the new movement; direct and heartfelt descriptions of natural scenery form the warp and woof of his fine spun web (see above at page 11). Yet the Seasons was being read while Pope's pre-eminency was undisputed, and before the Essay on Man was written. In Shenstone, along with much old artificiality, the new spirit is also stirring. Gray and Collins combine with zeal for a classical perfection of form, a freedom and variety of verse and rhythm, a simplicity and spontaneity of thought and feeling, that point forward to the poetry of romanticism. Mallet's William and Margaret prepares the way for the work of Warton and Percy on the relics of the romantic past. The significance of Fielding's novels, and their modernness of spirit in contrast to Richardson, have been dealt with by Mr Dobson at pages 7 and 340 of this volume. The rude realism of Fielding and Smollett is also an aspect of the naturalistic movement, and is reflected in the art of Hogarth. Akenside, Thomson's younger contemporary, is even more didactic and pseudo-philosophical than many of his spiritual ancestors; and Dr Samuel Johnson, the dominant personality in his age, the most characteristic representative of eighteenth-century England, in his poetry holds almost wholly of the past. The Great Cham of letters was too ponderous a figure to be easily swayed by new movements or the mysterious currents of the Zeitgeist; it was his to represent for all time the outstanding characteristics of the eternal and immutable Englishman, not without a full share of insular prejudices and limitations. Fully half of Johnson's literary career was over with the reign of George II. His influence and Goldsmith's example produced a temporary reaction towards old principles in poetry.

A very noteworthy feature of this early Georgian period is the way in which, while a vernacular Scottish revival was in progress at home, Scotsmen came to the front in English literature, and in poetry, novel writing, philosophic speculation, political and economic thought, and even literary criticism, disputed the pre-eminency with the Southrons on their own ground. Burnet had secured a prominent place as a historian ere he died, just at the close of Anne's reign; and Arbuthnot, who lived till 1735, was the first Scotsman who associated on a footing of perfect equality with the foremost wits in London society. James Thomson was the first Scotsman to be ranked by Englishmen amongst great English poets. Not merely in England but on the Continent, Hume and Robertson were accepted as great writers and representative English his-Adam Smith was laying the foundations of a new science, though it was under George III. that the Wealth of Nations appeared. Even Mallet's romantic ballad was a sign of the times; and Macpherson was collecting or inventing the Ossianic poems which had so strange a place in the movement of the century. Smollett had done much of his best work and even been hailed as a rival to Fielding; and Boswell, though not yet the prince of biographers, was writing for the magazines. Lord Kames had ventured to lay down the laws of literature even to Englishmen, and had written the Elements of Criticism, which became a standard work at the beginning of the next reign. And Hugh Blair had begun at Edinburgh those Lectures on Rhetoric and Belles Lettres which moved George III., at the beginning of his reign, to endow a chair of rhetoric for the elegant (rather than eloquent) preacher whose sermons were to be the pions king's favourite reading. Several of these authors attained to their highest fame well on in the second half of the century, but the were all already active or conspicuous under the earlier Georges. And their joint achievement would have been a rich legacy to any country or period. Border raids were over and done; in English literature there was henceforward to be a Scottish occupation in force.

As the eighteenth century progressed, English authors addressed themselves less exclusively to the gentry and the London coteries, and kept more steadily in view the 'general reads.' And before the middle of the century, English literature was becoming a power on the Continent. Voltaire's memorable visit to England took place in 1726-29; Rousseau's not ill The Spectator's influence was telling everywhere, and through the Abbé Prévos's translations of Richardson, the English nord was introduced to the French world under the best auspices. Young's Night Thoughts strick a chord throughout educated Europe, and in 2 German translation (1760-71) made its mark on multitudes who knew no English. Thomson, too, soon found a foreign following. Other notes of the period are dealt with in Mr Dobson's essay on the eighteenth century # the beginning of this volume.

James Thomson.

James Thomson was born at Ednam, near Kelso in Roxburgh, on the 11th of September 1700. His father, then minister of the parish of Ednam, soon removed to Southdean, a retired parish among the lower slopes of the Cheviots; and there the young poet spent his boyish years. The gift of poesy came early, and some lines written at the age of fourteen show how soon his characteristic manner was formed. In his eighteenth year Thomson was sent to Edinburgh College to study for the Church; but after the death of his father he went to London (1725) to push his fortune. His college friend, Mallet, got him a post as tutor to the son of Lord Binning, and being shown some of his descriptions of Winter, advised him to connect them into one regular poem. Winter was published in March 1726, the poet receiving only three guineas for the copyright. A second and a third edition appeared the same year. Summer appeared in 1727. In 1728 he issued proposals for publishing, by subscription, the Four Seasons; the number of subscribers, at a guinea a copy, was 387; Pope (wo whom Thomson had been introduced by Mallet) took three copies. Autumn completed the work, which appeared in 1730. He wrote a poem on the death of Newton, and Britannia (1729), a tirade against Spain and in praise of the Prince of Wales. The tragedy of Sophonisba was produced in 1729:

inlucky line, 'Oh! Sophonisba, Sophonisba rodied (not from the gallery of the theatre, a printed squib, 'Oh! Jemmy Thomson, Thomson Oh!' extinguished its little spark fter it had been produced with fair success s. and produced Agamemnon (1738), which was eccived. Edward and Eleonora followed and the poet's circumstances were brightened asion of £100 a year from the Prince of o whom in 1732 he had dedicated the poem rty. He was also made Surveyor-General Leeward Islands, an office which (though is were performed by deputy) brought him is annum. In 1740 the masque of Alfred, muson and Mallet, was produced before the of Wales; the song 'Rule, Britannia,' ds tacitly claimed by Mallet as his, was certainly part of Thomson's share in the

He was now in comparative opulence, house at Kew Lane near Richmond was ne of social enjoyment and lettered ease. Lent and nature became, he said, more and a passion every day. 'I have enlarged my rural domain,' he writes to a friend: 'the two fields next to me, from the first of which I have walled—no, no—paled in, about as much as my garden consisted of before, so that the walk runs round the hedge, where you may figure me walking any time of the day, and sometimes at night.' His house appears to have been finely furnished: the sale catalogue, specifying the contents of every room, fills eight pages of print; and his cellar was well stocked with wines and Scotch ale. In this snug suburban retreat Thomson produced the dramas of Tancred and Sigismunda(1745) and Coriolanus (1748); he also applied himself to finish the Castle of Indolence, on which he had been for years engaged. The poem was published in May 1748. In August he took a boat at Hammersmith when heated by walking from London, caught cold, was thrown into a fever, and died on the 27th August 1748.

Though born a poet, Thomson advanced but slowly towards perfection; and the impressions of his Continental tour left their traces on his subsequent work. The first edition of the Seasons differs materially from the second; and almost every alteration was an improvement. In the 1744 edition six hundred lines were added to 'Summer,' eighty-seven to 'Autumn,' one hundred and six to 'Spring,' and two hundred and eighty-two to 'Winter,' according to Mr Logie Robertson's reckoning. Between the first and the last forms that received the author's own corrections the length of the whole poem grew from 3902 to 5403 lines. It has been matter of controversy how far the additions and emendations were due to Thomson himself. The Rev. John Mitford, editing Gray in 1814, alleged that the alterations in an interleaved copy of the 1744 edition were partly by Thomson himself and partly by another, whom, by help of the British Museum authorities, Mitford identified with no less a personage than Pope. Tovey, editing in 1897, and supported by the then

British Museum experts, positively denies that the writing of the second corrector is Pope, and Mr Churton Collins has argued strongly against the inherent improbability of Mitford's assumption. There is no ground to believe that Pope wrote blank verse at all; and it is certainly odd that none of the anecdotists or earlier biographers of Pope or Thomson should have recorded a fact so interesting as the collaboration of the two poets. It may well be that the handwriting of the second series of corrections was merely that of Thomson's amanuensis, and that the second corrector as well as the first was Thomson himself—for it is not fair to assume that the best of the alterations were beyond Thomson's own powers.

One of the most remarkable alterations attributed by Mitford to Pope, which duly appeared in the later editions of the Seasons, was the famous passage about Lavinia. In the original edition of Autumn, Thomson's lines on Lavinia were:

Thoughtless of beauty, she was Beauty's self, Recluse among the woods; if city dames Will deign their faith: and thus she went, compelled By strong necessity, with as serene And pleased a look as Patience e'er put on, To glean Palemon's fields.

This passage was deleted, and the following substituted for it:

Thoughtless of beauty, she was Beauty's self, Recluse amid the close-embowering woods. As in the hollow breast of Apennine, Beneath the shelter of encircling hills, A myrtle rises, far from human eye, And breathes its balmy fragrance o'er the wild; So flourished blooming, and unseen by all, The sweet Lavinia; till at length, compelled By strong Necessity's supreme command, With smiling patience in her looks, she went To glean Palemon's fields.

In writing the Seasons, Thomson is credited with having opened a new era in English literature, and with having produced the first conspicuous example of the poetry consisting mainly of the description of nature. Hazlitt called him 'the best of our descriptive poets.' It would be absurd to say that poets had ever been obtuse to the beauties and interests of nature; Dyer rejoiced in describing hills and valleys and glimpses of the distant sea; but in the bulk of Thomson's predecessors-in Shakespeare, for example, and Milton -nature, and the emotions evoked by nature, form rather an accidental background; in Thomson it becomes the essence of the poem. Wordsworth, his most conspicuous successor in this sphere, was unfair in ascribing Thomson's popularity to 'false ornaments and sentimental commonplaces.' It is Thomson's best that appealed then, that appeals still, to his readers; in spontaneous and genuine love of nature, in describing and in evoking the joy and love of nature in others, he led the way for a long band of followers. He had the insight to see that the heroic couplet, then so popular, was unsuited for his theme; no doubt his blank verse falls short of his great model, Milton, yet the post of the Seasons wields his verse with power and musical charm.

That Thomson's art was perfecting itself up to the end may be seen from the nobler style and diction of the Castle of Indolence, in which the imitation of Spenser is largely playful. Thomson's natural gift included an exuberance which required to be disciplined and controlled. He never slackers in an enthusiasm which fatigues his readers, tor tires of pointing out the beauties of nature, which, indolent as he was, he had surveyed under every aspect till he had become familiar with all. There are many traces of minute and accurate observation at first hand. But he looks also, as Johnson said, 'with the eye which nature bestows only on a pot -the eye that distinguishes, in everything presented to its view, whatever there is on which imagination can delight to be detained, and with a mind that at once comprehends the vast, and attends to the minute.' And everywhere we find evidences of a genuinely sympathetic and kindly heart. His touching allusions to the poor and suffering, w hapless bird and beast in winter; the description of the peasant perishing in the snow, the Siberian exile, or the Arab pilgrims—all overflow with the true feeling which in part at least 'formed the magic of his song.' His own impulses he has expressed with convincing sincerity in one lofty stanza of the Castle of Indolence:

I care not, Fortune, what you me deny:
You cannot rob me of free Nature's grace;
You cannot shut the windows of the sky,
Through which Aurora shows her brightening face;
You cannot bar my constant feet to trace
The woods and lawns, by living stream, at eve.
Let health my nerves and finer fibres brace,
And I their toys to the great children leave:
Of fancy, reason, virtue, naught can me bereave.

'The love of nature,' in Coleridge's words, 'seems to have led Thomson to a cheerful religion; and a gloomy religion to have led Cowper to a love of nature. The one would carry his fellow-men along with him into nature; the other flies to nature from his fellow-men. In chastity of diction, however, and the harmony of blank verse, Cowper leaves Thomson immeasurably below him; yet I still feel the latter to have been the born poet.' The copiousness and fullness of Thomson's descriptions distinguish them, not always to their advantage, from those of the less buoyant Cowper, although Sainte-Beuve holds that he is better than the poet of the Task at large pictures and general effects; 'il y a des masses chez Thomson.' Coleridge also rather unkindly said that 'Thomson was a great poet rather than a good one; his style was as meretricious as his thoughts were natural! His work is at times as verbose as an elaborately descriptive catalogue, and is frequently disfigured by grandiose words and phrases and by superfluous s. Showers in Spring.

orth-east spends his rage, and now shut up his iron cave, the effusive South the wide air, and o'er the void of heaven s the big clouds with vernal showers distent. a dusky wreath they seem to rise, staining ether; but by fast degrees, s on heaps the doubling vapour sails he loaded sky, and mingling deep the horizon round a settled gloom: has wintry storms on mortals shed, sing life; but lovely, gentle, kind, l of every hope and every joy, sh of nature. Gradual sinks the breeze perfect calm; that not a breath l to quiver through the closing woods,

Or rustling turn the many-twinkling leaves Of aspen tall. The uncurling floods, diffused In glassy breadth, seem through delusive lapse Forgetful of their course. 'Tis silence all, And pleasing expectation. Herds and flocks Drop the dry sprig, and mute-imploring, eye The falling verdure. Hushed in short suspense, The plumy people streak their wings with oil, To throw the lucid moisture trickling off; And wait the approaching sign to strike, at once, Into the general choir. Even mountains, vales, And forests seem, impatient, to demand The promised sweetness. Man superior walks Amid the glad creation, musing praise, And looking lively gratitude. At last, The clouds consign their treasures to the fields; And, softly shaking on the dimpled pool Prelusive drops, let all their moisture flow, In large effusion, o'er the freshened world. The stealing shower is scarce to patter heard, By such as wander through the forest walks, Beneath the umbrageous multitude of leaves.

Birds in Spring.

To the deep woods They haste away, all as their fancy leads, Pleasure, or food, or secret safety prompts; That Nature's great command may be obeyed: Nor all the sweet sensations they perceive Indulged in vain. Some to the holly-hedge Nestling repair, and to the thicket some; Some to the rude protection of the thorn Commit their feeble offspring: the cleft tree Offers its kind concealment to a few, Their food its insects, and its moss their nests. Others apart far in the grassy dale, Or roughening waste, their humble texture weave. But most in woodland solitudes delight, In unfrequented glooms, or shaggy banks, Steep, and divided by a babbling brook, Whose murmurs soothe them all the live-long day, When by kind duty fixed. Among the roots Of hazel, pendent o'er the plaintive stream, They frame the first foundation of their domes: Dry sprigs of trees, in artful fabric laid, And bound with clay together. Now 'tis nought But restless hurry through the busy air, Beat by unnumbered wings. The swallow sweeps The slimy pool, to build his hanging house Intent. And often, from the careless back Of herds and flocks a thousand tugging bills Pluck hair and wool; and oft, when unobserved, Steal from the barn a straw: till soft and warm, Clean and complete, their habitation grows.

As thus the patient dam assiduous sits,
Not to be tempted from her tender task,
Or by sharp hunger, or by smooth delight,
Though the whole loosened Spring around her blows,
Her sympathising lover takes his stand
High on the opponent bank, and ceaseless sings
The tedious time away; or else supplies
Her place a moment, while she sudden flits
To pick the scanty meal. The appointed time
With pious toil fulfilled, the callow young,
Warmed and expanded into perfect life,
Their brittle bondage break, and come to light,

A helpless family, demanding food
With constant clamour. O what passions then,
What melting sentiments of kindly care,
On the new parents seize! away they fly
Affectionate, and undesiring bear
The most delicious morsel to their young;
Which equally distributed, again
The search begins. Even so a gentle pair,
By fortune sank, but formed of generous mould,
And charmed with cares beyond the vulgar breast,
In some lone cot amid the distant woods,
Sustained alone by providential Heaven,
Oft, as they weeping eye their infant train,
Check their own appetites, and give them all.

A Summer Morning.

With quickened step, Brown Night retires: young Day pours in apace, And opens all the lawny prospect wide. The dripping rock, the mountain's misty top, Swell on the sight, and brighten with the dawn. Blue, through the dusk, the smoking currents shine; And from the bladed field the fearful hare Limps, awkward: while along the forest-glade The wild deer trip, and, often turning, gaze At early passenger. Music awakes The native voice of undissembled joy; And thick around the woodland hymns arise. Roused by the cock, the soon clad shepherd leaves His mossy cottage, where with Peace he dwells; And from the crowded fold, in order, drives His flock, to taste the verdure of the morn.

Summer Evening.

Low walks the sun, and broadens by degrees,
Just o'er the verge of day. The shifting clouds
Assembled gay, a richly-gorgeous train,
In all their pomp attend his sitting throne.
Air, earth, and ocean smile immense. And now,
As if his weary chariot sought the bowers
Of Amphitrité, and her tending nymphs
(So Grecian fable sung), he dips his orb;
Now half-immersed; and now a golden curve
Gives one bright glance, then total disappears. . . .

Confessed from yonder slow-extinguished clouds, All ether softening, sober Evening takes Her wonted station in the middle air; A thousand shadows at her beck. First this She sends on earth; then that, of deeper dye, Steals soft behind; and then a deeper still, In circle following circle, gathers round, To close the face of things. A fresher gale Begins to wave the wood, and stir the stream, Sweeping with shadowy gust the fields of corn; While the quail clamours for his running mate. Wide o'er the thistly lawn, as swells the breeze, A whitening shower of vegetable down Amusive floats. The kind impartial care Of Nature nought disdains: thoughtful to feed Her lowest sons, and clothe the coming year, From field to field the feathered seeds she wings.

His folded flock secure, the shepherd home Hies, merry-hearted; and by turns relieves The ruddy milk-maid of her brimming pail; The beauty whom perhaps his witless heart, Unknowing what the joy-mixed anguish means, Sincerely loves, by that best language shown Of cordial glances and obliging deeds. Onward they pass, o'er many a panting height, And valley sunk and unfrequented; where At fall of eve the fairy people throng, In various game and revelry to pass The summer night, as village stories tell. But far about they wander from the grave Of him whom his ungentle fortune urged Against his own sad breast to lift the hand Of impious violence. The lonely tower Is also shunned; whose mournful chambers hold So night-struck Fancy dreams, the yelling ghost.

Among the crooked lanes, on every hedge, The Glowworm lights his gem; and through the A moving radiance twinkles. Evening yields The world to Night; not in her winter robe Of massy Stygian woof, but loose arrayed In mantle dun. A faint erroneous ray, Glanced from the imperfect surfaces of things, Flings half an image on the straining eye; While wavering woods, and villages, and stream And rocks, and mountain-tops, that long retains The ascending gleam, are all one swimming seen Uncertain if beheld. Sudden to heaven Thence weary vision turns; where, leading soft The silent hours of love, with purest ray Sweet Venus shines; and, from her genial rise, When day-light sickens, till it springs afresh, Unrivalled reigns, the fairest lamp of night.

An Autumn Evening.

But see, the fading many-coloured woods, Shade deepening over shade, the country round Imbrown; a crowded umbrage, dusk and dun, Of every hue, from wan declining green To sooty dark. These now the lonesome Muse, Low-whispering, lead into their leaf-strewn wall. And give the season in its latest view.

Meantime, light-shadowing all, a sober calm Fleeces unbounded ether; whose least wave Stands tremulous, uncertain where to turn The gentle current; while, illumined wide, The dewy-skirted clouds imbibe the Sun, And through their lucid veil his softened force Shed o'er the peaceful world. Then is the time For those whom Wisdom and whom Nature ch To steal themselves from the degenerate crowd, And soar above this little scene of things; To tread low-thoughted Vice beneath their feet To soothe the throbbing passions into peace, And woo lone Quiet in her silent walks.

Thus solitary, and in pensive guise,
Oft let me wander o'er the russet mead,
And through the saddened grove, where scarce
One dying strain, to cheer the woodman's toil.
Haply some widowed songster pours his plaint,
Far, in faint warblings, through the tawny cope
While congregated thrushes, linnets, larks,
And each wild throat, whose artless strains so
Swelled all the music of the swarming shades,
Robbed of their tuneful souls, now shivering si

One alone, The redbreast, sacred to the household gods, Wisely regardful of the embroiling sky, In joyless fields and thorny thickets leaves His shivering mates, and pays to trusted man His annual visit. Half afraid, he first Against the window beats; then, brisk, alights On the warm hearth; then, hopping o'er the floor, Eyes all the smiling family askance, And pecks, and starts, and wonders where he is: Till, more familiar grown, the table-crumbs Attract his slender feet. The foodless wilds Pour forth their brown inhabitants. The hare, Though timorous of heart, and hard beset By death in various forms—dark snares, and dogs, And more unpitying men-the garden seeks, Urged on by fearless want. The bleating kine Eye the bleak heaven, and next the glistening earth, With looks of dumb despair; then, sad-dispersed, Dig for the withered herb through heaps of snow. . . .

As thus the snows arise, and foul and fierce All Winter drives along the darkened air, In his own loose-revolving fields the swain Disastered stands; sees other hills ascend, Of unknown, joyless brow; and other scenes, Of horrid prospect, shag the trackless plain; Nor finds the river, nor the forest, hid Beneath the formless wild; but wanders on From hill to dale, still more and more astray, Impatient flouncing through the drifted heaps, Stung with the thoughts of home: the thoughts of home Rush on his nerves, and call their vigour forth In many a vain attempt. How sinks his soul! What black despair, what horror fills his heart, When, for the dusky spot which Fancy feigned His tusted cottage rising through the snow, He meets the roughness of the middle waste, Far from the track and blest abode of man; While round him night resistless closes fast, And every tempest, howling o'er his head, Renders the savage wilderness more wild! Then throng the busy shapes into his mind, Of covered pits, unfathomably deep, A dire descent! beyond the power of frost; Of faithless bogs; of precipices huge, Smoothed up with snow; and what is land, unknown, What water, of the still unfrozen spring, In the loose marsh or solitary lake, Where the fresh fountain from the bottom boils. These check his fearful steps; and down he sinks Beneath the shelter of the shapeless drift, Thinking o'er all the bitterness of death, Mixed with the tender anguish Nature shoots Through the wrung bosom of the dying man,-His wife, his children, and his friends unseen. In vain for him the officious wife prepares The fire fair-blazing, and the vestment warm; In vain his little children, peeping out Into the mingling storm, demand their sire, With tears of artless innocence. Alas! Nor wife, nor children, more shall he behold, Nor friends, nor sacred home. On every nerve The deadly Winter seizes; shuts up sense; And, o'er his inmost vitals creeping cold, Lavs him along the snows, a stiffened corse, Stretched out, and bleaching in the northern blast.

The Mecca Caravan.

Patient of thirst and toil, Son of the desert! e'en the camel feels. Shot through his withered heart, the fiery blast. Or from the black-red ether, bursting broad, Sallies the sudden whirlwind. Straight the sands Commoved around, in gathering eddies play; Nearer and nearer still they darkening come, Till with the general all-involving storm Swept up, the whole continuous wilds arise; And by their noonday fount dejected thrown, Or sunk at night in sad disastrous sleep, Beneath descending hills, the caravan Is buried deep. In Cairo's crowded streets The impatient merchant, wondering, waits in vain, And Mecca saddens at the long delay.

From 'The Castle of Indolence.'

In lowly dale, fast by a river's side,
With woody hill o'er hill encompassed round,
A most enchanting wizard did abide,
Than whom a fiend more fell is nowhere found.
It was, I ween, a lovely spot of ground;
And there a season atween June and May,
Half prankt with spring, with summer half imbrowned,
A listless climate made, where, sooth to say,
No living wight could work, ne cared even for play.

Was nought around but images of rest:

Sleep-soothing groves, and quiet lawns between;
And flowery beds, that slumbrous influence kest,
From poppies breathed; and beds of pleasant green,
Where never yet was creeping creature seen.
Meantime unnumbered glittering streamlets played,
And hurled everywhere their waters sheen;
That, as they bickered through the sunny glade,
Though restless still themselves, a lulling murmur made.

Joined to the prattle of the purling rills,
Were heard the lowing herds along the vale,
And flocks loud-bleating from the distant hills,
And vacant shepherds piping in the dale:
And now and then sweet Philomel would wail,
Or stock-doves plain amid the forest deep,
That drowsy rustled to the sighing gale;
And still a coil the grasshopper did keep:
Yet all these sounds yblent inclined all to sleep.

Full in the passage of the vale, above,
A sable, silent, solemn forest stood;
Where nought but shadowy forms were seen to move,
As Idless fancied in her dreaming mood:
And up the hills, on either side, a wood
Of blackening pines, aye waving to and fro,
Sent forth a sleepy horror through the blood;
And where this valley winded out below,
The murmuring main was heard, and scarcely heard, to

A pleasing land of drowsy-head it was; Of dreams that wave before the half-shut eye; And of gay castles in the clouds that pass, For ever flushing round a summer-sky. There eke the soft delights, that witchingly Instil a wanton sweetness through the breast, And the calm pleasures, always hovered nigh; But whate'er smackt of noyance, or unrest, Was far, far off expelled from this delicious nest.

The landscape such, inspiring perfect ease,
Where Indolence (for so the wizard hight)
Close-hid his castle mid embowering trees,
That half shut out the beams of Phœbus bright,
And made a kind of checkered day and night.
Meanwhile, unceasing at the massy gate,
Beneath a spacious palm, the wicked wight
Was placed; and to his lute of cruel fate
And labour harsh, complained, lamenting man's estate.

Thither continual pilgrims crowded still,
From all the roads of earth that pass there by:
For, as they chanced to breathe on neighbouring hill.
The freshness of this valley smote their eye,
And drew them ever and anon more nigh;
Till clustering round the enchanter false they hung,
Ymolten with his syren melody;
While o'er the enfeebling lute his hand he flung,

And to the trembling chords these tempting verses surg

'Behold! ye pilgrims of this earth, behold!
See all but man with unearned pleasure gay:
See her bright robes the butterfly unfold,
Broke from her wintry tomb in prime of May!
What youthful bride can equal her array?
Who can with her for easy pleasure vie?
From mead to mead with gentle wing to stray,
From flower to flower on balmy gales to fly,
Is all she has to do beneath the radiant sky.

'Behold the merry minstrels of the morn,
The swarming songsters of the careless grove;
Ten thousand throats that, from the flowering thom,
Hymn their good God, and carol sweet of love,
Such grateful kindly raptures them emove!
They neither plough, nor sow; ne, fit for fail,
E'er to the barn the nodding sheaves they drove;
Yet theirs each harvest dancing in the gale,
Whatever crowns the hill, or smiles along the vale.

'Outcast of Nature, man! the wretched thrall
Of bitter-dropping sweat, of sweltry pain,
Of cares that eat away the heart with gall,
And of the vices, an inhuman train,
That all proceed from savage thirst of gain:

To poison earth, Astrea left the plain;
Guile, Violence, and Murder, seized on man,
And, for soft milky streams, with blood the rivers ran-

Your cares, your toils; will steep you in a sea

And endless pillows rise to prop the head;
So that each spacious room was one full-swelling bed.

The rooms with costly tapestry were hung,
Where was inwoven many a gentle tale;
Such as of old the rural poets sung,
Or of Arcadian or Sicilian vale:
Reclining lovers, in the lonely dale,
Poured forth at large the sweetly-tortured heart;
Or, sighing tender passion, swelled the gale,
And taught charmed Echo to resound their smart;
While flocks, woods, streams, around, repose and peace impart.

Those pleased the most, where, by a cunning hand, Depainted was the patriarchal age;
What time Dan Abraham left the Chaldee land, And pastured on from verdant stage to stage,
Where fields and fountains fresh could best engage.
Toil was not then. Of nothing took they heed,
But with wild beasts the sylvan war to wage,
And o'er vast plains their herds and flocks to feed:
Blessed sons of Nature they! true Golden Age indeed!

Sometimes the pencil, in cool airy halls,
Bade the gay bloom of vernal landscapes rise,
Or Autumn's varied shades imbrown the walls:
Now the black tempest strikes the astonished eyes;
Now down the steep the flashing torrent flies;
The trembling sun now plays o'er ocean blue,
And now rude mountains frown amid the skies:
Whate'er Lorraine light-touched with softening hue,
Or savage Rosa dashed, or learned Poussin drew. . . .

A certain music, never known before,
Here lulled the pensive, melancholy mind;
Full easily obtained. Behoves no more,
But sidelong to the gently-waving wind
To lay the well-tuned instrument reclined;
From which, with airy flying fingers light.
Beyond each mortal touch the most refined,
The god of winds drew sounds of deep delight:
Whence, with just cause, the harp of Æolus it hight.

Ah me! what hand can touch the string so fine?
Who up the lofty diapason roll
Such sweet, such sad, such solemn airs divine,
Then let them down again into the soul!
Now rising love they fanned; now pleasing dole
They breathed, in tender musings, through the heart;
And now a graver sacred strain they stole,
As when scraphic hands a hymn impart:
Wild-warbling Nature all, above the reach of Art!

Such the gay splendour, the luxurious state,
Of Caliphs old, who on the Tigris' shore,
In mighty Bagdad, populous and great,
Held their bright court, where was of ladies store;
And verse, love, music still the garland wore:
When sleep was coy, the bard, in waiting there,
Cheered the lone midnight with the Muse's lore;
Composing music bade his dreams be fair,
And music lent new gladness to the morning air.

Near the pavilions where we slept, still ran
Soft-tinkling streams, and dashing waters fell,
And sobbing breezes sighed, and oft began
(So worked the wizard) wintry storms to swell,
As heaven and earth they would together mell:
At doors and windows, threatening, seemed to call
The demons of the tempest, growling fell,
Yet the least entrance found they none at all;
Whence sweeter grew our sleep, secure in massy hall.

And hither Morpheus sent his kindest dreams, Raising a world of gayer tinct and grace; O'er which were shadowy cast Elysian gleams, That played, in waving lights, from place to place, And shed a roseate smile on Nature's face. Not Titian's pencil e'er could so array, So fleece with clouds, the pure ethereal space; Ne could it e'er such melting forms display, As loose on flowery beds all languishingly lay.

No, fair illusions! artful phantoms, no!
My Muse will not attempt your fairy-land;
She has no colours that like you can glow:
To catch your vivid scenes, too gross her hand.
But sure it is, was ne'er a subtler band
Than these same guileful angel-seeming sprites,
Who thus in dreams, voluptuous, soft, and bland,
Poured all the Arabian heaven upon our nights,
And blest them oft besides with more refined delights.

They were in sooth a most enchanting train,
Even feigning virtue; skilful to unite
With evil good, and strew with pleasure pain.
But for those fiends whom blood and broils delight;
Who hurl the wretch, as if to hell outright,
Down, down black gulfs, where sullen waters sleep,
Or hold him clambering all the fearful night
On beetling cliffs, or pent in ruins deep;
They, till due time should serve, were bid far hence to keep.

Ye guardian spirits, to whom man is dear,
From these foul demons shield the midnight gloom!
Angels of fancy and of love, be near,
And o'er the blank of sleep diffuse a bloom!
Evoke the sacred shades of Greece and Rome,
And let them virtue with a look impart:
But chief, awhile, O! lend us from the tomb
Those long-lost friends for whom in love we smart,
And fill with pious awe and joy-mixed woe the heart.

From 'Alfred, a Masque'—An Ode.

When Britain first, at Heaven's command,
Arose from out the azure main,
This was the charter of the land,
And guardian angels sang this strain:
Rule, Britannia, rule the waves!
Britons never will be slaves!

The nations not so blest as thee,
Must in their turns to tyrants fall,
Whilst thou shalt flourish great and free,
The dread and envy of them all.
Rule, Britannia, &c.

Still more majestic shalt thou rise,
More dreadful from each foreign stroke;
As the loud blast that tears the skies,
Serves but to root thy native oak.
Rule, Britannia, &c.

Thee haughty tyrants ne'er shall tame;
All their attempts to bend thee down
Will but arouse thy generous flame,
But work their woe and thy renown.
Rule, Britannia, &c.

To thee belongs the rural reign;
Thy cities shall with commerce shine;
All thine shall be the subject main,
And every shore it circles thine.
Rule, Britannia, &c.

The Muses, still with freedom found,
Shall to thy happy coast repair;
Blest isle, with matchless beauty crowned,
And manly hearts to guard the fair!
Rule, Britannia, &c.

David Mallet (1705?-65), author of popular ballad stanzas, and some florid passioned poems in blank verse, was a sue but unprincipled literary adventurer. His name was Malloch, the name adopted by of the Macgregors when their clan was bru (1603). His father was said to have kept at Crieff, but seems rather to have be well-to-do tenant of the farm of Dunruch: Muthill in Perthshire. Educated at Crief school and Edinburgh University, where h the acquaintance of James Thomson, Mall to London as tutor in the Duke of Mo family in 1723. Next year his ballad of 1 and Margaret appeared; and he soon nu among his friends Young, Pope, and authors, to whom his assiduous attentic agreeable manners, and literary tastes r his society acceptable. her grave to reproach her undoer; and the hungry worm and the cock crowing are precise parallels to the channerin' worm and the cock in 'The Wife o' Usher's Well' (see Vol. I. p. 537). Mallet confessed to having followed a verse in Fletcher's Knight of the Burning Pestle:

When it was grown to dark midnight, And all were fast asleep, In came Margaret's grimly ghost, And stood at William's feet.

In the first printed copies of Mallet's ballad the first two lines were all but identical:

When all was wrapt in dark midnight, ... And all were fast asleep.

William and Margaret.

'Twas at the silent solemn hour, When night and morning meet; In glided Margaret's grimly ghost, And stood at William's feet.

Her face was like an April morn Clad in a wintry cloud; And clay-cold was her lily hand That held her sable shroud.

So shall the fairest face appear,
When youth and years are flown:
Such is the robe that kings must wear,
When death has reft their crown.

Her bloom was like the springing flower,
That sips the silver dew;
The rose was budded in her check,
Just opening to the view.

But love had, like the canker-worm, Consumed her early prime; The rose grew pale, and left her cheek, She died before her time.

- 'Awake!' she cried, 'thy true love calls, Come from her midnight grave: Now let thy pity hear the maid Thy love refused to save.
- 'This is the dark and dreary hour When injured ghosts complain; When yawning graves give up their dead, To haunt the faithless swain.
- 'Bethink thee, William, of thy fault, Thy pledge and broken oath! And give me back my maiden vow, And give me back my troth.
- 'Why did you promise love to me,
 And not that promise keep?
 Why did you swear my eyes were bright,
 Yet leave those eyes to weep?
- 'How could you say my face was fair, And yet that face forsake? How could you win my virgin heart, Yet leave that heart to break?
- 'Why did you say my lip was sweet, And made the scarlet pale? And why did I, young, witless maid! Believe the flattering tale?

'That face, alas! no more is fair, Those lips no longer red: Dark are my eyes, now closed in death, And every charm is fled.

'The hungry worm my sister is;
This winding-sheet I wear:
And cold and weary lasts our night,
Till that last morn appear.

'But hark! the cock has warned me hence;
A long and last adieu!
Come see, false man, how low she lies,
Who died for love of you.'

The lark sung loud; the morning smiled With beams of rosy red: Pale William quaked in every limb, And raving left his bed.

He hied him to the fatal place Where Margaret's body lay; And stretched him on the green-grass turf That wrapt her breathless clay.

And thrice he called on Margaret's name, And thrice he wept full sore; Then laid his cheek to her cold grave, And word spake never more!

The Birks of Invermay.

The smiling morn, the breathing spring, Invite the tuneful birds to sing; And, while they warble from the spray, Love melts the universal lay.

Let us, Amanda, timely wise,

Like them, improve the hour that flies; And in soft raptures waste the day,

Among the birks of Invermay.

For soon the winter of the year,
And age, life's winter, will appear;
At this thy living bloom will fade,
As that will strip the verdant shade.
Our taste of pleasure then is o'er,
The feathered songsters are no more;
And when they drop and we decay,
Adieu the birks of Invermay!

Some additional stanzas were added to the last poem (originally 'The Birks of Endermay') by Dr Bryce of Kirknewton. Mallet's Collected Works appeared in three volumes in 1759. His poems were often reprinted (in such collections as Johnson's and Chalmers's). Dinsdale's edition of the Ballads and Songs, with a Life of Mallet, was published in 1857.

Henry Carey (born near the end of the seventeenth century) was believed to be an illegitimate son of George Savile, the famous Marquis of Halifax. He wrote a multitude of songs, witty poems, burlesques, farces, and dramatic pieces, sometimes providing also music for them; and had produced a volume of youthful poems in 1713. Chrononhotonthologos, 'the King of Queerummania,' was a burlesque tragedy (1734) in some measure on the lines of Fielding's Tom Thumb (1730). Characters in it are Aldiborontiphoscophornio and Rigdumfunnidos ('a lord in waiting'), whose names Scott applied to the Ballantyne brothers. The Dragon of W (1744) was popular on the stage. In all h duced some two hundred works. It was c it was said that 'he led a life free of rep and hanged himself October 4th, 1743. Henry Carey, as Lord Macaulay noted scended that Edmund Kean who in our transformed himself so marvellously into Sh Iago, and Othello.' Carey's poem of I Pamby has added a word to the English guage. It is a burlesque of the child-poe Ambrose Philips, and is a reductio ad absi in child-language, 'Namby Pamby Pilli-pi: name of the poet, corresponding with '1 pimed on missy-mis.' The reference is t 'Dimply damsel, sweetly smiling,' and 'I blossom, infant fair' style of odes by Am Philips.

Carey thus tells the occasion of his classical lyric, Sally in our Alley, the music of which is also his: 'A shoemaker's apprentice making holiday with his sweetheart, treated her with a sight of Bedlam, the puppet-shows, the flying chairs, and all the elegancies of Moorfields: from whence proceeding to the Farthing Piehouse, he gave her a collation of buns, cheese-cakes, gammon of bacon, stuffed beef, and bottled ale; through all which scenes the author dodged them (charmed with the simplicity of their courtship), from whence he drew this little sketch of nature.' The song, he adds, was more than once mentioned with approbation by 'the divine Addison.' There is no good ground for crediting him with the authorship of God save the King, though after his death his son claimed it for him.

Sally in our Alley.

Of all the girls that are so smart, There's none like pretty Sally: She is the darling of my heart, And she lives in our alley.

There is no lady in the land Is half so sweet as Sally; She is the darling of my heart, And she lives in our alley.

Her father he makes cabbage-nets,
And through the streets does cry 'em:
Her mother she sells laces long,
To such as please to buy 'em:
But sure such folks could ne'er beget
So sweet a girl as Sally!
She is the darling of my heart,
And she lives in our alley.

When she is by, I leave my work (I love her so sincerely),
My master comes like any Turk,
And bangs me most severely:
But let him bang his belly full,
I'll bear it all for Sally;
She is the darling of my heart,
And she lives in our alley.

Of all the days that's in the week,
I dearly love but one day,
And that's the day that comes betwixt
A Saturday and Monday.
For then I'm dressed all in my best,
To walk abroad with Sally;
She is the darling of my heart,
And she lives in our alley.

My master carries me to church,
And often am I blamed,
Because I leave him in the lurch
As soon as text is named:
I leave the church in sermon time,
And slink away to Sally;
She is the darling of my heart,
And she lives in our alley.

When Christmas comes about again,
O then I shall have money;
I'll hoard it up and box it all,
I'll give it to my honey:
I would it were ten thousand pounds,
I'd give it all to Sally;
She is the darling of my heart,
And she lives in our alley.

My master and the neighbours all
Make game of me and Sally;
And (but for her) I'd better be
A slave, and row a galley:
But when my seven long years are out,
O then I'll marry Sally,
O then we'll wed, and then we'll bed,
But not in our alley.

Philip Doddridge, Nonconformist divine, was born in London, 26th June 1702. His grandfather had been ejected from the living of Shepperton in Middlesex by the Act of Uniformity in 1602; and his father, a well-to-do oilman in London, married the only daughter of a German Lutheran pastor who had fled from Prague to escape the persecution which raged in Bohemia after the expulsion of Frederick, the Elector Palatine. In 1712 Doddridge was sent to school at Kingstonupon-Thames; but both his parents dying, he was removed to St Albans in 1715, and whilst there was admitted a member of the Nonconforming congregation. When, in 1718, the Duchess of Bedford offered to educate him at either university for the Church of England, Doddridge declined from conscientious scruples. Dr Clarke, Presbyteria minister of St Albans, befriended him, and in 1719 he was placed at a Dissenting academy at Kibworth in Leicestershire. Here for three years he pursued his studies for the ministry, cultivating a taste for elegant literature, and, as appears from his correspondence, usually in love with somebody, and in brisk correspondence with her. The playfulness and even gaiety of some of these epistes are remarkable in one so staid and devout, and suggest Cowper's.

From his first sermon, delivered at the age of twenty, Doddridge became a marked preacher among the Dissenters, and had calls to various congregations. He declined several calls because the congregations inviting were 'a very rigid kind of people,' or were too orthodox; but in 1729 he settled at Northampton, becoming also the head of a theological academy. He believed that he was 'in all the most important points a Calvinist;' but the orthodox suspected him, and Stoughton holds that his view of the Trinity was Sabellias But even those who suspected his orthodoxy, and thought his truly Catholic liberality too alembracing, revered his personal piety. He had a happy family life and many devoted friends. He first appeared as an author in 1730, when he published a pamphlet on the Means of Revising the Dissenting Interest. His Sermons on the Education of Children (1732), Sermons to Young People (1735), Ten Sermons on the Power and Grace of Christ (1736), and Practical Discourses on Regeneration (1741) were all well received; and The Rise and Progress of Religion in the Soul (1745) is one of the few works of practical religion which has been accepted by all denomnations of evangelical Christians as next to the Bible the best aid to the devout life, and has been translated into French, Dutch, German, Danish, Gaelic, Welsh, Tamil, and other tongues. In 1747 appeared Some Remarkable Passages in the Life of Colonel James Gardiner, who was slein by the Rebels at the Battle of Prestonpans, Sopt. 21, 1745—the life of a Scottish officer who served with distinction under Marlborough, and from a gay libertine life was suddenly converted to the strictest piety by a visible representation of Christ upon the cross amidst a blaze of light, and the audible words: 'O sinner! did I suffer this for thee, and are these the returns?' The Family Expositor, containing a Version and Paraphress of the New Testament, with Critical Notes and a Practical Improvement (6 vols. 1739-56), also received a wide welcome. Doddridge's health failing, he was, in 1751, advised to remove to a armer climate for the winter, and in September I the same year he sailed from Falmouth for isbon. He survived his arrival only five days, ying October 26, 1751. His hymns are prized y many who hardly know his name. Of some our hundred written by him the best known are Ye servants of the Lord; 'O happy Day;' My God, and is thy table spread;' 'Hark, the lad sound, the Saviour comes;' 'O God of lethel, by whose hand.' Doddridge was author I what Johnson calls 'one of the finest epigrams the English language.' His family motto, Dum vivimus vivamus,' was in its primary signication hardly very suitable to a Christian divine, at he paraphrased it thus:

'Live while you live,' the epicure would say,
'And seize the pleasures of the present day.'
'Live while you live,' the sacred preacher cries,
'And give to God each moment as it flies.'
Lord, in my views let both united be;
I live in pleasure when I live to thee 1

A Country Life.

'You know I love a country life, and here we have a in perfection. I am roused in the morning with the thirping of sparrows, the cooling of pigeons, the lowing of kine, the bleating of sheep, and, to complete the concert, the grunting of swine and neighing of horses. We have a mighty pleasant garden and orchard, and a fine arbour under some tall shady limes, that form a kind of lofty dome, of which, as a native of the great city, you may perhaps catch a glimmering idea, if I name the cupola of St Paul's. And then, on the other ide of the house, there is a large space which we call a wilderness, and which I fancy would please you extremely. The ground is a dainty greensward; a brook runs sparkling through the middle, and there are two large fish-ponds at one end; both the ponds and the brook are surrounded with willows; and there are several shady walks under the trees, besides little knots of young willows interspersed at convenient distances. This is the nursery of our lambs and calves, with whom bave the honour to be intimately acquainted. Here generally spend the evening, and pay my respects to be setting sun, when the variety and the beauty of se prospect inspire a pleasure that I know not how express. I am sometimes so transported with these animate beauties, that I fancy I am like Adam in aradise; and it is my only misfortune that I want an ve, and have none but the birds of the air, and the asts of the field, for my companions.'

(From a letter to a young lady.)

Happy Devotional Feelings of Doddridge.

I hope, my dear, you will not be offended when I II you that I am, what I hardly thought it possible, ithout a miracle, that I should have been, very easy ad happy without you. My days begin, pass, and end pleasure, and seem short because they are so delighted. It may seem strange to say it, but really so it is, hardly feel that I want anything. I often think of you, and pray for you, and bless God on your account, ad please myself with the hope of many comfortable sys, and weeks, and years with you; yet I am not all anxious about your return, or indeed about anything else. And the reason, the great and sufficient reason, is, that I have more of the presence of God with me than I remember ever to have enjoyed in any one month of my life. He enables me to live for him, and to live with him. When I awake in the morning. which is always before it is light, I address myself to him, and converse with him, speak to him while I am lighting my candle and putting on my clothes, and have often more delight before I come out of my chamber, though it be hardly a quarter of an hour after my awaking, than I have enjoyed for whole days, or perhaps weeks of my life. He meets me in my study, in secret, in family devotions. It is pleasant to read, pleasant to compose, pleasant to converse with my friends at home; pleasant to visit those abroad-the poor, the sick; pleasant to write letters of necessary business by which any good can be done; pleasant to go out and preach the gospel to poor souls, of which some are thirsting for it, and others dying without it; pleasant in the week-day to think how near another Sabbath is; but, oh! much, much more pleasant, to think how near eternity is, and how short the journey through this wilderness, and that it is but a step from earth to beaven (From a letter to his wife in 1742.)

His Correspondence and his Diary were published in 1829-31, and there is a Memoir by Stanford (1880).

John Wesley (1703-91), the founder of Methodism, was a great religious and reforming genius; he was also a very copious and effective writer on innumerable subjects, and the author of one of the most interesting fournals in the English tongue. The fifteenth child and second surviving son of the rector of Epworth in Lincolnshire, he passed from the Charterhouse to Christ Church, Oxford, where his brothers Samuel and Charles also studied. He was ordained deacon in 1725, and in 1726 became Fellow of Lincoln and Greek lecturer. In 1727 he left Oxford to assist his father, but returned as tutor in 1729, having in 1728 been ordained priest. During his absence his brother Charles and one or two other students had by a new religious zeal led somebody to exclaim, 'Here is a new sect of Methodists sprung up.' So the word, used in the sixteenth century for certain schools of physicians and mathematicians, was first used in its religious reference; but the movement we identify it with had not yet taken origin, though by 1735 the little company of devout friends numbered nearly a score, Hervey and Whitefield being now of the number And even before this Wesley had been much influenced by Law's mysticism. In 1735 Wesley undertook a mission to Georgia under the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, being then a rigid High Churchman. It has even been said of him that at this time he seemed likely to anticipate by a century the work of Cardinal Newman. He returned to England in 1738, and in London had much prayerful intercourse with the Moravian missionary, Peter Böhler. Methodism dates its birth from that May evening in 1738 when, at a meeting of a society in Aldersgate Street, he heard Luther's preface to the Epistle to the Romans read, and felt that Christ had taken away his sins. The sweeping aside of ecclesiastical traditions, the rejection of Apostolical Succession, the ordination with his own hands of presbyters and bishops, the final organisation of a separate Church, were all involved in what took place that night. The clergy closed their pulpits against Wesley; this intolerance, Whitefield's example, and the needs of the degraded masses drove him into the open air. During his journeyings of half a century ten thousand to thirty thousand people would wait patiently for hours to hear him. He gave his strength to working-class neighbourhoods; hence the mass of his converts were colliers, miners, foundrymen, weavers, spinners, fishermen, artisans, yeomen, and day-labourers in towns. was frequently in danger, but he outlived all persecution, and the itineraries of his old age were triumphal processions from one end of the country to the other. He wandered all over the British Isles, crossed the Irish Sea more than forty times, and after 1757 was frequently in Scotland; and he repeatedly visited the Continent. During his unparalleled apostolate he travelled two hundred and fifty thousand miles and preached forty thousand sermons. Yet he managed to do a prodigious amount of literary work, reading on horseback; whenever and wherever he rode he read or composed. He wrote short English, French, Latin, Greek, and Hebrew grammars; a Compendium of Logic; extracts from Phædrus, Ovid, Virgil, Horace, Juvenal, Persius, Martial, and Sallust; an English Dictionary; commentaries on the Old and New Testaments; a short Roman History; a History of England; an Ecclesiastical History; a Compendium of Social Philosophy; and a Christian Library of fifty volumes, for the benefit of his itinerant preachers. edited the Imitation of Christ, and the principal works of Bunyan, Baxter, Edwards, Rutherford, Law, Madame Guyon, and others; endless abridged biographies, and even an abridged edition of Brooke's novel, The Fool of Quality; a Compendium of Physic-not to speak of collections of psalms, hymns, and tunes, his own Sermons and Journals, and a monthly magazine. His works were so popular that he made £30,000, every penny of which he distributed in charity during his life. He founded an orphans' home at Newcastle, charity schools in London, and a dispensary in Bristol. Dean Stanley affirmed that Wesley was the founder of the Broad Church. Under his direction the Conference in 1770 adopted resolutions which provoked the indignation of his orthodox Calvinistic friends - that the heathen who had never heard of Christ could be saved if they feared God and worked righteousness according to the light they had. And he believed Marcus Aurelius would be saved, and spoke of the 'execrable wretches' who wrangled at the various Church councils. He took upon himself with the utmost reluctance the responsibility of organising a separate Church. But the most striking feature of his life as a theologian was his readiness in the last resort, whatever it cost him, to adapt his creed to indisputable facts.

Of the enormous mass of his writing, much is admirable. 'As for me,' he said, 'I never think of my style at all, but just set down the words that come first.' For that very reason, since he was an exceptionally gifted man and a well-resi scholar, his work is natural, simple, generally pithy and racy. His sermons are not eloquent, original, or profound, but they were abundantly effective, probably by reason of their very simplicity. He was a keen and telling controversialist, and some times carried frankness and free speech to their full limits. When Toplady, author of 'Rock of Ages,' but a fierce Calvinist champion, became to abusive, and talked of Wesley's Satanic guilt and Satanic shamelessness, Wesley retorted that he declined to fight with chimney-sweepers. John Wesley's best hymns are translations from Monvian and other German sources; but Charles's noblest and tenderest hymns gained much from the elder brother's judicious and numerous emendations. Here he had Charles's sanction and cooperation. But his effective touch is also seen in the alterations he made in Watts's hymns. If one man may alter another man's hymns, then perhaps Wesley performed the task as judiciously as is possible; the alterations are in most cases obvious improvements. Wesley's published Journal (more precisely 'Extracts of the Rev. Mr John Wesley's Journals'), which extends from 1735 to 1790, contains the experiences, observations, refertions, comments, and intimate thoughts of one of the most acute and sagacious of men, not without wit, epigram, and irony. Many of those far removed from the Wesleyan fold take delight in Wesley's Journal; it was Edward FitzGerald's favourite reading. Wesley was keenly interested in ghoststories, psychical research subjects, firmly believed in apparitions and in diabolical possession, and even held that the inspiration of Scripture guaranteed the reality of what Englishmen understood by witchcraft. 'Cleanliness is indeed next to godliness,' from a sermon of Wesley's on dress, seems to be the first known instance in which this proverbial saying occurs precisely in this form; and his letters are studded with sage sayings such as, 'Passion and prejudice govern the world; only under the name of reason.

These extracts are from the Journal:

The Birth of Methodism.

In my return to England, January, 1738, being in imminent danger of death, and very uneasy on that account, I was strongly convinced that the cause of that uneasiness was unbelief, and that the gaining a true, living faith was the 'one thing needful' for me. But still I fixed not this faith on its right object: I meant only faith in God, not faith in or through Christ-Again, I knew not that I was wholly void of this faith; but only thought, I had not enough of it. So that when hler, whom God prepared for me as soon as to London, affirmed of true faith in Christ, but one,) that it had those two fruits inattending it, 'Dominion over sin, and constant m a sense of forgiveness,' I was quite amazed, ed upon it as a new Gospel. If this was so, ear I had not faith. But I was not willing to used of this. Therefore, I disputed with all my dlaboured to prove that faith might be where not; especially where the sense of forgiveness For, all the Scriptures relating to this, I had

For, all the Scriptures relating to this, I had g since taught to construe away; and to call yterians who spoke otherwise. Besides, I well one could, in the nature of things, have such forgiveness, and not feel it. But I felt it not there was no faith without this, all my preso faith dropped at once.

I met Peter Böhler again, he consented to put ate upon the issue which I desired, namely, and experience. I first consulted the Scripit when I set aside the glosses of men, and onsidered the words of God, comparing them endeavouring to illustrate the obscure by the passages, I found they all made against me, forced to retreat to my last hold, 'that expeould never agree with the literal interpretation scriptures. Nor could I therefore allow it to till I found some living witnesses of it.' He ne could show me such at any time; if I desired xt day. And accordingly, the next day he came th three others, all of whom testified, of their sonal experience, that a true living faith in inseparable from a sense of pardon for all past, iom from all present, sins. They added with th, that this faith was the gift, the free gift of d that he would surely bestow it upon every earnestly and perseveringly sought it. I was oughly convinced; and by the grace of God, d to seek it unto the end, (1.) By absolutely ig all dependence, in whole or in part, upon works or righteousness; on which I had really my hope of salvation, though I knew it not, youth up. (2.) By adding to the constant use e other means of grace, continual prayer for thing, justifying, saving faith, a full reliance lood of Christ shed for me; a trust in Him, rrist, as my sole justification, sanctification, and nued thus to seek it, (though with strange in-:, dulness, and coldness, and unusually frequent into sin,) till Wednesday, May 24. I think it t five this morning, that I opened my Testament words, Τὰ μέγιστα ἡμῦν καὶ τίμια ἐπαγγέλματα :, Υνα διά τούτων γένησθε θείας κοινωνοί φύσεως. re given unto us exceeding great and precious , even that ye should be partakers of the divine 2 Pet. i. 4). Just as I went out, I opened it again words, 'Thou art not far from the kingdom of n the afternoon I was asked to go to St Paul's. nem was, 'Out of the deep have I called unto Lord: Lord, hear my voice. O let thine ears well the voice of my complaint. If thou, Lord, extreme to mark what is done amiss, O Lord, y abide it? For there is mercy with thee; shalt thou be feared. O Israel, trust in the or with the Lord there is mercy, and with Him is plenteous redemption. And He shall redeem Israel from all his sins.'

In the evening I went very unwillingly to a society in Aldersgate-Street, where one was reading Luther's preface to the Epistle to the Romans. About a quarter before nine, while he was describing the change which God works in the heart through faith in Christ, I felt my heart strangely warmed. I felt I did trust in Christ, Christ alone for salvation: And an assurance was given me, that he had taken away my sins, even mine, and saved me from the law of sin and death.

I began to pray with all my might for those who had in a more especial manner despitefully used me and persecuted me. I then testified openly to all there, what I now first felt in my heart. But it was not long before the enemy suggested, 'This cannot be faith; for where is thy joy?' Then was I taught, that peace and victory over sin are essential to faith in the Captain of our salvation: But that, as to the transports of joy that usually attend the beginning of it, especially in those who have mourned deeply, God sometimes giveth, sometimes withholdeth them, according to the counsels of his own will.

After my return home, I was much buffeted with temptations; but cried out, and they fled away. They returned again and again. I as often lifted up my eyes, and He 'sent me help from his holy place.' And herein I found the difference between this and my former state chiefly consisted. I was striving, yea, fighting with all my might under the Law, as well as under grace. But then I was sometimes, if not often, conquered; now, I was always conqueror.

Thur. 25.—The moment I awaked, 'Jesus, Master,' was in my heart and in my mouth; and I found all my strength lay in keeping my eye fixed upon him, and my soul waiting on him continually. Being again at St Paul's in the afternoon, I could taste the good word of God in the anthem, which began, 'My song shall be always of the loving kindness of the Lord: With my mouth will I ever be showing forth thy truth from one generation to another.' Yet the enemy injected a fear, 'If thou dost believe, why is there not a more sensible change?' I answered, (yet not I,) 'That I know not. But this I know, I have "now peace with God." And I sin not to-day, and Jesus my Master has forbid me to take thought for the morrow.'

'But is not any sort of fear,' continued the tempter,
'a proof that thou dost not believe?' I desired my Master to answer for me; and opened his Book upon those words of St Paul, 'Without were fightings, within were fears.' Then, inferred I, well may fears be within me; but I must go on, and tread them under my feet.

Wesley in Scotland.

Fri. [May] 8, [1761].—We rode to Glammiss, about sixty-four measured miles, and on Saturday, 9th, about sixty-six more to Edinburgh. I was tired: however, I would not disappoint the congregation: and God gave me strength according to my day.

Sun. 10.—I had designed to preach near the Infirmary; but some of the managers would not suffer it. So I preached in our Room, morning and evening, even to the rich and honourable. And I bear them witness, they will endure plain dealing, whether they profit by it or not.

Mon. 11.—I took my leave of Edinburgh for the present. The situation of the city, on a hill shelving down on both sides, as well as to the east, with the stately castle upon a craggy rock on the west, is inexpressibly fine; and the main street so broad and finely paved, with the lofty houses on either hand, (many of them seven or eight stories high,) is far beyond any in Great Britain. But how can it be suffered, that all manner of fifth should still be thrown even into this street continually? Where are the magistracy, the gentry, the nobility of the land? Have they no concern for the honour of their nation? How long shall the capital city of Scotland, yea, and the chief street of it, stink worse than a common sewer? Will no lover of his country, or of decency and common sense, find a remedy for this?

Holyrood-House, at the entrance of Edinburgh, the ancient palace of the Scottish kings, is a noble structure; it was re-built and furnished by King Charles the Second. One side of it is a picture gallery, wherein are pictures of all the Scottish kings; and an original one of the celebrated Queen Mary. It is scarce possible for any who looks at this, to think her such a monster as some have painted her; nor indeed for any who considers the circumstances of her death, equal to that of an ancient martyr.

I preached in the evening at Musselburgh, and at five in the morning. Then we rode on to Haddington, where (the rain driving me in) I preached, between nine and ten, in Provost Dickson's parlour. About one I preached at North-Berwick, a pretty large town, close to the seashore; and, at seven in the evening, (the rain continuing,) in the house at Dunbar.

Wed. 13.—It being a fair mild evening, I preached near the Key, to most of the inhabitants of the town, and spoke full as plain as the evening before. Every one seemed to receive it in love: probably if there was regular preaching here, much good might be done. . . .

Wed. [May] 13, [1772].-I preached at Leith, in the most horrid, dreary Room I have seen in the kingdom. But the next day I found another kind of Room; any, cheerful, and lightsome; which Mr Parker undertook to fit up for the purpose, without any delay.

Sun. 17.—I had appointed to preach at noon in the Lady's Walk, at Leith; but being offered the use of the Episcopal chapel, I willingly accepted it, and both red Prayers and preached. Here also the behaviour of the congregation did honour to our church.

Mon. 18.—Dr Hamilton brought with him Dr Mono and Dr Gregory. They satisfied me what my duoris was; and told me there was but one method of one. Perhaps but one natural one; but I think God has now than one method of healing either the soul or the body.

In the evening (the weather being still seven) I preached in the new House at Leith, to a lovely audienc, on, 'Narrow is the way that leadeth unto life.' May were present again at five in the morning. How long have we toiled here almost in vain! Yet I cannot be hope God will at length have a people even in this plan.

Wed. 20.—I took my leave of Edinburgh is the morning, by strongly enforcing the Apostle's exhaustion, 'Be careful for nothing; but in every thing by prayer and supplication with thanksgiving let your requests be made known unto God.'

I had designed to preach (as usual) at Provost Dimi, in Haddington, in the way to Dunbar. But the Provost too, had received light from the 'Circular Letter,' midurst not receive those hereties. So we went round by the Marquis of Tweedale's seat, completely familed within and without. But he that took so much deight in it is gone to his long home, and has left it to that has no taste or regard for it. So rolls the world away! In the evening I preached at Dunber. Thur. 21.—I went to the Bass, seven miles from A. which, in the horrid reign of Charles the Second, was the prison of those venerable men who suffered the loss of all things for a good conscience. It is a high rock surrounded by the sea, two or three miles in circumference, and short two miles from the shore. The strong east wind make the water so rough, that the boat could hardly bee: And when we came to the only landing-place, (he other sides being quite perpendicular,) it was with sech difficulty that we got up, climbing on our hands and knees. The castle, as one may judge by what remain was utterly inaccessible. The walls of the chapel, and the governor's house, are tolerably entire. The guides walls are still seen near the top of the rock, with the well in the midst of it. And round the walk there are spots of grass, that feed eighteen or twenty sheep But the proper natives of the island are Solund g a bird about the size of a Muscovy duck, which breek by thousands, from generation to generation, on the sides of the rock. It is peculiar to these, that they by but one egg, which they do not sit upon at all, but keep it under one foot, (as we saw with our eyes,) till it is hatched. How many prayers did the holy men confisci here offer up, in that evil day! And how many thanksgivings should we return, for all the liberty, civil and religious, which we enjoy!

At our return, we walked over the ruins of Tantales. Castle, once the seat of the great Earls of Douglas. The front walls (it was four square) are still standing, and by their vast height and huge thickness, give us a little ides of what it once was. Such is human greatness!

Fri. 22.-We took a view of the famous Roman camp.

esley's works have often been edited. The first collected at after his death) was in 32 vols.; that of 1856-57, the ras in 15 vols. See John's Life by Tyerman (new ed. those by Southey (1830), Miss Wedgwood (1870), Urlin g (1875), Telford (1886), Overton (1891), Kirton, Bevan,

'les Wesley (1707-88) studied at West-(where he was the protector of the Jacobite boy afterwards to be Lord Mansfield) and st Church, Oxford, where he was known as a 'Methodist' early in 1729. But it was not till 1738 that, like his elder brother, he came under the influence of Peter Böhler and 'found rest to his soul.' Though they differed about the ordination of ministers and on other points, Charles was in the main and throughout life an indefatigable lieutenant to his greater brother, becoming an itinerant preacher. In 1771 he settled with his family in London. Though he did vastly less work in prose than John, he is by far the most copious of English hymn-writers, and is also one He is said to have written six of the best. thousand five hundred hymns, the bulk of which were carefully revised and often corrected by John. Many of them are really great religious poetry; amongst the number are the well-known 'Jesu, Lover of my Soul;' 'O for a thousand tongues to sing; 'Hark the herald angels sing;' Love divine, all loves excelling; 'O for a heart to praise my God;' 'O Love divine, how sweet thou art;' 'Gentle Jesus, meek and mild.' 'Come, O thou traveller unknown,' Watts said, too enthusiastically, that it was worth all the hymns he himself had ever written.

The poetical works of the two brothers, edited for the Wesleyan Conference, fill thirteen volumes (1868-72). There are Lives of Charles by Jackson (1841-49) and Telford (1886); of Samuel, the elder brother, by Tyerman (1866); of their mother, by Kirk (1866) and Clark (1886); and of the Wesley family, by Stevenson (1876).

George Whitefield (1714-70), born in the Bell Inn, Gloucester, came to Oxford when the Wesleys had laid the foundations of Methodism, and he became conspicuous for zeal. He took deacon's orders in 1736, and in 1738 joined Wesley in Georgia, returning to be admitted to priest's orders. The religious level of the age was low, and Whitefield found amongst his brethren the most active opposition. But when the parish pulpits were denied him he preached in the open air; and thenceforth spent his life in constant travel and incessant preaching, everywhere moving audiences by his irresistible earnestness and eloquence. About 1741 differences on predestination led to his separation as a strict Calvinist from John Wesley as an Arminian. His supporters now built him a large 'Tabernacle' at Moorfields; and his preaching gathered immense audiences. But he founded no distinct sect, many of his adherents following the Countess of Huntingdon (q.v.) in Wales, and ultimately helping to form the Calvinistic Methodists. The Countess appointed Whitefield her chaplain, and built and endowed many chapels for him. He made seven evangelistic visits to America, and spent the rest of his life in preaching tours through England, Scotland (1741), and Wales. Hume said he was worth travelling twenty miles to hear. He died at Newbury in New England. His writings are strangely tame and commonplace, and sincere admirers regretted that he should have injured his fame by publishing sermons, journals, and letters which, with the Memoir by Gillies, fill seven volumes (1771-72). There are also Lives by Philip (1838), Andrews (1864), Hursta (1860), and Tyerman (1876).

James Hervey (1714-58), rector of Weston-Favell near Northampton, was educated at Oxford and influenced by the Methodist movement. His Meditations among the Tombs, Reflections on a Flower-garden, &c. had an extraordinary sale, and the author is said to have received £700 for the copyright of the first part of his work-a sum he distributed in charity. The Meditations (1745-47; 25th ed. 1791) appealed in prose to the same tastes as Young's Night Thoughts in poetry. Hervey was also author of Theron and Aspasio, or a Series of Letters and Dialogues on the most important Subjects, a marvellously popular work, though there is little real thought or originality, and the substance of the book is largely composed, like the Meditations, of sentimentalism and truisms. He really appreciated the beauties of nature, and his evangelical theology met the temper of the time. His Calvinism exposed him to an assault from John Wesley, who criticised his style as severely as his matter; and Hervey replied in Eleven Letters. He wrote against Bolingbroke; and after his death collections of his letters and sermons were printed, and these, with his works, are comprised in six volumes octavo. Johnson, on one occasion, ridiculed Hervey's Meditations, Boswell could not join in this treatment of the admired volume. 'I am not an impartial judge,' he says, 'for Hervey's Meditations engaged my affections in my early years.' This apology might have been pleaded by many readers, for the Meditations are written in a flowery, ornate style, which used to captivate the young and persons of immature taste. The inflated description and overstrained pathos with which the work abounds render it distasteful to critical readers; but there is no doubt that Hervey's works have served to soothe many an invalid and mourner.

at Kingsclere, Hants, from Winchester passed to New College, Oxford, and became a Fellow in 1722 and professor of Poetry in 1727. Later he was rector of Birchanger and Great Harwood, professor of Modern History (1737), and a prebendary of Durham (1754). He secured Pope's friendship by his Essay on Pope's Odyssey (1727), and began to record Pope's conversation and anecdotes of other friends and notabilities. In 1736 he edited Sackville's Gorboduc, and in 1747 published his Polymetis. He was drowned at Byfleet in Surrey. The standard edition of the Anecdotes is by Singer (1820; 2nd ed. 1858), with Memoir.

Charles Coffey, 'a native of Ireland' who died in 1745, produced nine or ten stage-pieces described as farces, operas, ballad operas, ballad farces, and farcical operas, of which the best known was The Devil to Pay, or the Wives Metamorphosed (1731), on a plot said to have suggested by Sidney's Arcadia.

Abraham Tucker (1705-74), born it don, educated at Merton College, Oxforentered of the Inner Temple, was wealtl unambitious. In 1727 he bought an estat Dorking, where, instead of pursuing the ple of the chase, he devoted himself to philos studies, and under the fictitious name of I Search, wrote The Light of Nature I (7 vols. 1768-78), which Paley said co more original thinking and observation any other work of the kind. Henry Fielding.

ugh modern genealogy declines to connect age of Henry Fielding (1707 54) with the rgs, the passage which Gibbon, in a fraghis Autobiography, gives to the author of nes still remains a splendid compliment. 's father, General Edmund Fielding, was d son of a son of the Earl of Desmond, lder brother was second Earl of Denbigh. her was the daughter of Sir Henry Gould, of Sharpham Park near Glastonbury in t, and a Judge of the King's Bench. At m Park, on the 22nd of April 1707, the ovelist was born. His childhood was spent Stour in Dorsetshire, where other children. rls (for one of them, Sarah, the novelist, 5 417) and a boy, were added to the family. n April 1718, Mrs Fielding died, her eldest about eleven. His education had been , to the tuition of a Mr Oliver of Motcombe, alstaffian proportions and pig-loving pros we are asked to recognise in the Parson r of Joseph Andrews. From Mr Oliver, Fielding passed to Eton, probably as an . Among his schoolfellows were George rds Lord) Lyttelton, Charles Hanbury Wilind Thomas Winnington. According to biographer, Arthur Murphy, he left Eton monly versed in the Greek authors, and an aster of the Latin classics.' After, and on account of, a youthful love-affair with a legis heiress, Miss Sarah Andrew, he was ned to Leyden to study civil law under the l Vitriarius,' and his name is recorded in cs of the university as late as March 1728. is date his father, never a rich man, had again, and the allowance of two hundred he professed to make his eldest son was d. Early in 1728 Henry Fielding was in a tall youth of one-and-twenty, with a ne face, a magnificent constitution, and an d appetite for those pleasures of the town as Gibbon says) are 'within the reach of ian who is regardless of his health, his and his company.' It was lack of pence urned young Fielding speedily to stage on. Already at Leyden, with that bias Cervantes which was to be his lifelong ristic, he had sketched a play called Don in England; and it must have been at that he prepared his first acted comedy, Several Masques. This was produced at ane in February 1728, immediately after Provoked Husband. It obtained some mainly owing to the acting of Anne Oldd perhaps also to the friendly aid of the relative, Lady Mary Wortley Montagu, to t was dedicated. For the next few years continued to produce farces and plays reless rapidity, sometimes under his own ometimes under a pseudonym. None of these has survived as a masterpiece. In comedy he worked an exhausted vein, the 'wit-traps' of Wycherley and Congreve, without rivalling their brilliancy, though certainly not falling below their indelicacy. His best efforts lay in social satire or mock-heroic, and the most notable examples of these are The Author's Farce (1730) and Tom Thumb (1730)—afterwards revised and annotated as The Tragedy of Tragedies—a burlesque in the genre of Buckingham's Rehearsal containing much clever raillery of contemporary tragedies. He also succeeded with two adaptations of Molière, The Mock-Doctor (1732) and The Miser (1733), which latter version obtained the approval of Voltaire. But, as Lady Mary said, he himself would have thrown his work into the fire 'if meat could have been got without money, and money without scribbling.' He never took the stage seriously. Whether he possessed the dramatic faculty or not, his plays are deservedly forgotten; and the 'prolifick Mr Fielding,' as the Prompter called him, made no enduring contribution to dramatic literature.

In the preface to one of the last and hastiest of these performances, The Universal Gallant; or, the Different Husbands, produced at Drury Lane in February 1735, he seems to hint at a family. However this may be, there is at this point a manifest interval in his labours as a playwright, which his biographers have occupied with his marriage. His wife was one of three sisters of Salisbury, and her name was Charlotte Cradock. From her husband's description of her in Tom Jones and Amelia, she must have been as amiable as she was beautiful, and she, moreover, brought him £1500 of that pelf which alone preserved him from producing hurried plays. It is also alleged that concurrently he inherited something from his mother; but this is questionable, as in 1735 his mother had long been dead. In any case, he migrated for the time to East Stour, where his childhood had been spent. Legend has freely gathered around this retreat upon the country, and he has been described as leading the life of a lavish fox-hunting squire, with hounds, liveries, and all the regulation honours. But it is demonstrable that in a twelvemonth he was back again in London, managing the little French theatre in the Haymarket, and running there a Lucianic satire on the times called Pasquin. This was a considerable success, and it was followed in 1737 by a similar effort, The Historical Register for the Year 1736. The Historical Register was inferior to Pasquin, but its strokes at Walpole are believed to have aided in precipitating the severe Licensing Act of 1737, which, among other vexatious restrictions, made the consent of the Lord Chamberlain an indispensable preliminary to the production of any play. Its passing was fatal to Fielding's 'scandal shop,' as the Haymarket had come to be popularly called, and it effectually terminated his efforts to 'ridicule Vice and Imposture' through the medium of the stage. His own admission, in later life, that he left off playwriting when he ought to have begun, may be taken to indicate that he himself fully appreciated the haphazard and premature character of his achievement in this kind. Yet it may be reasonably doubted whether, even with wider experience and larger leisure, he would ever have excelled in pure comedy. His satiric and ironic gifts were better employed in the vocation he eventually adopted.

In 1737 he was in his thirty-first year, and on the 1st of November he was admitted a student of the Middle Temple, being still described as of East Stour. For the next three years, or until he was called to the Bar in June 1740, we know but little of his life. His biographers speak of political tracts; and he certainly worked with James Ralph—the Ralph who 'howls to Cynthia' in the Dunciad—upon two volumes of the 'Spectator' essays known as the Champion (1739-40). Then, in November of the latter year, appeared Richardson's Pamela. The origin of this book has been sufficiently discussed in speaking of its author; it remains to trace its connection with the work of Fielding, to whose manly, if somewhat coarsegrained, common-sense, nourished in the school of Molière and Cervantes, its opportunist morality seemed particularly nauseous. Probably to amuse himself at first, and also to work off an obscure but long-standing grudge against the author of another success of 1740, the Apology of the actur Colley Cibber, Fielding presently set about a burlesque of Pamela, intended to combine the manners of Cibber and Richardson. By a happy stroke of the pen, he turned the "Squire B'd" Pamela into "Squire Booby," and, inventing a brother for Richardson's heroine, exhibited in exposed to the solicitations of the 'Squire's and by marriage, a dissolute woman of quality. The scenes resulting from this beginning are the less pleasing of Joseph Andrews. But at the end of the second chapter the author introduced Parss Adams, and, quickly warming to his task, som discarded his original plan. After Chapter 1. the book became practically what it professes w be in its full title-namely, The History of the Adventures of Joseph Andrews, and his Frial Mr Abraham Adams: Written in Imitation of the Manner of Cervantes. That is to say, it became the first example of a till-then-unattempted type d English Novel. For not only by its 'Character of perfect Simplicity,' the absent-minded fingusnapping, Æschylus-loving' clergyman, did it all a new portrait to the perpetual National Portrait Gallery of English Literature, but it inaugunted a new method in fiction which its author style the 'comic Epic-Poem in Prose.' In a lengthy Preface, which was probably an afterthought, or perhaps, to speak more accurately, a premontion of something different from his first idea which had gradually dawned upon him during the progress of the volumes, Fielding develops his theory. His aim, he says in effect, was to produce something which should differ from serious romance, not only by its substitution of 'light and ridiculous' incidents for 'grave and solema' ones, but by its admission among its dramatis personæ of characters of inferior rank, and by its employment of ludicrous and even burlesque diction in place of elevated language. These characteristics, partly present in Joseph Andrews, were to receive fuller exemplification in his next novel, Tom Jones (see also above at page 7).

Meanwhile, the reception accorded to Joseph Andrews, although encouraging, was not sufficient to make the author's fortune, or even to supplement materially the meagre income he derived from his profession. He brought out a farce, Miss Lucy in Town, in which he had a collaborator; he projected with the Rev. William Young, the reputed original of Parson Adams, & translation of Aristophanes, which got no farther than one play; he issued, by subscription, three volumes of Miscellanies, which, among other things, included a youthful comedy, The Wedding Deg. This Garrick produced in 1743, with Mrs Woffing. ton for heroine. But the most important items is the Miscellanies, after deduction of a good deal of occasional verse and prose, were a Lucianic fragitled 'A Journey from this World to the d (occupying the entire third volume) the le exercise in sustained irony known as ory of the Life of the late Mr Jonathan . A ; by the interest of his old schoolfellow to whom he was already much indebted o Tom Jones), Fielding was appointed a f the Peace for Middlesex and Westand took up his abode in Bow Street, arden. A month or two later still, on the 'ebruary 1749, was published the famous rom Jones.

'istory of Tom Jones, a Foundling, is masterpiece. The old tradition that he is a Bow Street magistrate is exploded, Thousands of Hours' he spent in its comad probably been dispersed over most of al which had elapsed between the publithe Miscellanies and the date of its issue.

Some of it had no doubt been penned at the Lyttelton seat of Hagley; some at Prior Park, the home, near Bath, of Ralph Allen, the benevolent Allworthy of the book. In Tom Jones, Fielding set himself deliberately to perfect the 'comic Epic-Poem in Prose' as he had conceived it during the progress of Joseph Andrews. Besides making it three times as long, he paid much closer attention to the evolution of the put, which still, with some reservations as to hurry at the close, remains a model in its way. In place of a general critical 'Introduction,' he inserted at the beginning of each book one of those delightful 'prolegomenous' Essays, in which, ever and anon, as George Eliot says, 'he seems to bring his arm-chair to the proscenium and chat with us in all the lusty ease of his fine English'—that English by which, in the words of another admirer, 'one seems to be carried along, like a swimmer in a strong, clear stream, trusting one's self to every whirl and eddy, with a feeling of safety, of comfort, or delightful ease in the motion of the elastic water.' The book, indeed, has no one character which can quite compete with Parson Abraham Adams. But it has a dozen which are admirably wrought. Squire Western first; Partridge the barber; the philosopher Square; Thwackum, his rival; Miss Western, Miss Bridget Allworthy, Lady Bellaston, Mrs Honour, the lady's-maid—all these are living and moving human beings. It is true that the morality of certain incidents—the scene at Upton, the Bellaston episode which roused the ire of Colonel Newcome—has not passed unchallenged. Probably Mr Lowell's contention that these passages -an inconsiderable portion, after all, in a lengthy novel-shock rather than corrupt will eventually obtain; and it is a defence which cannot always be advanced in favour of some of the performances of Fielding's modern descendants. Pour qui sait lire, Tom Jones must remain, for experience of life, observation of character, invention, humour, irony, and inexhaustible humanity, one of the finest specimens of the English novel of manners. Its author himself never excelled it, nor could he; for, as a French critic observes, it is the summary and abstract of an entire existence.

In 1749 Fielding had but five years to live. He was still poor, and his income of £300 as a Westminster Justice was some 'of the dirtiest money upon earth.' He seems, nevertheless, to have been zealous and efficient in his office; and one at least of his pamphlets, the Enquiry into the Increase of Robbers (1751), is to this day recognised as authoritative by political economists. But the work which most concerns literature is his third novel, Amelia, also published in 1751. In its central character, as in the Sophia Western of Tom Jones, he delineates his beautiful first wife, whose goodness and forbearance were still a cherished recollection. Written in the intervals of a wearisome and exacting profession, Amelia has little of the leisurely qualities of Tom Jones, nor has it the same fundamental richness of material. Moreover, it is preoccupied to an exceptional extent with the social problems, prison discipline and what not, which were daily obtruding themselves on the writer's attention. These drawbacks admitted, it has other qualities which have led some to prefer it to the earlier book. Amelia herself, whom even that sturdy Richardsonian, Dr Johnson, declared to be "the most pleasing heroine of all the romances," is a delightful type of generous, unselfish womanhood; and many of the subordinate characters-Dr Harrison, Colonel Bath, Mrs Bennet-are only second, if second, to the Tom Jones gallery. After Amelia, Fielding's chief efforts of moment were the Covent Garden Journal (1752); another pamphlet, the Proposal for the Poor (1753); and a pamphlet on Elizabeth Canning. At the end of June 1754, worn out with the labours of his office, and utterly broken in constitution, he started for Lisbon, like Peterborough and Doddridge before him, in the forlorn hope of finding health. He reached his destination on the 14th of August. Two months later, on the 8th of October 1754, he died, and was buried in the English cemetery on the Estrella. Luget Britannia gremio non dari Fovere natum is inscribed upon his tomb. The story of his tedious and painfully prolonged journey to the Portuguese capital is related in a touching posthumous tract published by Andrew Millar in February 1755, together with a fragment of a Comment on the Essays of Bolingbroke, which Mallet had issued in March of the previous year. Long after Fielding's death, in 1778, was produced at Drury Lane a play called The Fathers; or, The Goodnatured Man. It was printed, and ran for a few nights, but has never been revived.

The only trustworthy portrait of Fielding is that prefixed to Murphy's edition of his works (1762). It was drawn from memory by Hogarth, whom he had known, and whom he greatly admired. Of his life, as may have been gathered from the above, but few authentic particulars remain. Not more than three or four, of his letters have been preserved; while modern research, by disposing of much merely picturesque tradition, has appreciably reduced the scanty body of material upon which his first biographers based their labours. It is now generally admitted that the reckless Bohemianism attributed to his youth was not continued in middle age, though he was at no time of a temper to grow either rich or careful. But in spite of ill-health and uncertain means, he retained to the end his joy of life; and his hopefulness was as inveterate as his improvidence. He was a loving father and a kind husband; he exerted his last energies in philanthropy and benevolence; he expended his last ink in defence of Christianity; and he went to a foreign grave with the fortitude of a hero and the resignation of a philosopher.

Her arms, and begs his stay;
My dear, it rains, and hails, and snows,
You will not hunt to-day.
But a hunting we will go,

A brushing fox in yonder wood,
Secure to find we seek;
For why, I carry'd, sound and good,
A cartload there last week.
And a hunting we will go.

Away he goes, he flies the rout,

Their steeds all spur and switch;

Some are thrown in, and some thrown out

And some thrown in the ditch:

But a hunting we will go.

At length his strength to faintness worn, Poor Renard ceases flight; Then hungry, homeward we return, To feast away the night: Then a drinking we will go.

An Interview between Parson Adams a Parson Trulliber.

Parson Adams came to the house of Parson Tr whom he found stripped in to his waistcoat. apron on, and a pail in his hand, just come from his hogs; for Mr Trulliber was a parson on Sund all the other six might more properly be called a He occupied a small piece of land of his own, which he rented a considerable deal more. It milked his cows, managed his dairy, and follow markets with butter and eggs. The hogs fell cl his care, which he carefully waited on at hor attended to fairs; on which occasion he was I many jokes, his own size being, with much ale, r little inferior to that of the beasts he sold. I indeed, one of the largest men you should see, as have acted the part of Sir John Falstaff without Add to this, that the rotundity of his bells w reased by the shortness of his stature, his ding very near as far in height when he lay as when he stood on his legs. His voice 1 hoarse, and his accents extremely broad; the whole, he had a stateliness in his gait, lked, not unlike that of a goose, only he r.

er being informed that somebody wanted to tim, immediately slipped off his apron, and alf in an old night-gown, being the dress in vays saw his company at home. His wife, thim of Mr Adams's arrival, had made a e; for she had told her husband, 'She beas a man come for some of his hogs.' This nade Mr Trulliber hasten with the utmost attend his guest. He no sooner saw not in the least doubting the cause of his what his wife had imagined, he told him me in very good time; that he expected a very afternoon;' and added, 'they were all and upwards of twenty score apiece.'

wered, 'he believed he did not know him.' ried Trulliber, 'I have seen you often at 'e have dealt before now, mun, I warrant es,' cries he: 'I remember thy face very n't mention a word more till you have seen I have never sold thee a flitch of such now in the stye.' Upon which, he laid on Adams, and dragged him into the hogs'-ras indeed but two steps from his parlour-ley were no sooner arrived there, than he Do but handle them: step in, friend, art landle them, whether dost buy or no.' At, opening the gate, he pushed Adams into insisting on it that he should handle them uld talk one word with him.

hose natural complaisance was beyond any sobliged to comply before he was suffered imself; and, laying hold of one of their nruly beast gave such a sudden spring, w poor Adams all along in the mire. tead of assisting him to get up, burst into nd, entering the stye, said to Adams, with pt, 'Why, dost not know how to handle a vas going to lay hold of one himself; but thought he had carried his complaisance far no sooner on his legs, than he escaped out of the animals, and cried out, 'Nihil habeo I am a clergyman, sir, and am not come to Trulliber answered, 'he was sorry for the that he must blame his wife: adding, 'she ind always committed blunders.' He then o walk in and clean himself, that he would p the stye, and follow him. Adams desired his great coat, wig, and hat by the fire, iber granted. Mrs Trulliber would have a basin of water to wash his face, but her her be quiet like a fool as she was, or she it more blunders; and then directed Adams While Adams was thus employed, Trulving no great respect for the appearance , fastened the parlour-door, and now coninto the kitchen; telling him he believed ink would do him no harm, and whispered draw a little of the worst ale. , Adams said, 'I fancy, sir, you already perceive me to be a clergyman.'- 'Ay, ay,' cries Trulliber, grinning, 'I perceive you have some cassock: I will not venture to caale it a whole one.' Adams answered, it was, indeed, none of the best; but he had the misfortune to tear it about ten years ago in passing over a stile. Mrs Trulliber, returning with the drink, told her husband 'she fancied the gentleman was a traveller, and that he would be glad to eat a bit.' Trulliber bid her 'hold her impertinent tongue,' and asked her, 'if parsons used to travel without horses; 'adding, 'he supposed the gentleman had none, by his having no boots on.'- 'Yes, sir, yes,' says Adams; 'I have a horse, but I have left him behind me.'--'I am glad to hear you have one,' says Trulliber; 'for I assure you I don't love to see clergymen on foot; it is not seemly, nor suiting the dignity of the cloth.' Here Trulliber made a long oration on the dignity of the cloth (or rather gown), not much worth relating, till his wife had spread the table, and set a mess of porridge on it for his breakfast. He then said to Adams, 'I don't know, friend, how you came to caale on me: however, as you are here, if you think proper to eat a morsel, you may.' Adams accepted the invitation, and the two parsons sat down together; Mrs Trulliber waiting behind her husband's chair, as was, it seems, her custom. Trulliber ate heartily, but scarce put anything in his mouth without finding fault with his wife's cookery. All which the poor woman bore patiently. Indeed, she was so absolute an admirer of her husband's greatness and importance, of which she had frequent hints from his own mouth, that she almost carried her adoration to an opinion of his infallibility. To say the truth, the parson had exercised her more ways than one: and the pious woman had been so well edified by her husband's sermons, that she had resolved to receive the good things of this world together with the bad. She had indeed been at first a little contentious; but he had long since got the better; partly by her love for this, partly by her fear of that; partly by her religion; partly by the respect he paid himself, and partly by that which he received from the parish: she had, in short, absolutely submitted, and now worshipped her husband, as Sarah did Abraham, calling him not lord, but master. Whilst they were at table, her husband gave her a fresh example of his greatness; for as she had just delivered a cup of ale to Adams, he snatched it out of his hand, and crying out, 'I caal'd vurst,' swallowed down the ale. Adams denied it; it was referred to the wife, who, though her conscience was on the side of Adams, durst not give it against her husband. Upon which he said, 'No, sir, no: I should not have been so rude to have taken it from you, if you had caal'd vurst; but I'd have you know I'm a better man than to suffer the best he in the kingdom to drink before me in my own house, when I caale vurst.

As soon as their breakfast was ended, Adams began in the following manner: 'I think, sir, it is high time to inform you of the business of my embassy. I am a traveller, and am passing this way in company with two young people, a lad and a damsel, my parishioners, towards my own cure: we stopped at a house of hospitality in the parish, where they directed me to you, as having the cure.'—'Though I am but a curate,' says Trulliber, 'I believe I am as warm as the vicar himself, or perhaps the rector of the next parish too: I believe I could buy them both.'—'Sir,' cries Adams, 'I rejoice thereat. Now, sir, my business is, that we are by various accidents stripped of our money, and are not able to pay our reckoning, being seven shillings. I therefore request you to assist me with the loan of those seven shillings, and also seven shillings more, which, peradventure, I shall return to you; but if not, I am convinced you will joyfully embrace such an opportunity of laying up a treasure in a better place than any this world affords.'

Suppose a stranger, who entered the chambers of a lawyer, being imagined a client, when the lawyer was preparing his palm for the fee, should pull out a writ against him. Suppose an apothecary, at the door of a chariot containing some great doctor of eminent skill, should, instead of directions to a patient, present him with a potion for himself. Suppose a minister should, instead of a good round sum, treat my lord --, or Esq. ---, with a good broomstick. Suppose a civil companion, or a led captain, should, instead of virtue, and honour, and beauty, and parts, and admiration, thunder vice and infamy, and ugliness, and folly, and contempt, in his patron's ears. Suppose, when a tradesman first carries in his bill, the man of fashion should pay it; or suppose, if he did so, the tradesman should abate what he had overcharged on the supposition of waiting. In short,-suppose what you will, you never can nor will suppose anything equal to the astonishment which seized on Trulliber, as soon as Adams had ended his speech. A while he rolled his eyes in silence, sometimes surveying Adams, then his wife; then casting them on the ground, then lifting them to heaven. At last he burst forth in the following accents :-

'Sir, I believe I know where to lay my little treasure up as well as another: I thank G-, if I am not so warm as some, I am content; that is a blessing greater than riches; and he to whom that is given need ask no more. To be content with a little, is greater than to possess the world; which a man may possess without being so. Lay up my treasure! what matters where a man's treasure is, whose heart is in the Scriptures? there is the treasure of a Christian.' At these words the water ran from Adams's eyes; and, catching Trulliber by the hand in a rapture, 'Brother,' says he, 'Heavens bless the accident by which I came to see you; I would have walked many a mile to have communed with you; and believe me, I will shortly pay you a second visit: but my friends, I fancy, by this time wonder at my stay, so let me have the money immediately.' Trulliber then put on a stern look, and cried out, 'Thou dost not intend to rob me?' At which the wife, bursting into tears, fell on her knees, and roared out, 'O dear sir! for heaven's sake don't rob my master: we are but poor people.'-- 'Get up for a fool as thou art, and go about thy business,' said Trulliber: 'dost think the man will venture his life? he is a beggar, and no robber.'- 'Very true, indeed,' answered Adams. 'I wish with all my heart the tithingman was here,' cries Trulliber: 'I would have thee punished as a vagabond for thy impudence. Fourteen shillings indeed! I won't give thee a farthing. believe thou art no more a clergyman than the woman there' (pointing to his wife); 'but if thou art, dost deserve to have thy gown stripped over thy shoulders, for running about the country in such a manner.'- 'I forgive your suspicions,' says Adams: 'but suppose I am not a clergyman, I am nevertheless thy brother; and thou, as a Christian, much more as a clergyman, art obliged to relieve my distress.' 'Dost preach to me?'

replied Trulliber: 'dost pretend to instruct me in my duty?'-- 'Ifacks, a good story,' cries Mrs Trulliber, 'to preach to my master!'—'Silence, woman,' cries Tralliber: 'I would have thee know, friend' (addressing himself to Adams), 'I shall not learn my duty from sach as thee; I know what charity is, better than to give to vagabonds.'- Besides, if we were inclined, the poor's rate obliges us to give so much charity,' cries the wife. 'Pugh! Thou art a fool. Poor's rate! hold thy nonsense,' answered Trulliber; and then, turning to Adams, he told him, he would give him nothing. 'I am sorry,' answered Adams, 'that you do know what charity is, since you practise it no better; I must tell you if you trust to your knowledge for your justification, you will find yourself deceived, though you should add faith to it, without good works.'- 'Fellow,' cries Trulliber, 'dost thou speak against faith in my house? Get out of my doors: I will no longer remain under the same roof with a wretch who speaks wantonly of faith and the Scriptures.'-'Name not the Scriptures,' says Adams. 'How! not name the Scriptures! Do you disbelieve the Scriptures?' cries Trulliber. 'No; but you do,' answered Adams, 'if I may reason from your practice; for their commands are so explicit, and their rewards and punishments so immense, that it is impossible a man should steadfastly believe, without obeying. Now there is no command more express, no duty more frequently enjoined, than charity. Whoever, therefore, is void of charity, I make no scruple of pronouncing that he is no Christian.'- 'I would not advise thee,' says Trulliber, 'to say that I am no Christian: I won't take it of you; for I believe I am as good a man as thyself; (and, indeed, though he was now rather too corpulent for athletic exercises, he had, in his youth, been one of the best boxers and cudgel-players in the county). His wife, seeing him clench his fist, interposed, and begged him not to fight, but show himself a true Christian, and take the law of him. As nothing could provoke Adams to strike, but an absolute assault on himself or his friend, be smiled at the angry look and gestures of Trulliber: and, telling him he was sorry to see such men in orders, departed without further ceremony.

Wild proceeds to the Highest Consummation of Human Greatness,

At length the morning came, which Fortune at his birth had resolutely ordained for the consummation of our hero's GREATNESS: he had, himself, indeed, modestly declined the public honours she intended him, and had taken a quantity of laudanum, in order to retire quietly off the stage; but we have already observed in the course of our wonderful history, that to struggle against this lady's decrees is vain and impotent: and whether she hath determined you shall be hanged or be a prime minister, it is, in either case, lost labour to resist Laudanum, therefore, being unable to stop the breath of our hero, which the fruit of hemp-seed, and not the spirit of poppy-seed, was to overcome, he was, at the usual hour, attended by the proper gentleman appointed for that purpose, and acquainted that the cart was ready. On this occasion he exerted that greatness of courage, which hath been so much celebrated in other heroes; and knowing it was impossible to resist, he gravely declared, he would attend them. He then descended to that room where the fetters of great men are knocked off, in a most solemn and ceremonious manner. Then shaking hands with his friends (to-wit, those who were conducting him to the tree), and drinking their healths in a bumper of brandy, he ascended the cart, where he was no sooner seated, than he received the acclamations of the multitude, who were highly ravished with his GREATNESS.

The cart now moved slowly on, being preceded by a troop of horse-guards bearing javelins in their hands, through streets lined with crowds, all admiring the great behaviour of our hero, who rode on sometimes sighing, sometimes swearing, sometimes singing or whistling, as his humour varied.

When he came to the tree of glory, he was welcomed with an universal shout of the people, who were there assembled in prodigious numbers, to behold a sight much more rare in populous cities than one would reasonably imagine it should be, viz. the proper catastrophe of a great man.

But though envy was, through fear, obliged to join the general voice in applause on this occasion, there were not wanting some who maligned this completion of glory, which was now about to be fulfilled to our hero, and endeavoured to prevent it by knocking him on the head as he stood under the tree, while the ordinary was performing his last office. They therefore began to batter the cart with stones, brick-bats, dirt, and all manner of mischievous weapons, some of which erroneously playing on the robes of the ecclesiastic, made him so expeditious in his repetition, that, with wonderful alacrity, he had ended almost in an instant, and conveyed himself into a place of safety in a hackney coach, where he waited the conclusion with the temper of mind described in these verses:

Suave mari magno, turbantibus æquora ventis, E terra alterius magnum spectare laborem.

We must not, however, omit one circumstance, as it serves to show the most admirable conservation of character in our hero to his last moment, which was, that whilst the ordinary was busy in his ejaculations, Wild, in the midst of the shower of stones, &c., which played upon him, applied his hands to the parson's pocket, and emptied it of his bottle-screw, which he carried out of the world in his hand.

The ordinary being now descended from the cart, Wild had just opportunity to cast his eyes around the crowd, and to give them a hearty curse, when immediately the horses moved on, and with universal applause our hero swung out of this world.

Thus fell Jonathan Wild the GREAT, by a death as glorious as his life had been, and which was so truly agreeable to it, that the latter must have been deplorably maimed and imperfect without the former; a death which hath been alone wanting to complete the characters of several ancient and modern heroes, whose histories would then have been read with much greater pleasure by the wisest in all ages. Indeed, we could almost wish, that whenever Fortune seems wantonly to deviate from her purpose, and leaves her work imperfect in this particular, the historian would indulge himself in the licence of poetry and romance, and even do a violence to truth, to oblige his reader with a page, which must be the most delightful in all his history, and which could never fail of producing an instructive moral.

Narrow minds may possibly have some reason to be ashamed of going this way out of the world, if their consciences can fly in their faces, and assure them they have not merited such an honour; but he must be a fool who is ashamed of being hanged, who is not weak enough to be ashamed of having deserved it.

(From Jonathan Wild, Book iv. Chap. 14.)

Of the Serious in Writing, and the Initial Essays in 'Tom Jones.'

Peradventure there may be no parts in this prodigious work which will give the reader less pleasure in the perusing, than those which have given the author the greatest pains in composing. Among these probably may be reckoned those initial essays which we have prefixed to the historical matter contained in every book; and which we have determined to be essentially necessary to this kind of writing, of which we have set ourselves at the head.

For this our determination we do not hold ourselves strictly bound to assign any reason: it being abundantly sufficient that we have laid it down as a rule necessary to be observed in all prosai-comi-epic writing. Who ever demanded the reasons of that nice unity of time or place which is now established to be so essential to dramatic poetry? What critic hath been ever asked why a play may not contain two days as well as one, or why the audience (provided they travel like electors without any expense) may not be wasted fifty miles as well as five? Hath any commentator well accounted for the limitation which an ancient critic hath set to the drama, which he will have contain neither more nor less than five acts? Or hath anyone living altempted to explain, what the modern judges of our theatres mean by that word low; by which they have happily succeeded in banishing all humour from the stage, and have made the theatre as dull as a drawing-room? Upon all these occasions, the world seems to have embraced a maxim of our law, viz., Cuicunque in arte sua perito credendum est: for it seems, perhaps, difficult to conceive that anyone should have had enough of impudence, to lay down dogmatical rules in any art or science without the least foundation. In such cases, therefore, we are apt to conclude, there are sound and good reasons at the bottom, though we are unfortunately not able to see so far.

Now, in reality, the world have paid too great a compliment to critics, and have imagined them men of much greater profundity than they really are. From this complaisance, the critics have been emboldened to assume a dictatorial power, and have so far succeeded, that they are now become the masters, and have the assurance to give laws to those authors, from whose predecessors they originally received them.

The critic, rightly considered, is no more than the clerk, whose office it is to transcribe the rules and laws laid down by those great judges, whose vast strength of genius hath placed them in the light of legislators, in the several sciences over which they presided. This office was all which the critics of old aspired to, nor did they ever dare to advance a sentence, without supporting it by the authority of the judge from whence it was borrowed.

But in process of time, and in ages of ignorance, the clerk began to invade the power and assume the dignity of his master. The laws of writing were no longer founded on the practice of the author, but on the dictates of the critic. The clerk became the legislator, and those very peremptorily gave laws, whose business it was, at nrst, only to transcribe them.

Hence arose an obvious, and, perhaps, an unavoidable error: For these critics being men of shallow capacities. very easily mistook mere form for substance. acted as a judge would, who should adhere to the lifeless letter of law and reject the spirit. Little circumstances which were, perhaps, accidental in a great author, were, by these critics, considered to constitute his chief merit, and transmitted as essentials to be observed by all his successors. To these encroachments, time and ignorance, the two great supporters of imposture, gave authority; and thus, many rules for good writing have been established, which have not the least foundation in truth or nature, and which commonly serve for no other purpose than to curb and restrain genius, in the same manner as it would have restrained the dancing-master, had the many excellent treatises on that art laid it down as an essential rule, that every man must dance in chains.

To avoid, therefore, all imputation of laying down a rule for posterity, founded only on the authority of ipse dixit, for which, to say the truth, we have not the profoundest veneration: we shall here waive the privilege above contended for, and proceed to lay before the reader, the reasons which have induced us to intersperse these several digressive essays in the course of this work.

And here we shall of necessity be led to open a new vein of knowledge, which, if it hath been discovered, hath not, to our remembrance, been wrought on by any ancient or modern writer. This vein is no other than that of contrast, which runs through all the works of the creation, and may, probably, have a large share in constituting in us the idea of all beauty, as well natural as artificial; for what demonstrates the beauty and excellence of anything but its reverse? Thus the beauty of day and that of summer, is set off by the horrors of night and winter. And I believe, if it was possible for a man to have seen only the two former, he would have a very imperfect idea of their beauty.

But to avoid too serious an air. Can it be doubted, but that the finest woman in the world would lose all benefit of her charms in the eye of a man who had never seen one of another cast? The ladies themselves seem so sensible of this, that they are all industrious to procure foils, nay, they will become foils to themselves; for I have observed (at Bath particularly) that they endeavour to appear as ugly as possible in the morning, in order to set off that beauty which they intend to show you in the evening.

Most artists have this secret in practice, though some, perhaps, have not much studied the theory. The jeweller knows that the finest brilliant requires a foil, and the painter, by the contrast of his figures, often acquires great applause.

A great genius among us will illustrate this matter fully. I cannot, indeed, range him under any general head of common artists, as he hath a title to be placed among those

- 'Inventas, qui vitam excoluere per artes.'
- 'Who by invented arts have life improv'd.'

I mean here the inventor of that most exquisite entertainment called the English pantomime.

This entertainment consisted of two parts, which the inventor distinguished by the names of the serious and the comic. The serious exhibited a certain number of heathen gods and heroes, who were certainly the war and dullest company into which an audience was entitle introduced; and (which was a secret known to few) were actually intended so to be, in order to contrast the common part of the entertainment, and to display the tricks of harlequin to the better advantage.

This was, perhaps, no very civil use of such personages; but the contrivance was, nevertheless, ingenious enough, and had its effect. And this will now plainly appear, if instead of serious and comic, we supply the words duller and dullest; for the comic was certainly duller than anything before shown on the stage, and could only be set off by that superlative degree of duness, which composed the serious. So intolerably serious, indeed, were these gods and heroes, that harlouis (though the English gentleman of that name is not at all related to the French family, for he is of a mach more serious disposition) was always welcome on the stage, as he relieved the audience from worse company.

Judicious writers have always practised this art of contrast, with great success. I have been surprised that Horace should cavil at this art in Homer; but indeed he contradicts himself in the very next line.

- 'Indignor quandoque bonus dormitat Homerus, Verum operi longo fas est obripere somnum.'
- 'I grieve if e'er great Homer chance to sleep, Yet slumbers on long works have right to creep.'

For we are not here to understand, as, perhaps, some have, that an author actually falls asleep while he is writing. It is true that readers are too apt to be so overtaken; but if the work was as long as any of Oldmixon, the author himself is too well entertained to be subject to the least drowsiness. He is, as Mr Pope observes,

'Sleepless himself, to give his readers sleep.'

To say the truth, these soporific parts are so many scenes of serious artfully interwoven, in order to contrast and set off the rest; and this is the true meaning of a late facetious writer, who told the public, that whenever he was dull, they might be assured there was a design in it.

In this light then, or rather in this darkness, I would have the reader to consider these initial essays. And after this warning, if he shall be of opinion that he can find enough of serious in other parts of this history, he may pass over these, in which we profess to be labouriously dull, and begin the following books at the second chapter. (From Tom Yones, Book v. Chap. 1.)

Partridge on Courage.

At length Jones, being weary of soliloquy, addressed himself to his companion, and blamed him for his taciturnity; for which the poor man very honestly accounted, from his fear of giving offence. And now, this fear being pretty well removed by the most absolute promises of indemnity, Partridge again took the bridle from his tongue; which perhaps rejoiced no less at regaining its liberty, than a young colt, when the bridle is slipt from his neck, and he is turned loose into the pastures.

As Partridge was inhibited from that topic which would have first suggested itself, he fell upon that which was next uppermost in his mind, namely, the Man of the Hill. 'Certainly, sir,' says he, 'that could never be a man, who dresses himself, and lives after such a strange manner, and so unlike other folks. Besides, his diet, as the old woman told me, is chiefly upon herbs, which is a fitter food for a horse than a Christian: may, landlord at Upton says, that the neighbours thereabouts have very fearful notions about him. It runs strangely in my head, that it must have been some spirit, who perhaps might be sent to forewarn us; and who knows but all that matter which he told us, of his going to fight, and of his being taken prisoner, and of the great danger he was in of being hanged, might be intended as a warning to us, considering what we are going about: besides, I dreamt of nothing all last night, but of fighting: and methought the blood ran out of my nose as liquor out of a tap. Indeed, sir, infandum, regina, jubes renovare absorve.'

'Thy story, Partridge,' answered Jones, 'is almost as ill applied as thy Latin. Nothing can be more likely to happen than death to men who go into battle. Perhaps we shall both fall in it,—and what then?' 'What then!' replied Partridge: 'Why then there is an end of us, is there not? when I am gone, all is over with me. What matters the cause to me, or who gets the victory, if I am killed? I shall never enjoy any advantage from it. What are all the ringing of bells, and bonfires, to one that is six foot under ground? there will be an end of poor Partridge.' 'And an end of poor Partridge,' cries Jones, 'there must be one time or other. If you love Latin, I will repeat you some fine lines out of Horace, which would inspire courage into a coward.

"Dulce et decorum est pro patria mori.

Mors et sugacem persequitur virum

Nec parcit imbellis juventæ

Poplitibus, timidoque tergo."

'I wish you would construe them,' cries Partridge; for Horace is a hard author, and I cannot understand as you repeat them.'

'I will repeat you a bad imitation or rather paraphrase of my own,' said Jones: 'for I am but an indifferent poet.

"Who would not die in his dear country's cause! Since, if base fear his dastard step withdraws, From death he cannot fly.—One common grave Receives, at last, the coward and the brave."

'That's very certain,' cries Partridge. Mors omnibus communis: but there is a great difference between dying in one's bed a great many years hence, like a good Christian, with all our friends crying about us, and being shot to-day or to-morrow, like a mad dog; or perhaps hacked in twenty pieces with a sword, and that too before we have repented of all our sins. O Lord, have mercy upon us! to be sure the soldiers are a wicked kind of people. I never loved to have any thing to do with them. I could hardly bring myself ever to look upon them as Christians. There is nothing but cursing and swearing among them. I wish your honour would repent: I heartily wish you would repent, before it is too late, and not think of going among them. -Evil communication corrupts good manners. That is my principal reason. For, as for that matter, I am no more afraid than another man, not I; as to matter of that, I know all human flesh must die, but yet a man may live many years for all that. Why, I am a middle aged man now, and yet I may live a great number of years. I have read of several who have lived to be above a hundred, and some a great deal above a hundred. Not that I hope, I mean that I promise myself, to live to any such age as that neither.—But, if it be only to eighty or ninety, Heaven be praised, that is a great way off yet; and I am not afraid of dying then, no more than another man: but surely to attempt death before a man's time is come, seems to be downright wickedness and presumption. Besides, if it was to do any good indeed; but let the cause be what it will, what mighty matter of good can two people do? and for my part, I understand nothing of it. I never fired off a gun above ten times in my life; and then it was not charged with bullets. And for the sword, I never learned to fence, and know nothing of the matter. And then there are those cannons, which certainly it must be thought the highest presumption to go in the way of, and nobody but a madman—I ask pardon; upon my soul I meant no harm; I beg I may not throw your honour into another passion.'

'Be under no apprehension, Partridge,' cries Jones;
'I am now so well convinced of thy cowardice, that thou couldst not provoke me on any account.' 'Your honour,' answered he, 'may call me a coward, or any thing else you please. If loving to sleep in a whole shim makes a man a coward, non immunes ab illis malis sumus. I never read in my grammar, that a man can't be a good man without fighting. Vir bonus est quis?
Qui consulta patrum, qui leges juraque servat. Not a word of fighting; and I am sure the scripture is so much against it, that a man shall never persuade me he is a good Christian, while he sheds Christian blood.'

Opening of 'The Journal of a Voyage to Lisbon.'

Wednesday, June 26, 1754.—On this day, the most melancholy sun I had ever beheld arose, and found me awake at my house at Fordhook. By the light of this sun I was, in my own opinion, last to behold and take leave of some of those creatures on whom I doted with a mother-like fondness, guided by nature and passion, and uncured and unhardened by all the doctrine of that philosophical school where I had learned to bear pains and to despise death.

In this situation, as I could not conquer nature, I submitted entirely to her, and she made as great fool of me as she had ever done of any woman whatsoever: under pretence of giving me leave to enjoy, she drew me into suffer the company of my little ones, during eight hours; and I doubt whether in that time I did not undergo more than in all my distemper.

At twelve precisely my coach was at the door, which was no sooner told me, than I kissed my children round, and went into it with some little resolution. My wife, who behaved more like a heroine and philosopher, though at the same time the tenderest mother in the world, and my eldest daughter, followed me; some friends went with us, and others here took their leave; and I heard my behaviour applauded, with many murmurs and praises to which I well knew I had no title; as all other such philosophers may, if they have any modesty, confess on the like occasions.

The connection of the Denbighs and the Hapsburgs is discussed by Mr J. H. Round at pp. 216-49 of his Studies in Peerage and Family History (1901); and his conclusions have been adopted by Burke. It has been suggested (Thomson's Richardson, 1900, p. 38) that the Apology for the Life of Mrs Shamela Andrews (1741) should be added to the works of Fielding. Richardson believed Fielding to be the author (Corr. 1804, iv. 286); and there is some internal evidence—notably, the fact that, both in Shamela and Joseph Andrews, the 'Mr B.' of Pamela is converted into 'Mr Booby'—which supports this belief. But hitherto the book has not been claimed for Fielding by Fielding's biographers.

Fielding's 'Works' were first published in 1762 in 4to and 8vo by Andrew Millar, with an Essay on his Life and Genius by Arthur Murphy. In 1821 the novels appeared in Ballantyne's Novelist's Library, with a biographical sketch by Sir Walter Scott. In 1882 an édition de luxe in ten volumes was published by Messrs Smith and Elder, with a prefatory study by Mr Leslie Stephen; in 1893 Messrs Dent issued an edition in twelve volumes edited by Professor Saintsbury; and in 1898 Messrs Archibald Constable & Co. issued a further edition with a preliminary Essay by Mr Edmund Gosse. An annotated edition of the Journal of a Voyage to Lisbon was published by the Chiswick Press in 1892. There are Lives of Fielding by Watson (1807), Lawrence (1855), and in the 'Men of Letters' series by the present writer (1883, 1889, and revised American edition, 1900). Among separate articles may be noted Revue des Deux Mondes (Gustave Planche), 1832; Fraser's Magazine (Keightley), January and February 1858; Athenaum, 2nd June 1883; Thackeray's English Humourists (1858), pp. 266-85; Lang's Letters on Literature (1889), pp. 29-42; Traill's New Lucian (1900), pp. 268-86. A bust of Fielding by Miss Margaret Thomas was unveiled at the Shire Hall, Taunton, 4th September 1883, by James Russell Lowell, whose address on that occasion is reproduced in Democracy (1887), pp. 67-88. Fielding's will was printed in the Athenaum, 1st February 1890. The assignment of Joseph Andrews to Millar for £183, 115. is in the Forster Collection at South Kensington; the receipt and agreement for Tom Jones are in the Huth Collection.

AUSTIN DOBSON.

Sir Charles Hanbury Williams (1709-59) enjoyed great popularity as satirical poet, courtier, and diplomatist during the latter part of the reign of George II. Lord Hervey, Lord Chesterfield, Pulteney, and others threw off political squibs and light satires; but Williams eclipsed them all in liveliness and pungency. On the death of his father, Mr Hanbury, he took the name of Williams in respect of an estate in Monmouthshire left to him by a godfather, and in 1733 entered Parliament by Walpole's favour and as his supporter. Croker says that after lampooning Isabella, Duchess of Manchester, with her second husband, Mr Hussey, he 'retreated, with too little spirit, from the storm that threatened him into Wales, whence he was afterwards glad to accept missions to the courts of Dresden, Berlin, and Russia.' One verse of this truculent satire runs:

> But careful Heaven reserved her Grace For one of the Milesian race On stronger parts depending; Nature, indeed, denies them sense, But gives them legs and impudence That beats all understanding.

When Pulteney, in 1741, had succeeded in procuring Walpole's defeat and resignation, and was himself elevated to the peerage as Earl of Bath, some of Williams's bitterest verses were levelled at him. In the Statesman the new peer is pilloried:

When you touch on his lordship's high birth, Speak Latin as if you were tipsy; Say we're all but the sons of the earth, Et genus non fecimus ipsi.

Proclaim him as rich as a Jew,
Yet attempt not to reckon his bounties,
You may say he is married, 'tis true,
Yet speak not a word of the countess.

Leave a blank here and there in each page, To enrol the fair deeds of his youth; When you mention the acts of his age, Leave a blank for his honour and truth. Say he made a great monarch change hands; He spake—and the minister fell; Say he made a great statesman of Sands— Oh, that he had taught him to spell.

In another poem Williams rails at Sandys (or Sands), who by Pulteney's procurement was made Chancellor of the Exchequer:

How Sands, in sense and person queer,
Jumped from a patriot to a peer
No mortal yet knows why;
How Pulteney trucked the fairest fame
For a Right Honourable name
To call his vixen by.

His pasquinades are at least as personal and virulent as the political poetry of the Rollind or the Anti-Jacobin. The following is a specimen of Williams's more careful character-painting—part of a sketch of General Churchill, in several points suggesting Thackeray's Major Pendennis:

None led through youth a gayer life than he, Cheerful in converse, smart in repartee. But with old age its vices came along, And in narration he's extremely long, Exact in circumstance, and nice in dates, On every subject he his tale relates. If you name one of Marlbro's ten campaigns, He tells you its whole history for your pains, And Blenheim's field becomes by his reciting As long in telling as he was in fighting; His old desire to please is well expressed, His hat's well cocked, his periwig's well dressed; He rolls his stockings still, white gloves he wears, And in the boxes with the beaux appears; His eyes through wrinkled corners cast their mys, Still he bows graceful, still soft things he says: And, still remembering that he once was young, He strains his crippled knees and struts along. The room he entered smiling, which bespoke Some worn-out compliment or threadbare joke; For, not perceiving loss of parts, he yet Grasps at the shade of his departed wit.

In 1822 the fugitive poetry of Williams was collected and published in three volumes; but some at least of the grossest pieces were probably not written by him.

George, Lord Lyttelton (1709-73), was the son of Sir Thomas Lyttelton of Hagley in Worcestershire; and after distinguishing himself at Eton and Oxford, he passed some time in France and Italy. On his return he obtained a seat in Parliament, and opposed the measures of Sir Robert Walpole. As secretary to the Prince of Wales, he was able to secure favours for his literary friends, Thomson and Mallet. Pope admired his talents and opinions, commemorated him in his verse, and remembered him in his will; and his poetry gained him a place in Johnson's collection and his Lives of the Poets. From 1735 he took a conspicuous part in the House of Commons. When Walpole and the Whigs were vanquished, Lyttelton was successively one of the Lords of the Treasury, a Privy-Councillor, Chancellor of the r, and, finally, a peer. He was a good, sent-minded, awkward, and pious man, and patron of poets and literary men. was his intimate; Fielding dedicated s to him; Horace Walpole sneered at l Chesterfield and Smollett said unpleags about him, his manners and mental t. An honest politician, he was not a :esman. He was publishing poetry as 1730, and in 1735 produced the Letters ersian in England to his Friend at Ispaitesquieu's Lettres Persanes, the model, m 1721), in which Selim describes and iticises the opera, an indecorous stage -baiting, card-parties, balls, and the pasnners, and political factions of England ondon society. Some of the letters are Lyttelton's treatise with a purpose. the Conversion of St Paul was written particular view to the satisfaction' of the poet. His Dialogues of the Dead joyed much popularity. He also wrote ite History of the Reign of Henry II., to brought ample information and a spirit of y and justice; but the work is dry and not illuminated,' as Gibbon very truly a ray of genius.' Among the poems ues on love and jealousy, epistles and to Pope and many other friends, odes, is, and a good many real songs. Two t date from 1732 and 1733 respectivelyying the symptoms of love in this fashion:

Thene'er she speaks my ravished ear o other voice but hers can hear, o other wit but hers approve; ell me, my heart, if this be love, ning always to the same query; and the inning:

he heavy hours are almost past That part my love and me; y longing eyes may hope at last Their only wish to see.

ice to a Lady' is too fairly representative f his work. Gray praised his 'Monody' e's death, which remains a truly touching e Prologue to Thomson's Coriolanus was pted as his best poetic effort, and certainly elicitous lines and couplets. Before this d be brought out Thomson was dead. edy was acted for the benefit of the tions, and when Quin spoke Lyttelton's many of the audience wept.

From the 'Monody.'

n I look around

ll the well-known ground,

's wonted footsteps to descry;

oft we used to walk,

oft in tender talk

the summer sun go down the sky;

y yon fountain's side,

'here its waters glide

Along the valley, can she now be found: In all the wide-stretched prospect's ample bound, No more my mournful eye Can aught of her espy, But the sad sacred earth where her dear relics lie. . . . Sweet babes, who, like the little playful fawns, Were wont to trip along these verdant lawns, By your delighted mother's side: Who now your infant steps shall guide? Ah! where is now the hand whose tender care To every virtue would have formed your youth, And strewed with flowers the thorny ways of truth? O loss beyond repair! O wretched father, left alone To weep their dire misfortune and thy own! How shall thy weakened mind, oppressed with woe, And drooping o'er thy Lucy's grave, Perform the duties that you doubly owe,

From 'Advice to a Lady.'

Now she, alas! is gone,

The councils of a friend, Belinda, hear, Too roughly kind to please a lady's ear, Unlike the flatteries of a lover's pen, Such truths as women seldom learn from men. Nor think I praise you ill, when thus I shew What female vanity might fear to know: Some merit's mine to dare to be sincere; But greater your sincerity to bear. Hard is the fortune that your sex attends; Women, like princes, find few real friends: All who approach them their own ends pursue; Lovers and ministers are seldom true. Hence oft from Reason heedless Beauty strays, And the most trusted guide the most betrays; Hence, by fond dreams of fancied power amused, When most you tyrannise, you're most abused. What is your sex's earliest, latest care, Your heart's supreme ambition?-To be fair. For this, the toilet every thought employs, Hence all the toils of dress, and all the joys: For this, hands, lips, and eyes are put to school, And each instructed feature has its rule: And yet how few have learnt, when this is given, Not to disgrace the partial boon of Heaven! How few with all their pride of form can move How few are lovely, that are made for love! Do you, my fair, endeavour to possess An elegance of mind, as well as dress; Be that your ornament, and know to please By graceful Nature's unaffected ease. Nor make to dangerous wit a vain pretence, But wisely rest content with modest sense; For wit, like wine, intoxicates the brain, Too strong for feeble woman to sustain: Of those who claim it more than half have none; And half of those who have it are undone. Be still superior to your sex's arts, Nor think dishonesty a proof of parts: For you, the plainest is the wisest rule: A cunning woman is a knavish fool. Be good yourself, nor think another's shame Can raise your merit, or adorn your fame. . . . Virtue is amiable, mild, serene; Without all beauty, and all peace within;

The honour of a prude is rage and storm,
'Tis ugliness in its most frightful form;
Fiercely it stands, defying gods and men,
As fiery monsters guard a giant's den.
Seek to be good, but aim not to be great;
A woman's noblest station is retreat;
Her fairest virtues fly from public sight,
Domestic worth, that shuns too strong a light.

Prologue to the Tragedy of Coriolanus.

I come not here your candour to implore For scenes whose author is, alas! no more; He wants no advocate his cause to plead; You will yourselves be patrons of the dead. No party his benevolence confined, No sect-alike it flowed to all mankind. He loved his friends-forgive this gushing tear: Alas! I feel I am no actor here-He loved his friends with such a warmth of heart, So clear of interest, so devoid of art, Such generous friendship, such unshaken zeal, No words can speak it, but our tears may tell. O candid truth! O faith without a stain! O manners gently firm, and nobly plain! O sympathising love of others' bliss-Where will you find another breast like his! Such was the man: the poet well you know; Oft has he touched your hearts with tender woe; Oft in this crowded house, with just applause, You heard him teach fair Virtue's purest laws; For his chaste muse employed her heaven-taught lyre None but the noblest passions to inspire; Not one immoral, one corrupted thought, One line which, dying, he could wish to blot. O may to-night your favourable doom Another laurel add to grace his tomb: Whilst he, superior now to praise or blame, Hears not the feeble voice of human fame. Yet if to those whom most on earth he loved, From whom his pious care is now removed, With whom his liberal hand, and bounteous heart, Shared all his little fortune could impart: If to those friends your kind regard shall give What they no longer can from his receive, That, that, even now, above you starry pole, May touch with pleasure his immortal soul.

To the Castle of Indolence Lyttelton contributed the stanza with the famous portrait of Thomson, whose 'ditties sweet,' however, Lyttelton did not hesitate to alter and curtail in editions of Thomson's works published in 1750 and 1752; but the liberties thus taken with the poet's text disappeared from later editions. The friendly and playful penportrait of a friend runs thus:

A bard here dwelt, more fat than bard beseems, Who, void of envy, guile, and lust of gain, On virtue still, and nature's pleasing themes, Poured forth his unpremeditated strain:

The world forsaking with a calm disdain, Here laughed he careless in his easy seat;
Here quaffed encircled with the joyous train, Oft moralising sage: his ditty sweet

IIe loathed much to write, ne cared to repeat.

An edition of Lyttelton's collected works in prose and verse appeared in 1774, and was reissued in 1775 and 1776; and in 1845 Sir R. Phillimore published his Memoirs and Correspondence.

John Armstrong (1709?-79), the friend of Thomson, of Mallet, Wilkes, and other public and literary characters of that period, is now only known as the author of an unread didactic poem, the Art of Preserving Health. A son of the minister of Castleton, a pastoral parish in Liddesdale, he studied medicine in Edinburgh, and took his M.D in 1732. Three years later he was practising in London, and became known by the publication of several fugitive pieces and medical essays. A nauseous anonymous poem, the Economy of Love (1736), gave promise of poetical powers, but marred his practice as a physician. In 1744 appeared his Art of Preserving Health, which was followed by two other poems, Benevolence (1751) and Taste (1753), and a pseudonymous volume of Sketches or Essays (1758). In 1760 he was appointed physician to the forces in Germany; and on the peace in 1763 he returned to London, where he practised, but with little success, till his death, 7th September 1779. Armstrong seems to have been an indolent and splenetic but kind-hearted man - shrewd, caustic, and careful: he left £3000, saved out of a small income. His portrait in the Castle of Indolence is in Thomson's happiest manner:

(Profoundly silent, for they never spoke) One shyer still, who quite detested talk : Oft stung by spleen, at once away he broke To groves of pine and broad o'ershadowing oak; There, inly thrilled, he wandered all alone, And on himself his pensive fury wroke, Nor ever uttered word, save when first shone The glittering star of eve-'Thank Heaven, the day is done' Warton praised the Art of Preserving Health for its classical correctness and closeness of style, and its numberless poetical images. In general, however, it is stiff and laboured, with occasional passages of tumid extravagance; and the similes are not infrequently echoes of those of Thomson and other poets. Of these two extracts from the Art of Preserving Health (from the close of the second and third books respectively), the second, the most energetic passage in the whole poem and not least characteristic of its medical author, describes the 'sweating sickness' which appeared in London in September 1485, after the victorious entry of the troops of Henry VII. who had a week or two before fought at Bosworth field.

With him was sometimes joined in silent walk

Wrecks and Mutations of Time.

What does not fade? The tower that long had stood The crush of thunder and the warring winds, Shook by the slow but sure destroyer Time, Now hangs in doubtful ruins o'er its base, And flinty pyramids and walls of brass Descend. The Babylonian spires are sunk; Achaia, Rome, and Egypt moulder down. Time shakes the stable tyranny of thrones, And tottering empires crush by their own weight. This huge rotundity we tread grows old; And all those worlds that roll around the sun, nimself shall die, and ancient night olve the desolate abyss, reat Father, through the lifeless gloom, is arm to light another world, new planets roll by other laws.

Some sad at home, and in the desert some Abjured the fatal commerce of mankind. In vain: where'er they fled, the fates pursued, Others, with hopes more specious, crossed the main, To seek protection in far-distant skies: But none they found. It seemed the general air, From pole to pole, from Atlas to the east, Was then at enmity with English blood; For but the race of England all were safe In foreign climes; nor did this fury taste The foreign blood which England then contained. Where should they fly? The circumambient heaven Involved them still, and every breeze was bane: Where find relief? The salutary art Was mute, and, startled at the new disease, In fearful whispers hopeless omens gave. To Heaven, with suppliant rites they sent their prayers; Heaven heard them not. Of every hope deprived, Fatigued with vain resources, and subdued With woes resistless, and enfeebling fear, Passive they sunk beneath the weighty blow. Nothing but lamentable sounds were heard, Nor aught was seen but ghastly views of death. Infectious horror ran from face to face, And pale despair. 'Twas all the business then To tend the sick, and in their turns to die. In heaps they fell; and oft one bed, they say, The sickening, dying, and the dead contained.

Richard Glover (1712-85), a London merchant who sat in Parliament for Weymouth (1761-68), published two elaborate poems in blank verse, Leonidas and the Athenaid - the former on the defence of Thermopylæ, and the latter continuing the story of the war between the Greeks and Persians. The length of these poems, their want of sustained interest, and lack of genuine poetic quality have led to their being next to unknown in the present day. Leonidas (1737) was hailed with acclamations by the Opposition, or Prince of Wales's party, of which Glover was an active member. London, or the Progress of Commerce (1739), was a poem written to excite the national spirit against the Spaniards; and in 1742 Glover appeared before the bar of the House of Commons as delegate of the London merchants, complaining of the neglect of their interests. In 1744 he declined to join Mallet in writing a Life of the Duke of Marlborough, though his affairs had become somewhat embarrassed. A fortunate speculation in copper enabled him to retrieve his position, and he was returned to Parliament for Weymouth. He continued to maintain mercantile interests, and during his leisure enlarged his poem of Leonidas from nine to twelve books (1770). The Athenaid was published posthumously in 1787. His two tragedies, Boadicea (1753) and Medea (1761), are but indifferent performances. In 1726 a naval expedition against the Spanish West Indies had miscarried, and the commander, Admiral Hosier, whose orders prevented him from fighting, is said to have died of a broken heart. The disgrace was not wiped out till 1739, when, on the commencement of the 'War of Jenkins's Ear,' Admiral Vernon bombarded and took Portobelo on the Colombian coast. On this victory Glover wrote a ballad which had a great vogue; Horace Walpole thought it 'very easy and consequently pretty, but from the ease should never have guessed it Glover's.'

Address of Leonidas.

He alone Remains unshaken. Rising, he displays His godlike presence. Dignity and grace Adorn his frame, where manly beauty joins With strength Herculean. On his aspect shine Sublimest virtue and desire of fame, Where justice gives the laurel; in his eye The inextinguishable spark, which fires The souls of patriots; while his brow supports Undaunted valour, and contempt of death. Serene he cast his looks around, and spake: 'Why this astonishment on every face, Ye men of Sparta? Does the name of death Create this fear and wonder? O my friends! Why do we labour through the arduous paths Which lead to virtue? Fruitless were the toil. Above the reach of human feet were placed The distant summit, if the fear of death Could intercept our passage. But a frown Of unavailing terror he assumes To shake the firmness of the mind which knows That, wanting virtue, life is pain and woe; That, wanting liberty, even virtue mourns, And looks around for happiness in vain. Then speak, O Sparta! and demand my life; My heart, exulting, answers to thy call, And smiles on glorious fate. To live with fame The gods allow to many; but to die With equal lustre is a blessing Jove Among the choicest of his boons reserves, Which but on few his sparing hand bestows. Salvation thus to Sparta he proclaimed. Joy, wrapt awhile in admiration, paused, Suspending praise; nor praise at last resounds In high acclaim to rend the arch of heaven; A reverential nurmur breathes applause.

Admiral Hosier's Ghost.

As near Portobello lying On the gently swelling flood, At midnight, with streamers flying, Our triumphant navy rode; There while Vernon sat all glorious From the Spaniards' late defeat, And his crews, with shouts victorious, Drank success to England's fleet; On a sudden, shrilly sounding, Hideous yells and shrieks were heard; Then, each heart with fear confounding, A sad troop of ghosts appeared; All in dreary hammocks shrouded, Which for winding-sheets they wore, And, with looks by sorrow clouded, Frowning on that hostile shore. On them gleamed the moon's wan lustre, When the shade of Hosier brave

His pale bands was seen to muster,

Rising from their watery grave:

- O'er the glimmering wave he hied him, Where the Burford reared her sail, With three thousand ghosts beside him, And in groans did Vernon hail.
- 'Heed, oh heed our fatal story!
 I am Hosier's injured ghost;
 You who now have purchased glory
 At this place where I was lost:
 Though in Portobello's ruin,
 You now triumph free from fears,
 When you think on our undoing,
 You will mix your joys with tears.
- 'See these mournful spectres sweeping
 Ghastly o'er this hated wave,
 Whose wan cheeks are stained with weeping
 These were English captains brave.
 Mark those numbers, pale and horrid,
 Those were once my sailors bold;
 Lo! each hangs his drooping forehead,
 While his dismal tale is told.
- 'I, by twenty sail attended,
 Did this Spanish town affright;
 Nothing then its wealth defended,
 But my orders—not to fight!
 Oh! that in this rolling ocean
 I had cast them with disdain,
 And obeyed my heart's warm motion,
 To have quelled the pride of Spain!
- 'For resistance I could fear none;
 But with twenty ships had done
 What thou, brave and happy Vernon,
 Hast achieved with six alone.
 Then the Bastimentos never
 Had our foul dishonour seen,
 Nor the seas the sad receiver
 Of this gallant train had been.
- 'Thus, like thee, proud Spain dismaying,
 And her galleons leading home,
 Though condemned for disobeying,
 I had met a traitor's doom:
 To have fallen, my country crying,
 "He has played an English part,"
 Had been better far than dying
 Of a grieved and broken heart.
- 'Unrepining at thy glory,
 Thy successful arms we hail;
 But remember our sad story,
 And let Hosier's wrongs prevail.
 Sent in this foul clime to languish,
 Think what thousands fell in vain,
 Wasted with disease and anguish,
 Not in glorious battle slain.
- 'Hence with all my train attending,
 From their oozy tombs below,
 Through the hoary foam ascending,
 Here I feed my constant woe.
 Here the Bastimentos viewing,
 We recall our shameful doom,
 And, our plaintive cries renewing,
 Wander through the midnight gloom-

'O'er these waves for ever mourning Shall we roam, deprived of rest, If, to Britain's shores returning, You neglect my just request; After this proud foe subduing, When your patnot friends you see, Think on vengeance for my ruin, And for England—shamed in me.'

illiam Shenstone (1714-63), though author legies, odes and ballads, humorous sallies and J pieces,' wanted, as Johnson said, 'comprehen-and variety;' even did he lack depth, taneity, true natuess. Though amus of poetic fame, pent much of his and squandered t of his means on iscape - gardening ornamental agriure. He essayed ead a too romandyllic life in an iteenth-century aral Arcadia, and ed up around him ort of rural para-, exercising his ttante tastes and ies in laying out embellishing his mds, till at length ey difficulties and esses threwa cloud the fair prospect larkened the latter of the poet's life. estate which he laboured to adorn the Leasowes in the parish of Hales-Owen, cestershire, where he was born, and where, he died. He was taught to read at a dameol, and has immortalised his venerable preress in his Schoolmistress. In 1732 he was to Pembroke College, Oxford, where he rened four years. In 1745 the paternal estate o his own care, and he began from this time, ohnson characteristically describes it, 'to point prospects, to diversify his surface, to entangle walks, and to wind his waters; which he did such judgment and fancy, as made his little ain the envy of the great and the admiration he skilful; a place to be visited by travellers copied by designers.' Descriptions of the sowes were penned by Dodsley, Goldsmith, and iter' Carlyle; and Shenstone has a place in the ry of landscape-gardening when by no means ts zenith. The property was altogether not h more than £300 per annum, and Shenstone devoted so much of his means to out-of-doors ovements that he was compelled to live in a dilapidated house, not fit, as he acknowledges, to receive 'polite friends.' An unfortunate attachment and disappointed ambition conspired with his passion for landscape-gardening to bind him down to solitude and 'Shenstone's Folly,' as the Leasowes was called. He became querulous and dejected, pined at the unequal gifts of fortune, and even contemplated with a gloomy joy the prospect that terrified Swift when he spoke of being 'forced to die in a rage, like a poisoned rat in a hole.' Yet Shenstone must often have experienced very genuine pleasure in the Arcadian retreat which a century afterwards attracted pilgrims-it is described as 'an exquisite poem' by Hugh Miller in his First Impressions of England, and compared with Abbotsford in its disastrous consequences. 'The works of a person that builds,' the owner said, 'begin immediately to decay, while those of him who plants begin directly to improve.' But Shenstone sighed for more than inward peace and satisfaction - he died in solitude a votary of the world.

His works were collected and published after his death by his friend Dodsley, in three volumes (1764-69) the first containing his poems, the second his prose essays, and the third his letters and other pieces. Gray remarks of his correspondence that it is 'about nothing else but the Leasowes, and his writings with two or three neighbouring clergymen who wrote verses too.' The essays display ease and grace of style united to judgment and discrimination. They have not the mellow thought and learning of Cowley's essays, but they resemble them. In poetry Shenstone tried different styles: his elegies, melodious enough in a fashion, barely reach mediocrity; his levities, or pieces of humour, are dull and spiritless. His highest effort is The Schoolmistress, published in 1742, but said to be 'written at college, 1736;' it was altered and enlarged after its first publication. This poem is a descriptive sketch offered as 'in imitation of Spenser' (really with elements of the burlesque, and earlier than Thomson's Castle of Indolence), delightfully quaint, yet true to nature. His Pastoral Ballad, in four parts, took rank as the finest English poem of that order. But his pathos is apt to become sentimentality; the simplicity is not seldom artificial, like the poet's garden. Campbell sensibly enough regretted the affected Arcadianism of the pastoral pieces, which undoubtedly present an incongruous mixture of pastoral life and modern manners.

Johnson and Goldsmith both praised the Schoolmistress; but Walpole unkindly dubbed Shenstone 'the water-gruel bard.' His poetry, in spite of its many shortcomings and defects, has resemblances to Goldsmith's: his characteristic use of anapæstic verse was imitated by Cowper; andthough the other aspect of him is the more conspicuous some critics have found in him touches that warrant them in linking him with Thomson as in some degree a herald of the 'return to nature.' One stanza of the Schoolmistress has the special interest of having probably suggested to Gray the thought in his Elegy about the 'mute inglorious Milton:'

Yet, nursed with skill, what dazzling fruits appear! Even now sagacious foresight points to shew A little bench of heedless bishops here, And there a chancellour in embryo, Or bard sublime, if bard may e'er be so, As Milton, Shakespeare, names that ne'er shall die! Though now he crawl along the ground so low, Nor weeting how the Muse should soar on high, Wisheth, poor starveling elf! his paper-kite may fly.

Shenstone was an early favourite of Burns, who in a letter of 1783 names him first amongst his favourites, 'all of the sentimental order,' specially commending the elegies. And Shenstone's influence on Burns is too often clearly traceable.

From 'The Schoolmistress.

Ah me ! full sorely is my heart forlorn, To think how modest worth neglected hes; While partial fame doth with her blasts adorn Such deeds alone as pride and pomp disguise; Deeds of ill sort, and mischievous emprize; Lend me thy clarion, goddess! let me try To sound the praise of merit ere it dies ; Such as I oft have channeed to espy, Lost in the dreary shades of dull obscurity.

In every village marked with little spire, Embowered in trees, and hardly known to fame, There dwells, in lowly shed, and mean attire, A matron old, whom we schoolmistress name; Who boasts unruly brats with birch to tame: They grieven sore, in piteous durance pent, Awed by the power of this relentless dame: And ofttimes, on vagaries idly bent,

For unkempt hair, or task unconned, are sorely shent.

And all m sight doth rise a birchen tree, Which Learning near her little dome did stow; Whilome a twig of small regard to see, Though now so wide its waving branches flow, And work the simple vassals mickle woe; For not a wind might curl the leaves that blew, But their limbs shuddered, and their pulse beat low; And as they looked, they found their horror grew, And shaped it into rods, and tingled at the view. . .

Near to this dome is found a patch so green, On which the tribe their gambols do display; And at the door imprisoning board is seen, Lest weakly wights of smaller size should stray: Eager, perdie, to bask in sunny day ! The noises intermixed, which thence resound, Do learning's little tenement betray : Where sits the dame, disguised in look profound. And eyes her fairy throng, and turns her wheel arou

Her cap, far whiter than the driven snow, Emblem right meet of decency does yield: Her apron dyed in grain, as blue, I trow, As is the harebell that adorns the field; And in her hand, for scepter, she does wield Tway birchen sprays; with anxious fear entworld With dark distrust, and sad repentance filled; And steadfast hate, and sharp affliction joined, And fury uncontrolled, and chastisement unkind . .

A russet stole was o'er her shoulders thrown; A russet kirtle fenced the nipping air : Twas simple russet, but it was her own : 'Twas her own country bred the flock so fair; Twas her own labour did the fleece prepare; And, sooth to say, her pupils ranged around. Albeit ne flattery did corrupt her truth, Ne pompous title did debauch her ear; Goody, good woman, gossip, n'aunt, forsooth, Or dame, the sole additions she did hear; Yet these she challenged, these she held right de Ne would esteem him act as mought behave. Who should not honoured eld with these revere; For never title yet so mean could prove, But there was eke a mind which did that title love.

One ancient hen she took delight to feed, The plodding pattern of the busy dame; Which, ever and anon, impelled by need, Into her school, begirt with chickens, came: Such favour did her past deportment claim: And, if neglect had lavished on the ground Fragment of bread, she would collect the same; For well she knew, and quaintly could expound, What sin it were to waste the smallest crumb she fe

Herbs, too, she knew, and well of each could sp That in her garden sipped the silvery dew; Where no vain flower disclosed a gaudy streak, But herbs for use and physic, not a few, Of gray renown, within those borders grew: The tufted basil, pun-provoking thyme, Fresh balm, and marygold of chearful hue: The lowly gill, that never dares to climb; And more I fain would sing, disdaining here to thyn

Here oft the dame, on Sabbath's decent eve, Hymned such psalms as Sternhold forth did me If winter 'twere, she to her hearth did cleave, But in her garden found a summer-seat : Sweet melody! to hear her then repeat How Israel's sons, beneath a foreign king, While taunting foemen did a song entreat, All for the nonce untuning every string, Uphung their useless lyres-small heart had they t or she was just, and friend to virtuous lore,
